START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

August 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-073

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library
(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 16:1

FILM STOCK:

REEL 74

Volumes 126-128

BSO, Pops, European Tour

1970-1972

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS

VOLUME 126

BSO
Pops

1971 - 1972

1971 - 1972

BLANK PAGE

Michael Tilson Thomas
The Science of Music, The Music of Science

BY DAVID FRIEND

Q: Many people feel that the BSO has catered largely to the older segments of the population and those elements from which it derives financial support. Your Spectrum Series concerts have been hailed as the first significant departure from the standard Bach- Beethoven-Brahms diet at Symphony Hall.

Could you tell me what prompted you to begin this series and what it holds for the future?

A: The origin of the Spectrum Series, the idea of it, was to present an option using the ensemble forces of the BSO in a different kind of repertoire or a different kind of combination of repertoires rather than having a few pieces that are "safe" and a few pieces that are not so "safe." Instead I wanted concerts which were conceptually organized in some way or represented the work of a single composer or of a single period or embraced a very large time span with the same musical ideas. I also wanted concerts in which the energy level of the pieces was very high.

There are a lot of ways that the programs for the Spectrum Series have been derived. I simply want to present a concert that I feel at the gut level is really a monster, something that will really grab people. And I have quite a bit of faith at this point, having put together several of these programs in being able to construct these programs. While there were only four of these programs in the Spectrum Series to date, I have a notebook which is filled with at least fifteen to twenty ideas for other programs.

Q: Are your future Spectrum concerts going to be devoted exclusively to the performance of established works by established composers?

A: No. Several of my concerts will include debuts of altogether new works.

Q: Do you see improvisation becoming increasingly important in the works of young composers?

A: I think it's a very important thing. I at one time played in an ensemble in L.A which was devoted exclusively to improvisation. We toured the United States at one point and played here in New York at Hunter College.

Q: What kind of instruments did you use?

A: Mostly conventional instruments. We worked a lot from graphic models. We used graphics to come up with a structural layout for a piece where nothing was specified except the structure. We used arbitrary symbols to represent a structure, its permutations, rotations, and so forth. Then we could improvise around this structure using the symbols to determine the form of the work. But the actual playing was left to the spontaneous feelings of each player within this framework. But we could never really work effectively with more than four or five people to have any kind of real design with the piece. Beyond that there are so many variables that you have to take into consideration that it really becomes a matter of texture rather than a matter of figure, line, and so forth. And texture alone becomes rather boring for me. Ideas are too important for me to go into a strictly texture situation. That's why I think that the idea of improvising with an orchestra is not practical. It's self-defeating beyond about fifteen players.

Q: What about pieces that use a small group of players, for instance a rock band or a jazz combo, in a concert situation with a symphony orchestra? A popular example might be Frank Zappa's "200 Motels" which was first performed with the L.A. Philharmonic.

A: I don't like that idea very much. There are very few pieces that involve a rock band or jazz group that are successful. Generally those pieces are just two things happening simultaneously. The rock group does what it does and the orchestra does what it does. It's really more like an arrangement, violins playing sustained G-flats or whatever. And the approach always is that the orchestra has to change to adapt the rock styles and the rock can stay as it is. I think if there is going to be a successful fusion between the two that the rock is going to have to change just as much as the orchestra. There has to be an adoption of ideas on both sides.

Q: Getting back to an earlier question, to what do you attribute the waning interest in symphony orchestras among the young?

A: For a long while classical music has been so serious and so stultifying and so locked into performances of the same fifty compositions by the same eight composers that it just paralyzed itself.

There seems to be a notion that classical music has to be earnest and serious. For instance, you can base a piece on simply your feelings about where each note should go. In other words, every next note in your piece is there only because you know that it must be the next note. On the other hand there is a school of thought in classical music that demands a reason for each note. For instance, if you base your piece on the annexation of congruencies of modulo Z in the theory of C's as one recent composer has done, then when someone asks you why a particular note is used in a place in the piece you can explain that, well, when you have the rotation of the original module of 106 degrees superimposed over the dispersion of gaussean something or other, all these very complex systems, your computer has told you that each note has to be where it is. The piece is destroyed otherwise. And a lot of people are taken in by the seriousness of this kind of music and this has in part contributed to the current condition of classical music.

Michael Tilson Thomas

Q: Do you see simpler musical languages evolving out of this which may be more relevant?

A: Yes. The simpler musical languages though, were until recently rejected. I see no reason why I can't produce and perform great music which is written within a simpler type of aesthetic, why I always have to say that music must be above a certain level of complexity to be respectable.

Q: Do you have ambitions to make the kind of music that you are involved in more acceptable to a broader base of people?

A: There are many different kinds of aesthetics operating in music and to lock yourself into one and say that this is the only one is impossible. I think that if anyone just gives the audience a chance and just gives the audience a little bit of insight into how to listen to the piece, that the audience will respond to it very very well. The new music I presented certainly evoked tremendous response.

Q: How do you go about explaining to an audience the structure and activity of a piece?

A: First of all, forget about program notes. Most people don't read them. I think you have to talk to the audience.

There's a terrible snobbery about music. Many problems and bad attitudes on the part of the performers, the audience. Maybe one of the reasons music gets into such weird problems is that it's the only truly abstract art. It can't be grabbed onto. It's interesting that there are ideas of form and structure and key relationship in music that are abstract and consequently are very powerful and beautiful. Most people are not aware of those things. What people need is good classes in listening which sensitize them to these abstract forms and structures. People are still thinking of music as a kind of diversion or entertainment that they should be able to grab immediately and they don't perceive that music is a kind of discipline both for the person who performs it and the person who listens to it. And the listener is always at a certain level of sensitivity and it is always possible to expand this sensitivity and perception.

Q: In schools, the emphasis in music is usually on performance of music rather than composition. While children are taught to paint at a very early age, they are rarely taught to compose. Hence, most people regard composition with complete awe and incomprehension. Is this emphasis contributing to people's unsophisticated attitude toward music?

A: Yes. And I think it would be valuable to have pieces of classical music presented in such a way that the texture and orchestration were changed: for instance, performing a Beethoven symphony on synthesizers, so that the form and structure were the only element fully retained.

Q: About the most frustrating knowledge for many young composers is that it is nearly impossible to get a piece of orchestral work performed. Consequently many students and composers are turning to electronic music and synthesizers like ARP and Moog. How do you view this phenomenon?

A: At its best, electronics can do perfectly what no performer could do. But electronics and live music are two completely different aesthetics. There is a very special experience in performing and in writing a piece which is made to happen in the presence of other people by a performer and with the drama of that person doing that piece and reflecting what's in that piece, and taking whatever universal character may rest in that piece and interpreting it and focusing it and projecting it. That is a universal experience in the arts and probably always will be.

And tying in with an earlier question, I think there's a great simplification going on in music. I think it's reached a peak of being super organized and complex and we've realized that beyond a certain level of activity no activity exists because it's self-cancelling. So now there's the idea of retreating to a simpler kind of language. And with that you get back into a situation which performers can better handle.

Q: Does the management of the BSO condone your bringing "new music" to the concert hall?

A: Of course. We have done several new pieces already and I have always been interested in new music and intend to bring other new pieces into the hall this year.

Q: This does not upset the patronage of the BSO?

A: If the orchestra sold out every single concert it would still lose money. But if the community wants and needs its orchestra, then the orchestra has the right to ask for and receive the funds it needs.

Q: Do you think it's the responsibility of a conductor and musical director to make his programs palatable to his patron's.

A: No. My responsibility is to perform the music, to present programs which are of interesting music, well performed, which represent a complete spectrum of what's available and to get people into that hall and feel that I have reached them and done my job. If I can do that, then I am offering enough different options for different people with different tastes then I am doing something that is honest and right. I can't on top of this, however, worry about the financial state of the orchestra. You see, I am in the lucky position of saying that while money is hard to get and rehearsals are expensive, the music requires this and therefore I have to demand it. Every organization has to have someone in it who is concerned only with the product being as good as it can be.

Q: Do you plan to carry your artistic career over into other areas such as film-making, television, etc.?

A: Yes. I am in the process of doing this now. I am involved in some television productions for later this year and next year, but I'll have more to say about that in a few months. I also have some ideas about films and theatre productions.

Q: Do you currently have the time you need to explore these areas?

A: No. I am currently committed to a very heavy conducting schedule, but next year I have arranged to make more time for some of these other activities. I am not the type of person who lives only to be a great conductor. I have to do other things as well. But I imagine that I will always maintain some kind of relationship with orchestras.

Q: Would you consider someday embarking on a whole new career in some field completely divorced from music, such as science or history?

A: Well I certainly have a great interest in other areas, particularly history, especially the history of science, Asiatic studies, aesthetics, architecture. These are areas in which I read greatly all the time. Whereas I doubt that at age 30, I might suddenly decide to become an architect and go back to school, I certainly wouldn't be adverse to teaching and trying to bring to bear my collected experiences in such a way as to present a cohesive view of the interrelationships between these different disciplines. I am always seeing things in the context of other disciplines and drawing parallel lines between elements of calligraphy, music, astrology, history, science and so forth. I like to think musically about science, and scientifically about music.

Q: What about politics? How does it enter your life?

A: Well, I went through a period as a student where I worked hard for political causes, but I feel that I should now do that which I can do the best. I want to bring to people the message that I can bring best, and to the most people, and that is through the nonverbal exploration and experience of the abstract in the most personal sense. I guess that reflects the great disillusionment that I have about politics and the nature of the state. I would much rather go to a school and talk to kids about music. I used to do this in L.A. in underprivileged areas.

Q: Do you prefer this face-to-face confrontation to the less direct condition of the concert hall?

A: Sometimes you can say something to someone in an audience which is much more direct and personal than you ever could face to face. Music is an incredibly personal thing and you're touching with music a level of a person's consciousness that maybe you couldn't reach if you were just talking to him. The greatest kind of performance communicates this way. A person can come out on a stage whom you've never seen before and move you in a very personal way.

Q: Do you think you can communicate to everyone in an audience?

A: No. Generally you have to assume that at least 85 per cent of the people in an audience will not be really interested and will not be sensitized, but that you are performing for the benefit of those few who more than make up for the others.

Q: When you talk to children, what kinds of questions do they ask you?

A: They always try to find out what pigeonhole I'm in. Do I like this, or that, or whatever. And they are usually very surprised when they discover that I haven't really staked out any single position, and that I'm interested in everything. And they're surpised to find out that I listen to Coltrane, the Stones, and other jazz and rock performers. I think this age of compartmentalized musicians is ending.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

NOV 16 1971

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

OCT 13 1971 New England Newsclip

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

OCT 14 1971 New England

Concert series slated

BOSTON — Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts the third pair of Friday-Saturday concerts of the Orchestra's ninety-first season this week.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Oct. 16 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Steinberg opens the concert with a performance of Mozart's Overture to La clemenza di Tito, followed by Ravel's Piano concerto with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program concludes with Mahler's Symphony no. 6.

Alexis Weissenberg, born in Sofia, Bulgaria, studied in his native country and in Israel before coming to the United States to study at the Juilliard School. After his studies at Juilliard, he toured Israel, Egypt, Turkey and South America.

He made his American orchestra debut with the New York Philharmonic. Weissenberg's most recent appearance with the Boston Symphony was during the 1971 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in a performance of Tchaikovsky's First piano concerto. Michael Tilson Thomas was the conductor.

William Steinberg conducts the opening concert of the Tuesday "Cambridge" series, Tuesday evening, Oct. 12 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Soloist is pianist Jeffrey Siegel who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert which includes Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 "Pastoral," Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, and Hindemith's symphony Mathis der Maler.

Chicago - born Jeffery Siegel began his early piano studies with Rudolf Gaz. After winning the Chicago Symphony's youth concert auditions in 1957, he gave two performances of Beethoven's Third piano concerto with the Chicago Symphony. His advanced musical studies were with Rosina Lhevinne and Ilona Kabos at the Juilliard School. He was graduated with highest honors from Juilliard and won several important prizes during the following years, including the Leventritt Award. In 1965 he made his debut in London with the London Symphony, and appeared for the first time at Carnegie Hall two years later. During the past three years, Siegel has performed with many of the world's major orchestras, including the St. Louis Symphony, the Detroit Symphony, the New Orleans Philharmonic and the National Symphony.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 560,377

OCT 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Pianist in debut

BSO opens concert series

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

For the first of this season's Tuesday night Cambridge Concerts at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a program of repeats (Beethoven, Symphony No. 6, and Hindemith "Mathis der Maler") and the debut of the young pianist Jeffrey Siegel in the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 3.

To my mind, the Prokofiev has limited value as a debut piece. Yes, it's pleasant and popular and has lots of razzle-dazzle but only in an empty-headed sardonic sort of way. About all it tells you about a pianist is how fleet his fingers are. And, like the Ravel G-major Concerto, it is over so quickly (or so it seems) that one feels as if he really had no chance to absorb what he heard.

Nevertheless, Siegel is an impressive player — if for no other reason than that he obviously cares about the music and conveys that by letting you hear all the nuances written into the score. There are subito pianos, crescendi and differences between mezzo-forte and mezzo-piano in his playing.

Also operative are a feeling for tone, good taste, lots of facility and a certain amount of excitment. The articulation of octaves and all those scale passages was absolutely clear, and my only reservation about any of it had to do with a certain timidity in bringing out bass lines.

Now, it would be interesting to hear Mr. Siegel in a recital that would really challenge his intelligence and musicality.

The orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, proved a rather coarse partner for Siegel. Dynamic levels, in contrast to the soloist, seemed always to be one or two markings louder than indicated, and the horns provided some all-too-obvious bloopers in the second movement.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 18 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO plays unfamiliar Mahler

By Louis Snyder

In weekend concerts, William Steinberg led the Boston Symphony in what was, surprisingly enough, only the second series of performances of Mahler's Sixth Symphony (in A minor) undertaken by the orchestra. First performed under the composer's direction in 1906, and not heard in the United States until Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic played it in 1947, the weighty, disturbing Sixth reached Boston in 1964-65 via Erich Leinsdorf, who conducted it eight times that season. Thus, on Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, it was regarded with a certain surprise and awe by all but world travelers, record buffs, and burgeoning Mahlerians.

A great deal of discussion, backing and filling, and deep probing has surrounded the Sixth from the start. Mahler himself changed his mind about the order of the movements — the Andante became the second movement, and the Scherzo the third, then he switched their places back again as they were originally (the way they were played by Mr. Steinberg). The heavy crepe of despair and death were summoned up by listeners as meaning for the ominous chords and severe percussive devices that permeate the score, despite the composer's denial of the existence of a "program" for this symphony. The marked departure from the heartiness of its predecessors made the Sixth a subject of frowns and headshakings.

Familiar or not, the Mahler A minor, in a towering performance by Mr. Steinberg and the BSO, was the pièce de résistance at Symphony Hall over the weekend—a reading that found conductor and musicians in the kind of strong musical accord that shivers the eardrums and rivets the attention. True, there were a few timid souls who fled the tonally declarative and melodically unaccustomed, but by and large the BSO audience sat its ground in the face of the music's bold rhythms and swelling sonorities, its peaceful melodic swatches, offstage cowbells, and relentless thunderbolt crashes. At the end of the Friday concert, many seemed too stunned to applaud, while others stood and cheered. Hopefully the Sixth will be back again before too long, since it seems to be just a question of hard core BSO subscribers getting to know it — a bowing acquaintance, so to speak.

Alexis Weissenberg prefaced the heavier business of the program with a highly virtuosic performance of Ravel's delicious Piano Concerto in G, flinging out notes like confetti, and with the help of Mr. Steinberg and his men, wrapping up this attractive musical package with appropriate touches of sophistication and humor.

To open the proceedings, Mr. Steinberg conducted Mozart's overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," which had its last previous performances by the BSO in 1883, the orchestra's third season.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

OCT 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Concert series slated

BOSTON — Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts the third pair of Friday-Saturday concerts of the Orchestra's ninety-first season this week.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Oct. 16 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Steinberg opens the concert with a performance of Mozart's Overture to La clemenza di Tito, followed by Ravel's Piano concerto with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program concludes with Mahler's Symphony no. 6.

Alexis Weissenberg, born in Sofia, Bulgaria, studied in his native country and in Israel before coming to the United States to study at the Juilliard School. After his studies at Juilliard, he toured Israel, Egypt, Turkey and South America.

He made his American orchestra debut with the New York Philharmonic. Weissenberg's most recent appearance with the Boston Symphony was during the 1971 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in a performance of Tchaikovsky's First piano concerto. Michael Tilson Thomas was the conductor.

William Steinberg conducts the opening concert of the Tuesday "Cambridge" series, Tuesday evening, Oct. 12 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Soloist is pianist Jeffrey Siegel who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert which includes Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 "Pastoral," Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, and Hindemith's symphony Mathis der Maler.

Chicago - born Jeffery Siegel began his early piano studies with Rudolf Gaz. After winning the Chicago Symphony's youth concert auditions in 1957, he gave two performances of Beethoven's Third piano concerto with the Chicago Symphony. His advanced musical studies were with Rosina Lhevinne and Ilona Kabos at the Juilliard School. He was graduated with highest honors from Juilliard and won several important prizes during the following years, including the Leventritt Award. In 1965 he made his debut in London with the London Symphony, and appeared for the first time at Carnegie Hall two years later. During the past three years, Siegel has performed with many of the world's major orchestras, including the St. Louis Symphony, the Detroit Symphony, the New Orleans Philharmonic and the National Symphony.

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

OCT 14 1971 New England

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261 042 SUN

OCT 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Pianist in debut

BSO opens concert series

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

For the first of this season's Tuesday night Cambridge Concerts at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a program of repeats (Beethoven, Symphony No. 6, and Hindemith "Mathis der Maler") and the debut of the young pianist Jeffrey Siegel in the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 3.

To my mind, the Prokofiev has limited value as a debut piece. Yes, it's pleasant and popular and has lots of razzle-dazzle but only in an empty-headed sardonic sort of way. About all it tells you about a pianist is how fleet his fingers are. And, like the Ravel G-major Concerto, it is over so quickly (or so it seems) that one feels as if he really had no chance to absorb what he heard.

Nevertheless, Siegel is an impressive player — if for no other reason than that he obviously cares about the music and conveys that by letting you hear all the nuances written into the score. There are subito pianos, crescendi and differences between mezzo-forte and mezzo-piano in his playing.

Also operative are a feeling for tone, good taste, lots of facility and a certain amount of excitment. The articulation of octaves and all those scale passages was absolutely clear, and my only reservation about any of it had to do with a certain timidity in bringing out bass lines.

Now, it would be interesting to hear Mr. Siegel in a recital that would really challenge his intelligence and musicality.

The orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, proved a rather coarse partner for Siegel. Dynamic levels, in contrast to the soloist, seemed always to be one or two markings louder than indicated, and the horns provided some all-too-obvious bloopers in the second movement.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,234

OCT 18 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO plays unfamiliar Mahler

By Louis Snyder

In weekend concerts, William Steinberg led the Boston Symphony in what was, surprisingly enough, only the second series of performances of Mahler's Sixth Symphony (in A minor) undertaken by the orchestra. First performed under the composer's direction in 1906, and not heard in the United States until Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic played it in 1947, the weighty, disturbing Sixth reached Boston in 1964-65 via Erich Leinsdorf, who conducted it eight times that season. Thus, on Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, it was regarded with a certain surprise and awe by all but world travelers, record buffs, and burgeoning Mahlerians.

A great deal of discussion, backing and filling, and deep probing has surrounded the Sixth from the start. Mahler himself changed his mind about the order of the movements — the Andante became the second movement, and the Scherzo the third, then he switched their places back again as they were originally (the way they were played by Mr. Steinberg). The heavy crepe of despair and death were summoned up by listeners as meaning for the ominous chords and severe percussive devices that permeate the score, despite the composer's denial of the existence of a "program" for this symphony. The marked departure from the heartiness of its predecessors made the Sixth a subject of frowns and headshakings.

Familiar or not, the Mahler A minor, in a towering performance by Mr. Steinberg and the BSO, was the pièce de résistance at Symphony Hall over the weekend—a reading that found conductor and musicians in the kind of strong musical accord that shivers the eardrums and rivets the attention. True, there were a few timid souls who fled the tonally declarative and melodically unaccustomed, but by and large the BSO audience sat its ground in the face of the music's bold rhythms and swelling sonorities, its peaceful melodic swatches, offstage cowbells, and relentless thunderbolt crashes. At the end of the Friday concert, many seemed too stunned to applaud, while others stood and cheered. Hopefully the Sixth will be back again before too long, since it seems to be just a question of hard core BSO subscribers getting to know it — a bowing acquaintance, so to speak.

Alexis Weissenberg prefaced the heavier business of the program with a highly virtuosic performance of Ravel's delicious Piano Concerto in G, flinging out notes like confetti, and with the help of Mr. Steinberg and his men, wrapping up this attractive musical package with appropriate touches of sophistication and humor.

To open the proceedings, Mr. Steinberg conducted Mozart's overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," which had its last previous performances by the BSO in 1883, the orchestra's third season.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 49,250

AUG 15 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony marks 90th birthday this fall

By ALFRED W. BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

LOWELL — Erich Leinsdorf, former musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Friday afternoon concert (Oct. 22) which will mark the 90th anniversary of the founding of the world famous musical organization.

Usually the Friday and Saturday evening concerts by the Symphony are identical. On this occasion the Friday program will commemorate the anniversary by programming the music heard on he initial appearance of the Orchestra. The music will cover the first part of the program and for that list Maestro Leinsdorf has invited the celebrated contralto, Lili Chookasian to be guest artist.

This portion of the concert will include Weber's Jubel Overture, followed by a scene from Bruch's Odysseus and arias and incidental music from Gluck's Orfeo. In the 1881 concert George Henschel, the Boston Symphony's first director was on the podium and the soloist was his wife, a noted contralto in her time. Remaining part of the coming program will be music from "Romeo and Juliet" by Prokofiev.

The season will officially open on September 4, and directing will be William Steinberg. Maestro Steinberg has selected Christiane Edinger, violinist, to perform the solo passages in the Violin Concerto by Einem. The concert will open with the Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral) by Beethoven. Closing selection will be Hindermith's "Mathis der Maler."

During the 1971-72 season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a series of 20 pairs of concerts in the Friday-Saturday series. This is a reduction of two from last season. This will allow the Orchestra to schedule a special new series of concerts to be led by its Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. Details concerning this special series will be announced at a later date.

In addition to Messers Steinberg, Thomas and Leinsdorf, there will be appearing in the role of guest conductors, Max Rudolf, Seiji Ozawa, Erich Kunzel, Aldo Ceccato, Colin Davis and Leon Kirchner.

The guest pianists include, Alexis Weissenberg, Horacio Gutierrez, Andre Watts, Alicia De Larrocha, Misha Dichter, Stephen Bishop and Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer. The celebrated violinist, Zino Francescatti will play with the Orchestra on March 3-4, 1972, and will perform the Violin Concerto by Brahms.

"Tommy", the enormously successful Rock Opera by The Who, will be presented in Boston as a ballet when Les Grands Ballets Canadiens give five performances, Sept. 30, Oct. 1 and 2. The multi-media dance production features a full company of 50 dancers, a film and light show, and the stereo sound track from original tapes by The Who.

Fernald Nault choreographed "Tommy", as well as "Hip and Straight", a shorter work to precede it at each performance. The original score for "Hip and Straight" was composed by

ERICH LEINSDORF

Paul Dunlessis and will be played on stage by a rock ensemble comprised of members of the Montreal Symphony. The dance version of "Tommy" has been toured successfully by Les Grand Ballets Canadiens throughout Canada, as well as in the United States. This will be an early season presentation by the Boston University Celebrity Series.

This year the Celebrity Series is presenting 35 music and dance events. There will be one change from the original list. Cellist Jacqueline Du Pre has been forced to cancel all concerts engagements for the season However, the concert has been rescheduled as a sonata recital featuring violinist, Pinchas Zukeman. Accompanist will be pianist Daniel Barenboim. This event will be held on the same date as announced for the original, Friday evening, Jan. 28, 1972.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

OCT 23 1971 New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf Conducts BSO's 90th Anniversary Concert

By HARRY NEVILLE

"Mr. Henschel very properly showed annoyance at the lack of courtesy on the part of some of the audience, in neglecting to give their individual attention to the musical numbers, and the cause of his annoyance was given about equally by those whose lack of interest led them to continue their conversation after the tap of the conductor's baton, and those whose excessive interest led them to annoy all about them by their over-energetic following of the scores of the several numbers, with the incessant turning of leaves incidental to such action."

THUS WROTE THE CRITIC of the Sunday Herald of the very first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an event that took place in the Boston Music Hall Oct. 22, 1881. Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony commemorated the 90th anniversary of that concert, and one could hardly complain of a lack of audience interest in the event.

For one thing, Erich Leinsdorf, who is a special favorite of the Friday afternoon crowd, held forth on the podium. For another, the program included three of the pieces George Henschel conducted at the inaugural concert of the 1881-82 season. In addition, the concert provided the audience the rare treat of hearing the sensitive pianism of Leinsdorf, when he appeared as accompanist, along with violist Burton Fine, in contralto Lili Chookasian's performance of Brahms' Two Songs, Op. 91.

THE ITEMS DUPLICATED from the inaugural concert were Weber's Festival Overture, a joyous work very much in the vein of the more familiar "Oberon" and "Freischuetz" overtures; a recitative and aria from Bruch's "Odysseus;" and the aria "Che faro senza Euridice" from Gluck's "Orfeo."

The real surprise of the program was the Bruch aria, which turns out to be a powerfully dramatic work, altogether one of Bruch's strongest creations. The aria depicts Penelope's grief during the absence of her husband, and on the strength of this sample I am curious to hear the entire cantata from which it is taken.

MISS CHOOKASIAN was in resplendent voice, but even more impressive than her sheer tonal beauty were her exquisite molding of long phrases and her vivid projection of textual values. Leinsdorf got excellent playing from the orchestra. He seemed relaxed, genial and rather pleased to be appearing once again before a Friday afternoon audience. He also gave quite a bit of incidental pleasure by means of the famous Leinsdorf podium manner, whose special quality can be suggested by the phrase "restrained showmanship."

The program's concluding work was Prokofiev's score for the ballet "Romeo and Juliet." Leinsdorf has conducted this work many times with the BSO, and there's nothing left to be said about the performance except that it's completely alive and glowing from beginning to end.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 22 1971 New England Newsclip

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Saturday, October 23, 1971

Boston Symphony is 90, too

Boston

It was exactly 90 years ago yesterday that 67 musicians, under the direction of Georg Henschel, started the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its distinguished career in the city's now vanished Music Hall. The soloist (whose 39th birthday it was, incidentally) was the renowned contralto, Annie Louise Cary, who had gone from Wayne, Maine, to a distinguished operatic and concert career in Europe, Russia, and the United States. The audience was reported to have been large, fashionable, and enthusiastic, and the Boston press didn't neglect to commend "Major" Henry Lee Higginson, whose "liberality made the venture a possibility."

The "venture" having taken on a certain air of permanence, the Boston Symphony (now 106 members) marked its 90th anniversary yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with its former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, on the podium, and mezzo-soprano Lili Chookasian of the Metropolitan Opera as soloist. Reaching back to the BSO's first program, the orchestra played Weber's Festival Overture ("Jubel-Ouvertüre in E"), and Miss Chookasian repeated Miss Cary's original choices — a Scena, "Penelope's Mourning," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," and "Che farò" from Gluck's "Orpheus." In 1881, Mr. Henschel had accompanied Miss Cary at the piano during the concert, so Mr. Leinsdorf played for his soloist as she sang two Brahms songs, with first violist Burton Fine also accompanying.

The remainder of the 1971 program comprised music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," whereas Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" Overture, Haydn's Symphony in B flat, and the "Rosamunde" ballet music of Schubert had been offered to the first BSO audience.

L. Sn.

BSO founder

A thwarted musician himself, Henry Lee Higginson (shown in a John Singer Sargent portrait) founded the Boston Symphony in 1881 and maintained it almost singlehanded until 1918, when he delegated responsibility for its future to the citizens of Boston.

Conductors

Georg Henschel (above), who directed the first Boston Symphony concert on Oct. 22, 1881, at Boston's old Music Hall, and Erich Leinsdorf who will mark the orchestra's 90th anniversary at Symphony Hall this afternoon with three works from the original program.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003

OCT 25 1971 New England Newsclip

Exhibits, Concerts Revive Old Boston

Memories of Old Boston were rampant at Thursday evening's Museum of Fine Arts preview of "Boston Painters 1880-1930," at Friday morning's Stage Door Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Council of Friends and at Friday afternoon's 90th Birthday Symphony.

At the Museum, relatives of the artists in the current exhibition reminisced about the paintings. Mrs. Guido Perera chatted with Mrs. Isabella Grandin and John L. Grandin about the stunning portrait of her mother, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Sr., painted in 1919 by Edmund Tarbell.

Isabella, a very gracious lady and patron of the arts, has grown to look very much like her mother.

The young Tarbell grandsons of the artist and his daughter, Mrs. John L. Schaffer, came from New Castle, N. H. for the preview. Mrs. Schaffer is pictured in the 1935 painting, "Woman Mending a Glove."

Charles Hopkinson's "Family Group," painted by him at their Manchester, Mass. home in 1924, and loaned by his daughter, Mrs. Alfred Rive, was much admired.

Mrs. Alex Moffat (Sally DeCamp) answered questions about the portrait of her as a young girl, done by her father, Joseph Rodefer DeCamp, and loaned to the exhibition by the Worcester Art Museum.

Miss Harriette Blake of Westwood, who loaned the portrait of herself at the age of 14 painted by Lillian Westcott Hale in 1927, chatted with George Seybolt, president of the Museum, and Mrs. Seybolt. Mrs William Shurcliff, daughter of artist Hopkinson, reminisced with Perry Rathbone about some of her father's self portraits.

The exhibition of more than 60 paintings by artists working in Boston at the turn of the century continues through Nov. 28.

★

Convivial Harry Ellis Dickson, who is first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops and Esplanade Orchestra and conductor of the youth concerts, in addition to being an author and world traveler, opened the season's Stage Door Lecture series Friday morning.

His opening remark about the day being the 90th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led into anecdotes about its early days. He had done a wealth of research on the subject and revealed that the Symphony players of that day received $3 for each rehearsal and $6 for each concert.

Those were the days when admission to the concerts was 75, 50 or 25 cents and concert-goers lined up at 6 a. m. to buy tickets.

Harry complimented the Council of Friends of the BSO on their dedication to the orchestra and said he believed that there was no other orchestra in the country that had such benefactors.

Philip K. Allen, first vice president of the BSO, added a note of joy to the occasion when he announced that a subscriber to the first Boston Symphony concert on Saturday, Oct. 22, 1881, in Boston Music Hall, was Margaret Ruthven Lang, now 104 years old and living in a local Nursing Home.

Miss Lang, whose father was a music conductor, had marked the birthday observance by sending a check for $50 to the Orchestra Fund.

South Shore and New Hampshire area members of the Council of Friends were hosts for the gala morning and box luncheon party. The group included Mrs. Fairfield Raymond, Mrs. Charles R. Prichard, Mrs. Lawrence Slanetz, Mrs. Priscilla Phenix, Mrs. Kewis W. Kane, Mrs. J. Dante Brebbia and Mrs. Stephen Ames.

HAIRENIK
(ANGLO ARMENIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.

NOV 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Chookasian Had Leinsdorf as Accompanist

BOSTON, Mass.—Contralto Lili Chookasian made the 90th anniversary concert (Oct. 22) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an especially memorable one with her singing of two Brahms arias, in which she was accompanied by conductor Erich Leinsdorf and violist Burton Fine.

Only rarely does Leinsdorf display publicly his pianistic skills, but he insisted, as a special tribute to the Chookasian artistry, in performing the accompanist chore.

The Oct. 23 issue of the Boston Herald Traveler said, "Miss Chookasian was in resplendent voice, but even more impressive than her sheer total beauty were her exquisite molding of long phrases and her vivid projection of textual values . . ."

She also sang arias from the works of Bruch and Gluck.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

OCT 23 1971 New England Newsclip

The BSO 90 years later—Leinsdorf conducts

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Ninety years ago yesterday in the Tremont Street Music Hall, the Boston Symphony gave its first concert, and the orchestra yesterday afternoon paid attention to the anniversary by playing again some of the music of that first program, Weber's Festival Overture, a scene from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," and "Che faro senza Euridice" from Gluck's "Orpheus," were brought back; Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" Overture, a Haydn symphony, and some of the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" were not. Heard yesterday but not in 1881 were Brahms's two songs for alto with viola and piano, Op. 91, and music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, then respectively three and 54 years from being written. Erich Leinsdorf conducted, the soloists were Lili Chookasian and Burton Fine, which information was given in 1881 typeface opposite a reproduction of the original program.

The Bruch, sung 90 years ago by Annie Louise Cary and conducted by George Henschel, reappeared on Boston Symphony programs in 1930, when Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist and Henschel, by then 80 years old and knighted, again conducted. The scene performed then and yesterday is called "Penelope's mourning," and it is perhaps the strongest part of a long cantata for several soloists and orchestra on scenes from "The Odyssey."

All that survives of Bruch in repertory in the G minor Violin concerto, wrongly looked down as a schmaltz piece fit only for the Pops, the "Kol Nideri," and just marginally the "Scottish Fantasy." He deserves better, though, and especially his choral music is often strong and imaginative. Certainly the recitative and prayer for Penelope is nobly eloquent as well as gorgeously scored, and it produced an astonished ovation.

Of course Lili Chookasian's delivery had a lot to do with that. She is a sumptuous-voiced, musical, understanding singer, and apart from a leaning toward sacrificing sharp articulation of words in the interests of an admittedly remarkable legato, her singing was exemplary. I found it admirable in Gluck and Brahms, too, though those lovely viola songs were too intimate for the hall — it was a though they never quite got off the stage — and in any event they suffered rather from Erich Leinsdorf's underinflected piano playing.

The Weber Overture, festive, fairly impersonal, and both warm and brilliant in sound, ends with the tune Weber knew as "Heil dir im Siegerkranz" and which to us is "America." The audience here 90 years ago recognized it as "God save the Queen" and rose "from a universal sentiment of respect to Her Majesty and the mother country." Yesterday, they only applauded when it was over. I am sure, by the way, that Brahms got the idea for the approach to and scoring of "Gaudeamus igitur" in the Academic Festival Overture from this piece. The performance, whose Adagio introduction was produced with incredible, organ-like legato, was a good one — with instant return, too, to the less robust sonority of the Leinsdorf years — though I could not see any need, except Leinsdorfian nervous discontent, for the cut near the start of the recapitulation and the retouching of the kettledrum parts.

The Brokofiev is repeated tonight; the Weber, Bruch, Gluck, and Brahms are, however, replaced by Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Eastern edition Friday, October 29, 1971

Boston Symphony marks its 90th year

Boston

It was exactly 90 years ago Oct. 22 that 67 musicians, under the direction of Georg Henschel, started the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its distinguished career in the city's now vanished Music Hall. The soloist (whose 39th birthday it was, incidentally) was the renowned contralto, Annie Louise Cary, who had gone from Wayne, Maine, to a distinguished operatic and concert career in Europe, Russia, and the United States. The audience was reported to have been large, fashionable, and enthusiastic, and the Boston press didn't neglect to commend "Major" Henry Lee Higginson, whose "liberality made the venture a possibility."

The "venture" having taken on a certain air of permanence, the Boston Symphony (now 106 members) marked its 90th anniversary last Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall with its former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, on the podium, and mezzo-soprano Lili Chookasian of the Metropolitan Opera as soloist. Reaching back to the BSO's first program, the orchestra played Weber's Festival Overture ("Jubel-Ouvertüre in E"), and Miss Chookasian repeated Miss Cary's original choices — a Scena, "Penelope's Mourning," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," and "Che farò" from Gluck's "Orpheus." In 1881, Mr. Henschel had accompanied some singers at the piano during concerts, so Mr. Leinsdorf played for his soloist as she sang two Brahms songs, with first violist Burton Fine also accompanying.

L. Sn.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 26 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO 90th, and songs of Souzay

By Louis Snyder

Exactly 90 years ago Oct. 22, 67 musicians, under the direction of Georg Henschel, started the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its distinguished career in the city's now vanished Music Hall. The soloist (whose 39th birthday it was, coincidentally) was the renowned and beloved contralto, Annie Louise Cary, whose brilliant 20-year career in opera and concert had taken her from her birthplace in Wayne, Maine, to Europe, Russia, and throughout the United States during the middle 1800's. The audience was reported to have been large, fashionable, and enthusiastic ("an oratorio audience" wrote the Boston Transcript admiringly), and none of the Boston press neglected to commend "Major" Henry Lee Higginson, whose "liberality made the venture a possibility."

The "venture" having taken on a certain air of permanence, the Boston Symphony (now 106 members) marked its 90th anniversary last Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall with its former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, on the podium, and mezzo-soprano Lili Chookasian of the Metropolitan Opera, and BSO first violist Burton Fine, as soloists.

Reaching back to the orchestra's first program, Mr. Leinsdorf chose for this occasion Weber's Festival Overture ("Jubel-Ouvertüre in E"), and for Miss Chookasian, Miss Cary's original choices—a Scena, "Penelope's Mourning" from Max Bruch's cantata, "Odysseus," and "Che farò senza Euridice" from Gluck's "Orpheus." During that first season, Mr. Henschel had also accompanied vocal soloists on the piano at regular concerts, so Mr. Leinsdorf, to recapture some of the 1881-82 flavor did the same, joining Miss Chookasian and Mr. Fine in two of Brahms's songs—"Gestillte Sehnsucht" ("Longing stilled"), and "Geistliches Wiegenlied" ("Lullaby for the Christ Child")—for contralto and viola.

There were no speeches, but instrumentalists, conductor, and soloists were all particularly eloquent in conveying the significance of the occasion as reaffirmation of an historic achievement, and recalling the orchestra's genesis under circumstances which still induce neither indulgence nor apology, as much as admiring congratulations.

The Festival Overture is unabashed, all-embracing Weber at his most exuberant (the public ear seems ready for him again at last); the two arias, with Miss Chookasian in exceptionally fine voice, established contact very effectively with that earlier day (the Bruch recitative and prayer, incidentally, as a florid vocal-orchestral tour de force has stood the 90-year test rather well), and the three-way interlude with contralto-conductor-and-viola (Mr. Fine) was a pleasant, seriously executed diversion.

After intermission, Mr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra in his own two-part arrangement of music from Prokofiev's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." It was, of course, a 20th-century vehicle to display the present splendors of the BSO as a whole, as well as the familiar excellences of its soloists and its sections at their best. On Friday, they lived up to all expectations—it is no charity to say that the occasion was fulfilled even to the highest hopes of the sentimentalists. And the "venture" gives every evidence of continuing, with proper sustenance.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003

OCT 25 1971 New England Newscli

Exhibits, Concerts Revive Old Boston

Memories of Old Boston were rampant at Thursday evening's Museum of Fine Arts preview of "Boston Painters 1880-1930," at Friday morning's Stage Door Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Council of Friends and at Friday afternoon's 90th Birthday Symphony.

At the Museum, relatives of the artists in the current exhibition reminisced about the paintings. Mrs. Guido Perera chatted with Mrs. Isabella Grandin and John L. Grandin about the stunning portrait of her mother, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Sr., painted in 1919 by Edmund Tarbell.

Isabella, a very gracious lady and patron of the arts, has grown to look very much like her mother.

The young Tarbell grandsons of the artist and his daughter, Mrs. John L. Schaffer, came from New Castle, N. H. for the preview. Mrs. Schaffer is pictured in the 1935 painting, "Woman Mending a Glove."

Charles Hopkinson's "Family Group," painted by him at their Manchester, Mass. home in 1924, and loaned by his daughter, Mrs. Alfred Rive, was much admired.

Mrs. Alex Moffat (Sally DeCamp) answered questions about the portrait of her as a young girl, done by her father, Joseph Rodefer DeCamp, and loaned to the exhibition by the Worcester Art Museum.

Miss Harriette Blake of Westwood, who loaned the portrait of herself at the age of 14 painted by Lillian Westcott Hale in 1927, chatted with George Seybolt, president of the Museum, and Mrs. Seybolt. Mrs William Shurcliff, daughter of artist Hopkinson, reminisced with Perry Rathbone about some of her father's self portraits.

The exhibition of more than 60 paintings by artists working in Boston at the turn of the century continues through Nov. 28.

★

Convivial Harry Ellis Dickson, who is first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops and Esplanade Orchestra and conductor of the youth concerts in addition to being an author and world traveler, opened the season's Stage Door Lecture series Friday morning.

His opening remark about the day being the 90th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led into anecdotes about its early days. He had done a wealth of research on the subject and revealed that the Symphony players of that day received $3 for each rehearsal and $6 for each concert.

Those were the days when admission to the concerts was 75, 50 or 25 cents and concert-goers lined up at 6 a. m. to buy tickets.

Harry complimented the Council of Friends of the BSO on their dedication to the orchestra and said he believed that there was no other orchestra in the country that had such benefactors.

Philip K. Allen, first vice president of the BSO, added a note of joy to the occasion when he announced that a subscriber to the first Boston Symphony concert on Saturday, Oct. 22, 1881, in Boston Music Hall, was Margaret Ruthven Lang, now 104 years old and living in a local Nursing Home.

Miss Lang, whose father was a music conductor, had marked the birthday observance by sending a check for $50 to the Orchestra Fund.

South Shore and New Hampshire area members of the Council of Friends were hosts for the gala morning and box luncheon party. The group included Mrs. Fairfield Raymond, Mrs. Charles R. Prichard, Mrs. Lawrence Slanetz, Mrs. Priscilla Phenix, Mrs. Kewis W. Kane, Mrs. J. Dante Brebbia and Mrs. Stephen Ames.

HAIRENIK
(ANGLO ARMENIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.

NOV 11 1971 New England Newscli

Chookasian Had Leinsdorf as Accompanist

BOSTON, Mass.—Contralto Lili Chookasian made the 90th anniversary concert (Oct. 22) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an especially memorable one with her singing of two Brahms arias, in which she was accompanied by conductor Erich Leinsdorf and violist Burton Fine.

Only rarely does Leinsdorf display publicly his pianistic skills, but he insisted, as a special tribute to the Chookasian artistry, in performing the accompanist chore.

The Oct. 23 issue of the Boston Herald Traveler said, "Miss Chookasian was in resplendent voice, but even more impressive than her sheer total beauty were her exquisite molding of long phrases and her vivid projection of textual values . . ."

She also sang arias from the works of Bruch and Gluck.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

OCT 23 1971 New England Newscli

The BSO 90 years later—Leinsdorf conducts

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Ninety years ago yesterday in the Tremont Street Music Hall, the Boston Symphony gave its first concert, and the orchestra yesterday afternoon paid attention to the anniversary by playing again some of the music of that first program, Weber's Festival Overture, a scene from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," and "Che faro senza Euridice" from Gluck's "Orpheus," were brought back; Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" Overture, a Haydn symphony, and some of the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" were not. Heard yesterday but not in 1881 were Brahms's two songs for alto with viola and piano, Op. 91, and music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, then respectively three and 54 years from being written. Erich Leinsdorf conducted, the soloists were Lili Chookasian and Burton Fine, which information was given in 1881 typeface opposite a reproduction of the original program.

The Bruch, sung 90 years ago by Annie Louise Cary and conducted by George Henschel, reappeared on Boston Symphony programs in 1930, when Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist and Henschel, by then 80 years old and knighted, again conducted. The scene performed then and yesterday is called "Penelope's Mourning," and it is perhaps the strongest part of a long cantata for several soloists and orchestra on scenes from "The Odyssey."

All that survives of Bruch in repertory in the G minor Violin concerto, wrongly looked down as a schmaltz piece fit only for the Pops, the "Kol Nideri," and just marginally the "Scottish Fantasy." He deserves better, though, and especially his choral music is often strong and imaginative. Certainly the recitative and prayer for Penelope is nobly eloquent as well as gorgeously scored, and it produced an astonished ovation.

Of course Lili Chookasian's delivery had a lot to do with that. She is a sumptuous-voiced, musical, understanding singer, and apart from a leaning toward sacrificing sharp articulation of words in the interests of an admittedly remarkable legato, her singing was exemplary. I found it admirable in Gluck and Brahms, too, though those lovely viola songs were too intimate for the hall — it was a though they never quite got off the stage — and in any event they suffered rather from Erich Leinsdorf's underinflected piano playing.

The Weber Overture, festive, fairly impersonal, and both warm and brilliant in sound, ends with the tune Weber knew as "Heil dir im Siegerkranz" and which to us is "America." The audience here 90 years ago recognized it as "God save the Queen" and rose "from a universal sentiment of respect to Her Majesty and the mother country." Yesterday, they only applauded when it was over. I am sure, by the way, that Brahms got the idea for the approach to and scoring of "Gaudeamus igitur" in the Academic Festival Overture from this piece. The performance, whose Adagio introduction was produced with incredible, organ-like legato, was a good one — with instant return, too, to the less robust sonority of the Leinsdorf years — though I could not see any need, except Leinsdorfian nervous discontent, for the cut near the start of the recapitulation and the retouching of the kettledrum parts.

The Brokofiev is repeated tonight; the Weber, Bruch, Gluck, and Brahms are, however, replaced by Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 26 1971 New England Newscli

BSO 90th, and songs of Souzay

By Louis Snyder

Exactly 90 years ago Oct. 22, 67 musicians, under the direction of Georg Henschel, started the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its distinguished career in the city's now vanished Music Hall. The soloist (whose 39th birthday it was, coincidentally) was the renowned and beloved contralto, Annie Louise Cary, whose brilliant 20-year career in opera and concert had taken her from her birthplace in Wayne, Maine, to Europe, Russia, and throughout the United States during the middle 1800's. The audience was reported to have been large, fashionable, and enthusiastic ("an oratorio audience" wrote the Boston Transcript admiringly), and none of the Boston press neglected to commend "Major" Henry Lee Higginson, whose "liberality made the venture a possibility."

The "venture" having taken on a certain air of permanence, the Boston Symphony (now 106 members) marked its 90th anniversary last Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall with its former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, on the podium, and mezzo-soprano Lili Chookasian of the Metropolitan Opera, and BSO first violist Burton Fine, as soloists.

Reaching back to the orchestra's first program, Mr. Leinsdorf chose for this occasion Weber's Festival Overture ("Jubel-Ouvertüre in E"), and for Miss Chookasian, Miss Cary's original choices—a Scena, "Penelope's Mourning" from Max Bruch's cantata, "Odysseus," and "Che farò senza Euridice" from Gluck's "Orpheus." During that first season, Mr. Henschel had also accompanied vocal soloists on the piano at regular concerts, so Mr. Leinsdorf, to recapture some of the 1881-82 flavor did the same, joining Miss Chookasian and Mr. Fine in two of Brahms's songs—"Gestillte Sehnsucht" ("Longing stilled"), and "Geistliches Wiegenlied" ("Lullaby for the Christ Child")—for contralto and viola.

There were no speeches, but instrumentalists, conductor, and soloists were all particularly eloquent in conveying the significance of the occasion as reaffirmation of an historic achievement, and recalling the orchestra's genesis under circumstances which still induce neither indulgence nor apology, as much as admiring congratulations.

The Festival Overture is unabashed, all-embracing Weber at his most exuberant (the public ear seems ready for him again at last); the two arias, with Miss Chookasian in exceptionally fine voice, established contact very effectively with that earlier day (the Bruch recitative and prayer, incidentally, as a florid vocal-orchestral tour de force has stood the 90-year test rather well), and the three-way interlude with contralto-conductor-and-viola (Mr. Fine) was a pleasant, seriously executed diversion.

After intermission, Mr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra in his own two-part arrangement of music from Prokofiev's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." It was, of course, a 20th-century vehicle to display the present splendors of the BSO as a whole, as well as the familiar excellences of its soloists and its sections at their best. On Friday, they lived up to all expectations—it is no charity to say that the occasion was fulfilled even to the highest hopes of the sentimentalists. And the "venture" gives every evidence of continuing, with proper sustenance.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Eastern edition Friday, October 29, 1971

Boston Symphony marks its 90th year

Boston

It was exactly 90 years ago Oct. 22 that 67 musicians, under the direction of Georg Henschel, started the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its distinguished career in the city's now vanished Music Hall. The soloist (whose 39th birthday it was, incidentally) was the renowned contralto, Annie Louise Cary, who had gone from Wayne, Maine, to a distinguished operatic and concert career in Europe, Russia, and the United States. The audience was reported to have been large, fashionable, and enthusiastic, and the Boston press didn't neglect to commend "Major" Henry Lee Higginson, whose "liberality made the venture a possibility."

The "venture" having taken on a certain air of permanence, the Boston Symphony (now 106 members) marked its 90th anniversary last Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall with its former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, on the podium, and mezzo-soprano Lili Chookasian of the Metropolitan Opera as soloist. Reaching back to the BSO's first program, the orchestra played Weber's Festival Overture ("Jubel-Ouvertüre in E"), and Miss Chookasian repeated Miss Cary's original choices — a Scena, "Penelope's Mourning," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," and "Che farò" from Gluck's "Orpheus." In 1881, Mr. Henschel had accompanied some singers at the piano during concerts, so Mr. Leinsdorf played for his soloist as she sang two Brahms songs, with first violist Burton Fine also accompanying.

L. Sn.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

DEC 31 1971 New England Newsclip

Where but New England?

by Francis W. Hatch

First complete performance of Franz Liszt's "Hexameron" for six pianos and orchestra was given Friday eveningOct. 8, 1971, in Symphony Hall as part of the first concert of Michael Tilson Thomas' Spectrum Concert series. Pianists were Raymond Lewenthal as Liszt, Gilbert Kalish as Thalberg, Marilyn Neeley as Pixis, John Atkins as Herz, Ilana Vered as Czerny and Antonio Barbosa as Chopin.

A letter full of the quality of music

Letters written on behalf of charitable and cultural institutions are often dull, pedestrian, and sometimes pedantic. (I have had to write my share of them.)

When one comes across your desk that is provocative, intelligent and sometimes amusing, it is a breath of fresh air.

One such came to me recently from Talcott M. Banks, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Banks is a lawyer. Oftentimes lawyers write in long and tedious sentences which they employ in briefs for the court. No so in this case. Obviously someone at Williamstown taught young Talcott to write.

In this case he is describing the new Sectrum Concerts on which the staid old B.S.O. imagine a Nocturno by Mozart which requires four separate orchestras, each with its own conductor, and all responsible to Michael Tilson Thomas as supreme quarterback on the central podium.

Fancy listening to a piece by Liszt called an "Hexametron" which calls for six pianos backed by the orchestra. I thought the last time anything like that happened was in a Hasty Pudding show where I manned one of six uprights in a scene in a Russian stable where the instruments were hidden behind feed boxes with only the keybords exposed.

And now read Banks' philosphy behind it all in his Sept. 22, 1971 letter.

"To all Trustees and Overseers:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a new departure - and thereby hangs a tale.

"A year or so ago our trustee Mrs. James H. Perkins asked in a Board meeting some pertinent questions, to which no one had any answers. As is customary in such affairs she was promptly appointed chairman of a committee, named "Concert Activities Committee," and at her request the committee was composed of players, trustees, overseers, management members, and its meetings attended when possible by our Music Director, Mr. Steinberg, and our Associate Conductor, Mr. Thomas.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"From these meetings, with increasing understanding of what was needed and sought, and mounting enthusiasm of all participants, came the new series of concerts recently announced, the "Spectrum Concerts," which will be conducted by Mr. Thomas in Symphony Hall on October 8 and 9, 1971, January 7 and 8, March 31 and April 1, 1972, and of which the programs are given in the enclosed flyer.

"We are marvelously blessed in Boston, not only by having one of the finest symphony orchestras in the history of music but also by having as an audience for its concerts as enterprising, discerning and independent a group - of all ages - as can be found in any musical center on earth.

"Other audiences - in whatever country - are all too often irrevocably fixed in traditional patterns, and as their preferences are served the inevitable progression of life passes them by. No so in Boston.

"Like most of you, I was brought up on and am most easy and reflective with Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms and 15 or 20 other composers whom you can name as well as I. But some years ago the doubt came unbidden whether I might not be missing a great deal - that is very important and very lovely - in the many centuries which lie on either side of the 18th and 19th centuries that have given us most of the music we all know. Now I am certain that this is true.

"Most of the works in the 'Spectrum Concert' programs are unfamiliar to me - good! I am reminded of the story of the Catholic priest who at the age of 85, started around the world, and when asked why, at that time, he was undertaking so adventurous a journey replied: "When I meet my Lord, and he asks 'What do you think of my world?' - should I reply, 'Lord, I have not seen your world!'" In our world of music no member of our Boston audiences should have to make such an humiliating response to a similarly august inquiry.

"I expect to hear every 'Spectrum Series' program, and to find in them new insights into this endlessly fascinating art, new dimensions, and new beauties of which I have been unaware. I urge you all to share this revealing experience in the life of our superlative orchestra, and to bring with you your children and grandchildren, their friends, your parents and their friends - for this is Boston.

TALCOTT M. BANK

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 165,925

MAY 14 1972 New England Newsclip

T. H. Parker —

Tonight's Program . . .

It was back in October that Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, gave the first of what he called Spectrum concerts, and the program itself bore the further title of Multiples.

The works performed made the meaning of Multiples obvious enough. There was Mozart's Notturno in D for Four Orchestras, Steve Reich's work for Four Organs and Maracas, and Liszt's Hexameron for Six Pianos. By a little forcing there was also Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, but this seemed a bit mousey compared to the extravagant numerical fantasy of the other pieces.

I did not hear the October performance, but last week it was given via tape on the radio and I did catch part of the broadcast. On the whole it did not seem so striking as imagination had pictured it. But once again I envied audiences whose happy lot it is to listen to new musical fare and experiences even when whimsey has to be its own reward. It was the inventiveness of Mr. Thomas' program-making that really counted as I could well attest from counter-experience.

It put me in mind again of what an official of Broadcast Music, Incorporated, said last year in a foreword to the annual survey of symphony programs BMI makes with the American Symphony Orchestra League:

"Although one can observe some changes in the general make-up of symphony programs, one dreary fact remains — the rut which programmers have gotten into is still appallingly deep.

"Basically our programs seem to suffer from an overdose of ancestor-worship, and the situation as it stands has only one consolation — the fact that the condition of opera is worse."

Actually, it isn't the ancestor-worship, the performance of composers generally described as traditional, standard or classic, that is melancholy. It's that we have to listen to a comparative handful of their works done over and over again ad nauseam.

As I have said before on the painful subject, making up programs for a symphony orchestra can hardly be an easy task. The conductor and the program committee cannot dwell in the rarefied realm of purely musical considerations. Programs also have to be tailored to audiences who, whether they know anything about music, can generally be trusted to know what they like, and to like what they know, and be rather insistent on getting it.

And in the offing there are those hard-headed persons entrusted with the orchestra's economic affairs. In these days of tight money, their job is an increasingly tough one. Musicians may count notes, but they have to count heads. In their dreams, the specter of buffalo grazing in the back rows of the hall is a constant nightmare.

Nevertheless, I still feel that symphony programs are often aimed unnecessarily at what might be called the lowest common denominator. Works are chosen for their familiarity on the theory that familiarity breeds content. Thus we get a bushel basket of chestnuts, a stable of warhorses, or any other familiar cliche you like.

There is of course an apparent awareness that some of the audience may weary of the same old fare. But the way program makers get around this is to have a new bunch of soloists to do those same old works. This is a distinction without a difference. It is nice to know that some "Young American artist, winner of the So-and-So Award" is getting his chance, but it does not advance the experience of an audience very much.

As a matter of fact, and as I have often said before, I think the receptiveness of audiences is greater than some hesitant program-makers believe. Right here in Hartford, symphony patrons have listened to some pretty adventurous music, or at least some pretty unfamiliar music, without going out to the box office and demanding their money back. I think it would be unhappy if such experience were curtailed. On the contrary I have an uneasy suspicion that trite programs can drive customers out of the hall quite as readily as bizarre programs are thought to do.

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

DEC 31 1971 New England

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

DEC 31 1971 New England

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

DEC 31 1971 New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
P. 261,842 SUN.
OCT 9 1971
New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

BSO keeps a promise

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

"Two series of really different concerts" is what the Boston Symphony promised its new Spectrum Concerts would be, and what was delivered when Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the first Spectrum program in Symphony Hall last evening was in lots of ways "really different." The program was built about the idea of multiples, and it included Mozart's Notturno in D for four orchestras, Bartok's antiphonal Music for strings, percussion, and celesta, the first Boston performance of "Four organs" by Steve Reich, and the first performance ever of the original version for six pianos and orchestra of "Hexameron," a set of variations organized and in part composed by Liszt, with contributions as well by Thalberg, Pixis, Herz, Czerny, and Chopin.

There was some difference in packaging, too. Thomas spoke informally to the audience before each piece, which nicely served to make contact, but which need not have been done at such length. Having promised surprises, he provided one in the form of an unscheduled performance of a Gabrieli canzona for two brass choirs (one in each balcony).

Steve Reich's "Four Organs" got boos and bravos. It is a tour de force: against an unvaried, fairly quick beat from a quartet of maracas, four electric rock organs play one chord. First it comes just as a plain, short chord; then single notes of it anticipate its arrival to create an upbeat; later the chords are longer and the upbeats get longer, too, as well as more elaborate, with great espressivo leanings, just as though "Four Organs" were the great-grandchild of the Mahler Ninth. And there is the possibility of the four organs' doubling, tripling, quadrupling one or more notes for varying durations. Reich, in other words, works deliberately and astoundingly restricted means, just one chord and just one sonority, but within the space he has left himself, he chooses fastidiously and fascinatingly. It is a bit as though someone were to show you that with just six beans on a plate (one each of kidney, lima, black, white, navy and pinto) it is possible to make far more patterns and play far more games than you would have supposed, and you can tell the story of the piece in two ways: one, that the choices make a difference and are interesting even though they have to be made among so few possibilities, the other, that no amount of sophistication of choice and rearrangement can compensate for the monotony of just those six beans. I must say that I liked watching Reich choose, that I liked finding out that little changes (the disappearance of just one note from one instrument for a couple of seconds) can make such telling differences. It is a most limited piece and, I would guess, hardly likely to grow on one, but I also found it a very engaging sort of ear-sharpener. The organists were the composer, Michael Thomas, Newton Wayland and Ayrton Pinto.

The idea of "Hexameron" is more entertaining than the piece itself. Chopin's slow variation is lovely and some of Liszt's growly rhetoric is imposing, but a lot of the music is just empty-headed, often quite noisy, dashing about. The pianists were Raymond Lewenthal (Liszt), Gilbert Kalish (Thalberg), Marilyn Neeley (Pixis), Ilana Vered (Herz), John Atkins (Czerny), and Antonio Barbosa (Chopin). Barbosa is a poetic, sensitive player, but the performance, though certainly competent, on the whole lacked that swashbuckling extra bit, that sense of infinite technical ease and that aggressive assertion of personality, that must have been posited in Liszt's spectacular idea of assembling for one performance the six greatest pianists of the day.

Mozart's amusing and ingenious echo game was pleasantly performed, with Arthur Fiedler conducting band No. 2 in the back corner of the stage, and groups 3 and 4 in upstairs corridors, with Joseph Silverstein and Harry Ellis Dickson as their conductors. Bartok's great work, the one point of the concert that offered music of really dense content, got a performance unusually impressive both in its intensity and lucidness.

BOSTON, MASS.
W. 72,001
OCT 25 1971

Mozart, Bartok, Reich

Boston Sunday Globe

BY RICHARD BUELL

On Friday afternoons, Symphony Hall strongly resembles a rather ornate nursing home; at other times, the clientele, though hardly so enfeebled or genteel, is middle-aged, suburban and irritably somnolent. Small wonder the Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken heed of the curve on the demographic chart, and addresses itself now to Youth.

Accordingly, we have the new Spectrum series of "really different concerts," as the ads put it. These are the issue of the BSO's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, who, at 26, is a mere slip of a thing in an old man's profession. The intention is to present music that is interesting, untraditional, diverse, unlikely and/or impossible but at non-exorbitant ticket prices.

The opening concerts centered on the idea of multiples, or musical forces in odd couplings and recombinations. The pieces played were Mozart's Serenade in D, K. 286, for four orchestras; Bartok's Music for strings, percussion and celesta; Steve Reich's Four Organs; and, in its first performance anywhere, Liszt's Hexameron for six pianos and orchestra. At the very least, it was a triumph of logistics.

Thomas provided informal introductions to each piece in an agreeable Bernstein-avuncular manner, and was one of the executants in the shocker of the evening, Steve Reich's Four Organs. Written for a quartet of Farfisa Fast-3s and a quartet of maracas, this "gradual process" (the composer's description) consists of a single chord from the organs and a steady rain dance beat from the maracas. The gradualness is in the lengthening of that one chord and in the minute varyings of emphasis or reinforcement from among the four keyboards. Also, perhaps, in the listener's surrender to the hypnotic monotony of it all. A number of analogies are possible. It might be likened to a piece of sculpture that stays or does not stay "the same" as the viewer walks around it, observing shadow and perspective. Or to a beam of light broken down into its components and reassembled.

But what a cleansing psycho-acoustical event this bath of sound was! To these ears it pointed out, by immediate contrast, the variety and disorganization of pitches in something so familiar as the sound of applause. Very wet and pointillist this applause was, and interspersed with hollow and subterranean-seeming boos. Myself I realized had aged twenty minutes; I intoned the sacred electronic syllable "Ohm." Besides Thomas and the organists were the composers, Newton Wayland and Ayrton Pinto.

Nonetheless, the real meat of the program was the Bartok, so beloved of heads for its glacial sonorities and cell-division sound procedures. It's also a piece that is rewarding to watch. The performance was understanding and decently subvirtuosic. The lycanthropous-Maria Ouspenskaya aspects were underplayed. There have never been crazier, more ethnic glisses.

With the help of Arthur Fiedler, Harry Ellis Dickson, Joseph Silverstein and closed-circuit television, Mozart's quadraphonic echo Serenade went smoothly everywhere — at opposite ends of the stage, and in upstairs corridors. It was remarkable enough that the Liszt-organized Hexameron, a Romantic gang-bang for six pianists and orchestra, went at all. This was an occasion for 60 fingers to fly over 528 piano keys, with an occasional bow-wow from the orchestra behind. The busy fingers belonged to soloists, Lewenthal, Kalish, Neeley, Vered, Atkins and Barbosa, and they made it less like the mammoth Century of Progress typewriter contest it might have been. But somehow it seemed unfair that the instruments were not off-white, translucent and lit from within by neon.

You get the idea: a series consecrated to experiment, excess and the banishment of stuffiness. January 7 and 8: two concerts in a Stravinsky retrospective. March 31-April 1: religiosity and high decibels.

Michael Tilson-Thomas in a soberer moment.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

SEP 19 1971

New England Newsclip

A new symphony season

Bos Sym

by Harry Neville

The end of the season at Tanglewood is normally a time at which critics feel free to pontificate about the past and future estates of the Boston Symphony. For that is the point at which announcements are generally made of the comings and goings of orchestral personnel, of programs for the coming season, and of attendance records for the summer season. All this information arrived on schedule this year, and yet the curious critic and would-be prognosticator was left without any very substantial basis for pontification.

Such considerations have not been known to deter critics, but speculators were left singularly empty-handed this year, and the reason for that was that the biggest news of the summer was the non-news. Most observers had expected the appointment of a new music director. To be quite a bit more specific, most observers had expected Colin Davis's appointment to that position. But the summer came and went, along with Davis's guest engagements at Tanglewood, and no announcement materialized.

Whether or not speculation about Davis is idle is something that few outsiders know for sure. In this crucially important matter the decision-makers at Symphony Hall are playing their cards very close to the chest. All that can be said is that if the trustees are in fact considering Davis for the position and if he is in fact available, then his choice would probably be the most generally satisfactory one possible. He is rapidly approaching the super-star category — important for the sale of recordings — and, more importantly, he is liked by the players, although it must be added that only God knows what will happen between an orchestra and its conductor once the honeymoon is over.

William Steinberg

There was indeed some tangible good news this summer. The players won a spectacular contractual pay increase ($50 weekly during the first year, $10 weekly during each of the two ensuing years), only to learn afterwards of the wage-freeze. Tanglewood attendance figures were up apporximately 8 per cent over the previous season's attendance for comparable events.

Attendance, of course, has little to do with anything but the incidence of good weather and stellar artists, and there was plenty of both this summer. Artistically, too, the musicians seemed to feel that this was a better than usual summer, and what mere critic would gainsay the musicians of the BSO?

There was also important news of comings and goings, and the most important news of this sort was of the retirement, after 25 years with the orchestra, of principal horn player James Stagliano. Stagliano has had an exceedingly distinguished career in Boston and with important orchestras in several other cities. Interestingly enough, the initial announcement of his departure came not from the BSO press office but from an outside news agency.

Coupled with it was the news (dare one call it a threat-) that he plans to write the definitive book on conductors. Nearly everyone who's ever left an orchestra has had the same idea, but no one has ever carried the plan through. One can only hope Stagliano delivers on his promise. Such a book — honestly written and with no holds barred — would be an immense service to the world of music, though I can't think of anything — the hardest cored pornography included — that would be more quickly banned in Boston.

Other departures are violinists Herman Silberman, John Korman and Christopher Kimber, cellist William Stokking and hornist Paul Keaney. New arrivals are violinists Darlene Gray, Harvey Seigel and Ronald Wilkison, cellist Jonathan Miller and trombonist Gordon Hallberg. Violist Yzhak Schotten will return to the orchestra after a season with the Japan Philharmonic as part of the exchange program with that orchestra, and violinist Hironaka Sugie returns to Japan after a year here on the same program.

Michael Tilson Thomas

Despite the loss of two horn players, only the principal player will be replaced since the section had one extra player to begin with. Stagliano's replacement has not yet been selected, but it is known that the trustees are out for "big bear," in a determined effort to improve the section. It is said that one of the world's greatest hornists was requested to audition for the position, but it is also reported that he declined the invitation.

As most subscribers know by this time, the Friday-Saturday series at Symphony Hall during the coming season has been reduced from 22 to 20 pairs of concerts, and the announced reason for the reduction was to provide greater programming flixibility. Some people greeted this news with skepticism when it was first announced, but the new series that has resulted from the change is certainly cause for rejoicing.

It is called "Spectrum Concerts" and it consists of two special series of three concerts each, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's associate conductor. To put it as simply as possible, the programming is one of the most refreshing things that has happened at Symphony Hall in a long, long time.

The first program, "A Multiples Concert," of each series takes place Oct. 8 and 9 and includes Mozart's "Notturno for Four Orchestras," K. 236, Bartok's "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta," Steve Reich's "Four Organs," and Liszt's "Hexameron for Six Pianos and Orchestra." The second concert of both series, "A Stravinsky Retrospective," will be in two parts. Part I on Jan. 7 includes "Symphonies of Wind Instruments," "Introitus," "Requiem Canticles" and "Rite of Spring." Part II on Jan. 8 includes "Scenes de Ballet," the Violin Concerto and "Symphony of Psalms."

The third pair of concerts, March 31 and April 1, is entitled "Four Religious Ceremonies" and includes Bach's "Christ lag in Totesbanden," David del Tredici's "Pot-pourri," des Prez' "Deploration on the Death of Gehan Okeghem" and Messiaen's "Et Expecto Ressurectionem Mortuorum."

Presumably, Spectrum Concerts will have a special appeal for young concert-goers and for those who no longer respond to the standard concert repertory. It's something of an experiment, perhaps, but it seems an important step in the direction of recapturing disaffected audiences. The orchestra trustees are the object of lots of complaining about the very things are handled at Symphony Hall, and sometimes the complaining is justified.

In this instance, however, they've allowed something truly brilliant and imaginative to happen, something that speaks well for the future of the orchestra, and something for which they deserve to be congratulated — along with Michael Tilson Thomas, of course, whose idea it was to begin with and who is, perhaps, not quite so much in need of reassurance as the much maligned trustees.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,254

SEP 21 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony is with us once more

By Louis Snyder

This is the week when the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 91st season, which will find it at home in Symphony Hall, on sporadic tours in New York, New England, Washington, D.C. (this year for the first time in Kennedy Center), and in March making a two-week trip to the Midwest.

During its regular Boston schedule there wil be 20 pairs of Friday-Saturday concerts, 10 in Tuesday series A, 6 in Tuesday B, 6 in Tuesday C (for Cambridge), 6 in Thursday A, 3 in Thursday B, which starts in January (an annual BSO Christmas gift suggestion), and the usual bargain 6 Thursday rehearsals. All are in the evening, except the Friday series.

New this year is the Spectrum series, of three Friday (A) and Saturday (B) concerts, to be presided over by associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. "A Multiples Concert," a Stravinsky Retrospective (in two parts, one for A and one for B), and "Four Religious Ceremonies" are the titles of these events, which promise something old and something new for the adventurous.

Conductors to be heard before the season ends on April 22 are music director William Steinberg, Mr. Thomas, Erich Leinsdorf, Aldo Ceccato (his Boston debut), Colin Davis, Leon Kirchner, Rafael Kubelik, Erich Kunzel, and Max Rudolf. First time or unfamiliar names among the soloists include pianists Alicia de Larrocha, Horacio Gutierrez; violinist Christiane Edinger; cellist Lawrence Lesser, and percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Act 2 of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," and Benjamin Lees' Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra are some of the promised novelties. In the opening concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Sept. 24 and 25, Mr. Steinberg will conduct and Miss Edinger will play the American premiere of Gottfried von Einem's Violin Concerto, first heard in 1970 in Vienna.

Christiane Edinger

. . . will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony in its season opening programs on Sept. 24, 25, 30, and Oct. 5, when she will be heard in the first performances in this country of Gottfried von Einem's Violin Concerto, under William Steinberg's direction.

Alicia de Larrocha

. . . is to appear with the Boston Symphony on Nov. 25, 26, 27, and 30 playing the Khachaturian Concerto with Erich Kunzel conducting. These concerts will mark the Spanish pianist's debut with the orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Aldo Ceccato

The young Italian conductor makes his debut with the Boston Symphony in concerts at Symphony Hall on Dec. 17 and 18, and in the Providence series on Dec. 16.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUN 2 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Posts Next Season

BOSTON — The 1971 - 72 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday - Saturday (Sept. 24-25. The season extends through April 22, 1972.

There will be 20 pairs of Friday - Saturday concerts this season instead of 22, in order to give the orchestra greater flexibility in planning two new special series soon to be announced.

As in the past, there will be the following other series: Tuesday "A" (10 concerts), Tuesday "B" (six concerts), Tuesday "Cambridge", (six concerts), Thursday "A" (six concerts), and Thursday "B" (three concerts).

Conductors for the 91st season include Music Director William Steinberg, Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa, former Boston Symphony Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, Aldo Ceccato, Colin Davis, Leon Kichner, Rafael Kubelik, Erich Kunzel and Max Rudolf.

Instrumental soloists include pianists Andre Watts, Alexis Weissenberg, Alicia de Larrocha, Christoph Eschenbach, Horacio Gutierrez, Misha Dichter, Stephen Bishop and Nicole Henriot - Schweitzer.

Other soloists include violinists Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Zino Francescatti, and Christiane Edinger; cellist Lawrence Lesser, Boston Symphony principal oboeist Ralph Gomberg; percussionist Stomi Yamash'ta.

Vocalists include Lili Chookasian, Eileen Farrell and James King.

Program highlights during the 1971-72 season include Erich Leinsdorf conducting a special Boston Symphony 90th birthday concert on Friday, October 22; the program will include music from the first Boston Symphony progam given on October 22, 1881. Other concerts include Music Director William Steinberg conducting Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," Act II of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde,'' Mahler's sixth symphony and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

MAY 30 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO programs for 1971-'72 previewed

BOSTON — The 1971-'72 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Sept. 24. The season extends through April 22, 1972. There will be 20 pairs of Friday-Saturday concerts this season instead of 22, in order to give the orchestra greater flexibility in planning two new special series soon to be announced. As in the past, there will be the following other series: Tuesday "A" (10 concerts), Tuesday "B" (6 concerts), Tuesday "Cambridge" (6 concerts), Thursday "A" (6 concerts), and Thursday "B" (3 concerts).

Conductors for the 91st season include Music Director William Steinberg, Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa, former Boston Symphony Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, Aldo Ceccato, Colin Davis, Leon Kirchmer, Rafael Kubelik, Erich Kunzel and Max Rudolf.

Instrumental soloists include pianists Andre Watts, Alexis Weissenberg, Alicia de Larrocha, Christoph Eschenbach, Horacio Gutierrez, Misha Dichter, Stephen Bishop and Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer.

Other soloists include violinsits Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Zino Francescatti, and Christiane Edinger; cellist Lawrence Lesser, Boston Symphony principal oboeist Ralph Gomberg; Percussionist Stomi Yamash'ta.

Vocalists include Lili Chookasian, Eileen Farrell and James King.

Program highlights during the 1971-72 season include Erich Leinsdorf conducting a special Boston Symphony 90th Birthday concert on Friday, Oct. 22; the program will include music from the first Boston Symphony program given on Oct. 22, 1881. Other concerts include Music Director William Steinberg conducting Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," Act II of Wagner's ''Tristan and Isolde," Mahler's sixth symphony and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

Steinberg also conducts Benjamin Lees' Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra, with the Boston Symphony String Quartet (Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello). Colin Davis conducts a performance of Mozart's "Requiem."

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUL 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Lists 20 Programs

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The 1971-72 season of the Boston Symphony opens Sept. 24 with a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, conducted by William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director. Violinist Christiane Edinger is soloist.

This coming season, the orchestra plays 20 pairs of Friday - Saturday programs. This is a reduction by two of last year's schedule of 22 pairs, and allows the orchestra to schedule a special new series of concerts to be conducted by its associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas.

Details of this series as well as programs for the orchestra's tours and its shorter series whose repertoire is drawn mainly from the Friday - Saturday series, will be announced shortly.

As usual, the Friday - Saturday programs are virtually identical. A notable exception occurs this year on Friday, Oct. 22, the orchestra's ninetieth anniversary, when former Music Director Erich Leinsdorf devotes the first half of the concert to music performed Oct. 22, 1881 at the orchestra's very first concert. The program opens with Weber's "Jubel - Ouverture," after which contralto Lili Chookasian joins Mr. Leinsdorf in a Scena from Bruch's "Odysseus" and arias and incidental music from Gluck's "Orfeo." The 1881 concert was conducted by the orchestra's first conductor, George Henschel, with his wife as soloist.

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
D. 33,737

JUN 11 1971 New Englan Newscl

The 1971-1972 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday and Saturday, Sept. 24 and 25. The season will extend through April 22.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,650

JUL 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony Announces Fall Schedule

LENOX, — The 1971-72 season of Boston Symphony opens September 24 with a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, conducted by William Steinberg, the Orchestra's Music Director. Violinist Christiane Edinger is soloist.

This coming season, the Orchestra plays twenty pairs of Friday-Saturday programs. This is a reduction by two of last year's schedule of twenty-two pairs, and allows the Orchestra to schedule a special new series of concerts to be conducted by its Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. Details of this series as well as programs for the Orchestra's tours and its shorter series whose repertoire is drawn mainly from the Friday-Saturday series, will be announced shortly.

As usual, the Friday-Saturday programs are virtually identical. A notable exception occurs this year on Friday, October 22, the Orchestra's Ninetieth Anniversary, when former Music Director Erich Leinsdorf devotes the first half of the concert to music performed October 22, 1881 at the Orchestra's very first concert. The program opens with Weber's Jubel-Ouverture, after which contralto Lili Chookasian joins Mr. Leinsdorf in a Scena from Bruch's Odysseus and arias and incidental music from Gluck's Orfeo. The 1881 concert was conducted by the Orchestra's first conductor, George Henschel, with his wife as soloist.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 27 1971

New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Oh, how times have changed at that most venerable of all Boston institutions — Symphony. Time was when the limousines stretched around the block and all down Massachusetts Avenue as they waited for their owners to emerge from Symphony Hall, and the chauffeurs formed a private Symphony club of their own to while away the two hours of waiting till the concert was over. Time was when no-one would dream of entering Symphony Hall on a Friday afternoon without spanking white gloves and the very best suit, even if some of the suits did look, in true Old Guard way, as if they had been around for quite some time.

Last Friday afternoon the 1971-72 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened for the 91st time and they were all there, Boston's leading citizens, back in their familiar seats that in most cases are considered a family possession. It was all so familiar and unchanged and yet in a way a totally different scene than that of even a few years back. The audience was the same; the orchestra was the same, yet the look had changed and one wondered why until suddenly it became obvious — no hats.

Opening day of Symphony used to be a fashion parade of the latest fall millinery — so much so it was rumored that subscribers came to see their seat companions' latest fashion purchase as much as to hear the music. The hall, viewed from the balcony, was a sea of color with not a bare head in sight, and no subscriber would have dreamed of passing through the portals of the venerable old building without proper hat and gloves.

Friday's scene was very different, and one guaranteed, it is sure, to break the heart of any milliner. By actual count six hats came through the doors from Massachusetts Avenue among the hundreds of bare heads who poured in during the 15 minutes before concert time. There was a golden velvet cloche, a helmet of blue velvet, the inevitable black bow with a veil attached, a feathered cap, an amazing pink candy-looking affair that had a touch of the Middle East to it, and a green off-the-face model that must have been the original of the Boston dowager's remark in Cleveland Amory's book "The Proper Bostonians" when she said "We have our hats"!

The limousines have shrunk, too, to a mere two or three, and those one suspects mostly hired for the occasion. Some long time Symphony-goers, like Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck of Brookline, who was just back from a summer spent at North East Harbor, came in their own chauffeur-driven cars, but in these days it's the subway or a shared taxi that sees most of the transportation to and from the Friday afternoon ritual.

One aspect, though, never changes and that is the orchestra and the audience's feelings of affection and respect for it. On Friday as Conductor Steinberg approached the podium the entire hall rose as one and applauded this man who seems effortlessly to head two orchestras at the same time, those of Boston and of Pittsburgh.

It was "old home week" in the corridors surrounding the hall as friends met friends again after the long summer away at the shore or the mountains. Mrs. Francis de Marneffe was telling the friends she met about the upcoming gourmet cooking class she is holding at her house in Cambridge for the benefit of McLean's Hospital. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, back from New Hampshire, was delighted with the plans the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have for the coming season, and Mrs. Asa Phillips, tanned after a summer at Seal Harbor, said they had had the best possible summer up there in Maine.

Others glimpsed among the filled-to-capacity audience were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Harold Blanchard, Mrs. Robert Clasby of Wellesley, Mrs. Hollis Gleason of Cohasset, Mr. Charles Bartlett of Dedham and Mrs. George Wile of Newton.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

SEP 30 1971

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

SEP 30 1971

New England Newsclip

Avis may be "No. 1," and Hertz may "put you in the driver's seat," but Mrs. John C. Haartz of Upland Field rd., Lincoln was number one in the passenger's seat this week as Gray Line bus company initiated a series of concert tours for interested groups such as "Friends of the Symphony." Mrs. Haartz was the only person to show up at the first stop on the route Friday at 12:30 p.m. in front of the Unitarian Church in Concord as bus driver Fred McFatter welcomed her aboard the tour.

Bus Schedule for Symphony Friends

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has arranged for bus travel to symphony events from the Minute-man area. The bus service makes stops in Concord, Lincoln, Lexington, Arlington and Belmont.

The pickup points in these towns are, as follows:

Concord, Unitarian Church; Lincoln, railroad station; Lexington, town hall; Arlington, MBTA station in heights, and Belmont, in front of Filene's.

The following is the temporary schedule:

Sept. 30 (Thursday A series) - Concord, 7 p.m.; Lexington, 7:10; Arlington, 7:20 and Belmont, 7:45;

Oct. 1 (Friday series) - Concord, 12:35 p.m.; Lexington, 12:50;

Oct. 5 (Tuesday A series) - Concord, 7 p.m.; Lexington, 7:10; Arlington, 7:20, and Belmont, 7:45;

Oct. 12 (Tuesday C series) - Concord, 7 p.m.; Lincoln, 7:15; Lexington, 7:25; Arlington, 7:30, and Belmont, 7:45;

Oct. 19 (Tuesday B series) - Concord, 6 p.m.; Lexington, 6:10; Arlington, 6:20, and Belmont, 6:45.

The above schedule is temporary, as it is dependent upon patronage.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

SEP 30 1971

New England

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

SEP 30 1971

New England

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

SEP 30 1971

New England Newsclip

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 210,540

SEP 7 1971

New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Friends of Boston Symphony Getting Ready for New Season

THE DAY OF DAYS for First Family Boston women comes every Friday during the winter—at Symphony. It is never referred to as THE Symphony or the Symphony concerts. Just plain Symphony. Cleveland Amory, in his "Proper Bostonians," refers to it as "not only Culture with a capital C, but also Society with a capital S." And even in these ever-more-democratic times, this is still true, although the Symphony Friends include women from all walks of life.

Invitations will soon be in the mail to the many loyal Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the popular Friday Pre-Symphony Luncheons and the Stage Door Lectures. These are only a few of the many interesting activities planned for the 1971-72 season by the Council of Friends, of which Mrs. George Lee Sargent is chairman and Mrs. John M. Bradley and Mrs. John H. Knowles, vice-chairmen.

Although Symphony officially begins Friday, Sept. 24, the first Pre-Symphony Luncheon will be held at Horticultural Hall, Friday, Oct. 1, with succeeding luncheons Dec. 17, Feb. 4 and April 21. These congenial get-togethers with their excellent menus and attractive decorations will be under the leadership of Mrs. William 'Manice Jr. and Mrs. Ducey Ryerson.

The Stage Door Lectures, in charge of Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, have been filled to capacity since they began two years ago. They are held in the basement of Symphony Hall, where Boston Symphony players provide an interesting and intimate behind-the-scenes view of the orchestra. An a la carte bar and box luncheon follow.

The dates for this series are Oct. 22, Dec. 10, Feb. 25 and April 14. Orchestra members who will lecture include Harry Ellis Dickson, first violin; Chester Schmitz, tuba; John Korman, second violin; and Harold Wright, clarinet. Pre-Symphony Suppers are also being planned for the Saturday, Tuesday and Thursday evening series.

During the summer a group of enterprising women held a barn sale in Duxbury that cleared $1,400 for their orchestra. Mrs. William Jason Mixter Jr. has planned a meeting of her area chairmen at Mrs. Sargent's house in Dover, Wednesday, Sept. 15, to make plans for any other new and stimulating events.

HERALD
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 7,200

OCT 21 1971

New England Newsclip

Belmont Friends of BSO Plan Buses to Concerts

Good news of available Symphony busses was the chief topic of conversation and planning at the Oct. 15 meeting of the Belmont committee of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Prospect street home of Mrs. August R. Meyer, committee chairman, members also reviewed preliminary plans for a repeat of last Spring's Musical Marathon, and the Friends' area luncheon Dec. 17 in Horticultural Hall. For the latter Belmont will share decorating and hostess duties with Brookline, Chestnut Hill and Lexington Council members.

But it is the Friends' round trip Gray Line bus trip, available for any Symphony subscriber, that captures most attention because of increasingly fewer parking facilities in the Symphony Hall area, plus the imminent onslaught of snow and ice to compound driving problems.

Currently there is a bus leaving Belmont Center from in front of Filene's, at 7:45 for Tuesday series A and C, and Thursday series A and B. The Tuesday series B bus leaves at 6:45.

Friday afternoon patrons may join a bus at 12:50 at the Town Hall in Lexington, or at the Fresh Pond Shopping Center at 1:05. Twelve or more patrons would make possible scheduling a Friday bus direct from Belmont Center. There are other Cambridge pick-up possibilities, too

For further information on schedules, fares and tickets, subscribers should call the BSO Friends' Office or Gray Line, 427-8650.

The Belmont Friends' committee for the 1971-72 season includes Mesdames Theodore G. Ames, Harold S. Bird, John Cancian, Charles A. Coolidge, Jr., Carlton P. Fuller, Paul M. Jacobs, Hans J. Kroto, Robinson Murray, Jr. George H. Simonds and Alfred Willmann.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
D. 24,000

SEP 29 1971

New England News

Framingham Women to Co-Host Music Luncheon

FRAMINGHAM — The Framingham area has been honored to co-host the first of a series of four pre-symphony luncheons to be held for the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Horticultural Hall, Boston at noon Friday.

Official Framingham hostesses at this event include: Mrs. Raymond C. Gordon, Edmands Road, area chairman of the Council of Friends, Mrs. George M. Naylor Jr., Mrs. C. George Tedeschi, both of Belknap Road and Mrs. Waite Watkins of Indian Head Road. Mrs. Watkins will also serve on the decorations committee.

Information concerning the luncheon, future luncheons and the Stage Door lecture series may be obtained from Mrs. Gordon or by calling Mrs. Kay Whitty, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RECORD AMERICAN
(ALL DAY)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 415,231

SEP 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Friends at Work

During her leisure summer hours, versatile Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, worked in some activities-planning sessions with her energetic vice-chairmen, Mrs. John M. Bradley and Mrs. John H. Knowles.

In Duxbury a group of enterprising women held a barn sale that cleared $1400 for the orchestra and Mrs. William Jason Mixter, Jr., has planned a meeting of her area chairmen at Mrs. Sargent's home on Sept. 15. This will produce plans for other new and stimulating events.

Invitations are on the way for the popular Pre-Symphony luncheons and the Stage Door lectures which added substantially to the Friends fund-raising for the BSO in previous years.

Although officially the Symphony season begins on Friday, Sept. 24, the first luncheon will not be held until Friday, Oct. 1 in Horticultural Hall. Succeeding dates are are Dec. 17, Feb. 4 and April 21.

This year these congenial gettogethers with their excellent menus and clever decorations will be under the leadership of Mrs. William def Manice, Jr. and Mrs. Ducey Ryerson.

The Stage Door lectures, originated two years ago under the able direction of Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, are held at Symphony hall where BSO players provide an interesting and intimate behind-the-scenes view of music. An a la carte bar and box luncheon follows.

Oct. 22, Dec. 10, Feb. 25 and April 14 are the dates for this series. The orchestra lecturers will include Harry Ellis Dickson, first violin; Chester Schmitz, tuba; John Korman, second violin, and Harold Wright, clarinet.

More later about the Pre-Symphony suppers that are being arranged for the Saturday, Tuesday and Thursday evening series.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,530 S. 260,061

OCT 2 1971 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Members Have Pleasant Reunion At First Pre-Symphony Luncheon

A PLEASANT REUNION after the long summer was the first Pre-Symphony Luncheon of the season at Horticultural Hall. Tan and healthy, members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra greeted each other, and on all sides was heard: "Did you have a good summer?" Many had returned from visits abroad and others were just back from the seashore or mountains.

Cut-outs of brilliant autumn leaves and silhouettes of geese flying across a harvest moon decorated the barn-like walls of Horticultural Hall, and on the tables were golden pumpkins and squash. The usual delicious buffet luncheon was served with appropriate wine and then everyone crossed the street to Symphony Hall for the second concert of the orchestra's 91st season.

Hostesses for the luncheon were from the Dedham, Dover, Westwood and Framingham areas and included Mrs. Richard Higgins, Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen Jr., Mrs. Charles W. Bartlett, Mrs. John Harwood, Mrs. Robert G. Millar, Mrs. Hardwick Moseley, Mrs. Daniel Pierce, Mrs. Thomas E. Singer, Mrs. John E. Thayer, Mrs. Raymond C. Gordon, Mrs. George M. Naylor Jr., Mrs. C. G. Tedeschi and Mrs. Waite Watkins.

Mrs. William D. Manice Jr. and Mrs. M. Ducey Ryerson are co-chairmen of the luncheon committee, assisted by Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. Melville Chapin, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Edward Culver, Mrs. Howard W. Davis, Mrs. Paul E. Dodson, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Thomas Otis, Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. B. Gring Wallace.

MRS. HARRIS FAHNESTOCK and Mrs. James Perkins, the two women trustees of the orchestra, were at the table with Mrs. George Lee Sargent. Others were Mrs. Perkins' house guest, Mrs. Norman-Butler of London, England, Governor of the English-Speaking Union of the Commonwealth. She was hostess at a reception for the chamber music players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in London last spring during their trip abroad.

Others at the table were Mr. and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, Miss Mary Smith and Carlton Lees, executive director of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, who has been elected president of the Garden Writers Association of America. He received this honor at the annual meeting of the association during the American Horticulture Society convention in Milwaukee.

Among the many others at the luncheon were Mrs. William J. Mixter Jr., Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. Henry Hall Jr., Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, Mrs. John H. Knowles, Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray, Mrs. Alfred Willmann and Mrs. Malcolm E. Peabody Jr.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

OCT 4 1971 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Maybe it's because there isn't too much going on in the summer so the contrast seems greater; maybe it's because everyone wants to get his opening event in as quickly as possible, or maybe it's because it's just coincidence, whatever the reason when the new fall social starts it does so in earnest.

This past week, in fact ever since Symphony opened 10 days ago, there has been a continual round of parties and benefits to keep the socially inclined on their toes. The week wound up on Friday evening with the big, completely sold-out Commonwealth Ball of the English Speaking Union held in the Great Hall of the Harvard Club for the benefit of the scholarship fund of the E. S. U.

The affair was well named for the British Commonwealth really did come together with representatives of different countries coming from New York and Washington for the party. The tall consul from Trinidad and Tobago, Wilfred S. Naimool, and his delightful wife drove up from New York with their two young sons, and decided that while in New England they would take a few days vacation and drive up to Maine the next day. One of the most unusual dresses at the ball was worn by Mrs. Naimool. Of silk in a rainbow of colors it had the soft flowing lines of a native dress so becoming to her dark beauty. The consuls from Jamaica and New Zealand were also there from New York and all the way from the British Embassy in Washington came Air Marshal Sir John Lapsley, the senior military officer there, and Lady Lapsley. Tall and genial Sir John wore a long impressive row of dress medals on his evening jacket, which caused every other male guest at the party to wish out loud that he had thought to wear his decorations in the same manner. Lady Lapsley, whose charm and friendliness made every guest wish to meet her, wore a dress of stiff gold and white brocade.

A private party was given by the president of the English Speaking Union, Dana Cotton, and his wife in the President's Room of the Harvard Club before the dinner dance. Here to greet the consuls and distinguished guests was the chairman of the ball, Mrs. Caleb Loring, Jr., a shawl of fine lace over the shoulders of her blue brocade. With the Cottons were their son-in-law and daughter from Alexandria, Va., Mr. and Mrs. Leif Christoffersen. Another guest was a visitor from Brighton, England, Mrs. Thomas Frampton, who is here on a six week visit with her niece, Mrs. Stanley Short of Boston, and her husband.

The Great Hall of the Harvard Club is one of those places that defy decorating and so the committee had very sensibly decided on flags of all the Commonwealth countries as the only decorations, which went well with the dark panelling of the room. Flower arrangements in red, white and blue were on each candlelit table and a large facsimile of the lion and the unicorn hung over the orchestra.

Among the many guests glimpsed dancing to Herbie Sulkin and his orchestra were Dr. and Mrs. Thomas DeLorme of Milton, Mrs. DeLorme just back from a summer in Europe; Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Morris of Wellesley, Mrs. Morris wearing an evening pants outfit of white and gold sari silk; Mr. and Mrs. Chauncey Grey of Cambridge; Mr. and Mrs. Alan Rice; the William White Howells, the Sherman Morss's and Mrs. Maureen Budd wearing the traditional plaid sash across her dress worn by Scottish ladies at formal parties.

* * *

Earlier in the day many of these guests had been at the first Pre-Symphony luncheon sponsored by the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Horticultural Hall. Despite the summerlike temperatures outside it was fall inside with big sprays of turning leaves, pots of chrysanthemums in all the fall colors and the brilliant orange of pumpkins and squash on the round luncheon tables. These had been arranged in a very clever manner by the decorating committee. They had hollowed out the pumpkins and used them as containers for chrysanthemums and evergreens on some tables, while to the orange squash they had added yellow chrysanthemums and evergreens to form a tail. Placed so that the curved neck and stem of the vegetable formed the neck and beak and the flowers the tail it made a perfect turkey.

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Dedham, Dover, Westwood and Framingham were the hostesses at Friday's luncheon. Among them were Mrs. Charles Bartlett, Mrs. Richard Higgins, Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen Jr., Mrs. Harwood, Mrs. Robert G. Millar, Mrs. Hardwick Mosely, Mrs. Daniel Pierce, Mrs. Thomas E. Singer, and Mrs. John E. Thayer, of Dedham.

Among the many at the luncheon was a visitor from London, Mrs. Norman Butler, who was seated with the president of the Friends of the B. S. O., Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover. Mrs. Butler is the guest of Mrs. James Perkins of Westwood, a trustee of the B. S. O., who was also at Mrs. Sargent's table. A lifelong friend of Mrs. Maureen Budd of the English Speaking Union, they both were debutantes together in London where Mrs. Butler is a governor of the E. S. U. of the British Commonwealth.

Guests at this first Pre-Symphony Luncheon included Mrs. Robert Kistner of Needham, Mrs. Robert Clasby of Wellesley, Mrs. Alfred Willmann of Belmont, Mrs. John T. G. Nichols, Mrs. William Mixter Jr., of Dedham, Mrs. W. Russell Peabody of Dedham, and Mrs. Howard Davis of Concord.

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

The prescribed order of events for the normal Friday from September to April varies seldom for many Boston ladies. From all around the city and the suburbs, they sally forth into town to converge on such places as the Chilton and Algonquin clubs, or restaurants like the Ritz or Joseph's. Here they meet other ladies and together, after a leisurely lunch, they make their way to Symphony Hall for the so-sacred afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Once in a great while, there is a deviation from this routine pattern when an event occurs that they simply cannot miss. Such an event will happen this Friday for the Symphony-going members of the Metropolitan District of Federated Garden Clubs of Massachusetts. Instead of lunching at the Ritz or in the dining room of the Women's City Club on Beacon Street, they will join their fellow members for the annual meeting of the organization and for sherry and luncheon before Symphony in the auditorium of the latter club.

The speaker at the meeting will be one of the members' top favorites, Mrs. Hollis L. Gray of Belmont, whose flower arrangements are particularly suitable to the Bulfinch rooms of the Women's City Club.

Mrs. Leo E. Wolf of West Newton and Mrs. Frederick L. Archibald Jr. of Dedham are in charge of the meeting. Among those planning to attend are Mrs. Harry Abells, Mrs. Edmund Anthony and Mrs. Edmund Miller, all of Newtonville; Mrs. Eugene Foss of Sugar Hill, N. H..; Mrs. C. Campbell Patterson of Chestnut Hill, vice president of the Federation; Mrs. J. Robert Lakin, Mrs. Ezra Sherman, Mrs. Russell Merrill, Mrs. Robert Carter, Mrs. John Furman and Mrs. Albert Mitchell, from the Wellesley Round Table Garden Club; Mrs. David Lownes of Needham; Mrs. Alan Miller of Boston, and Mrs. Kurt Esser and Miss Irene Pitz of the Back Bay Garden Club.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 4 1971 New England Newsclip

Bussing to BSO

Patrons of Boston Symphony concerts are fignding that the parking situation near Symphony Hall has eroded over the summer. Result—the Friends of the Boston Symphony in cooperation with the Gray Line instituted a "Mercedes-Benz Parlor Coach Service" for BSO performances this season from all points of the compass surrounding Boston. Pick-up points have been designated where coaches will arrive 45 minutes before concert time, and to which buses will return afterward. Complete information is available from Mr. Kaplan of the Gray Line (427-8650), or 25 Webber Street, Boston 02119.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 49,250

SEP 20 1971

New England Newsclip

A Place in...

THE SUN

By MIRIAM DEMERS

Music lovers will be happy to know that William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the opening pair of Friday/Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony's 91st season Friday afternoon, Sept. 24, at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Sept. 25, at 8:30 p.m. in Boston Symphony Hall. Soloist is violinist Christiane Edinger who makes her debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

Individual tickets for Friday/Saturday concerts will be available at the Symphony Hall Box Office beginning Friday, Sept. 24. Single tickets for all other series will be available the day of the opening concert of each series.

As in the past, "Rush Line" seats at $1 each for all Friday and Saturday concerts will go on sale in the Huntington Avenue Lobby two hours before the starting time of each concert. Student tickets for all Boston Symphony concerts, except for the Cambridge series, at $3 each, regardless of face value, are available in a limited quantity one-half hour before the starting time of each concert in the Huntington Avenue lobby. Students must present a current i.d. card.

STAR
BRAINTREE, MASS.
W. 10,402

SEP 23 1971

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens 91st Season

BOSTON—William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the opening pair of Friday/Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony's 91st season Friday afternoon, September 24 at 2:00 p.m. and Saturday evening, September 25 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston. Soloist is violinist Christiane Edinger who makes her debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

Mr. Steinberg conducts Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 "Pastoral", followed by Einem's Violin concerto with soloist Christiane Edinger. Hindemith's symphony MATHIS DER MALER concludes the program.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 24 1971

New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Symphony opens today with the first concert taking place this afternoon at Symphony Hall. This unofficial start of the new fall social season is the signal for activities of every type to blossom forth all over the area.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

SEP 16 1971

New England Newsclip

The PERFORMING ARTS

By MARY-ALICE KING

And for music buffs, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, back from Tanglewood, features violinist Christiane Edinger in its opening concerts, Friday and Saturday, Sept. 24 and 25. William Steinberg conducts Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Einem's "Violin Concerto" and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

The orchestra looks back to its first performance in 1881 when it celebrates its 90th anniversary with the original repertoire chosen for its first performance. On Friday, Oct. 22, former music director Erich Leinsdorf will conduck Weber's "Jubel-Overture" and contralto Lili Chookasian joins Leinsdorf in a scene from Bruch's "Odysseus" and arias from Gluck's "Orfeo." The 1881 concert was conducted by the orchestra's first conductor, George Henschel, with his wife as soloist.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN.

SEP 25 1971

New England Newsclip

Fresh, vital performance

Pastoral opens BSO season

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

I wonder how many times in his 51 years in the profession William Steinberg has conducted Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

He began yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert with it — the first of the orchestra's 91st season and of Steinberg's third and last as Music Director — and the question occurred to me because the performance, though unassuming in manner and without anything aggressively original about it, felt so fresh and vital, as though the playing of it were a new experience for orchestra and conductor.

It was both quick and leisurely, a lovely combination for that piece if you know how to find it, and it was a performance that very quietly made much of Beethovan's understanded but still always startling, dissonances and of his really strange ideas about continuity. The most beautiful detail in the interpretation was the freedom and independence with which the fragments of lyric melody moved across the accompanient in the scene by the brook, particularly the entrance into and exits from those fragments and the sense of having the music continue across the silences so as to unfold always into larger and larger units. There was some imprecision in the orchestra's playing, but in a context of work that was tonally lovely as well as spirited and alert.

It was a beautiful start, and I was sorry that things went so drastically downhill after that. The second half brought the first American performance of the Violin Concerto written in 1966 by the then 48-year-old Austrian composer, Gottfried von Einem.

The program note quites von Einem as saying, "the work is tonal, which will annoy a lot of people." Now that is bad music criticism and just a touch paranoid. Schoenberg used to insist that there was "still plenty of good music to be written in C major," and there are composers like Britten, Shostakovich, and Piston who frequently demonstrate the truth of Schoenberg's assertion. The issue about von Einem is that, in or out of whatever key, he has always written a superficial, derivative sort of music, and that it is the triviality of his work which has annoyed a lot of people, not his conservative harmonies. His four-movement concerto is an empty-headed, pretty girl with a little too much makeup and hair-spray (and who loves "Der Rosenkavalier"). The soloist was Christiane Edinger, a young German violinist, whose playing was unpleasantly out of tune and rather blowzy.

After all that came Hindesmith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony. I cannot swear that the concerto did not leave me too stuffed as well as too cross to take in anything else, but with that caution I will report that the performance struck me as energetic but quiet coarse.

AN OPENING. — Woman holds door for companion entering Symphony Hall for first concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra's 91st season. (Ted Dully Photo)

POST GAZETTE
(MORNING-EVENING)
SEP 24 1971

New England Newsclip

Near the Waterfront

A Potpourri of people, places and things . . .

By LILLIAN BONO

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
D. 24,000

JUL 13 1971

New England Newsc

New BSO Season Starts Sept. 24

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — the Boston Symphony opens Sept. 24 with a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston conducted by William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director. Violinist Christiane Edinger is soloist.

Details of this series as well as programs for the orchestra's tours and its shorter series whose repertoire is drawn mainly from the Friday-Saturday series, will be announced shortly.

their 60th today. They are the parents of seven children, twenty-four grandchildren and 29 great-grandchildren.

* * *

At the five chateaux Restaurant, Hotel Sonesta in Cambridge, the Jazz Gallery is open daily for your dining and dancing pleasure Mondays through Saturdays from 7:30 p.m. to 12:30 a.m.

* * *

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the opening pair of Friday/ Saturday concerts of the B.S.O.'s 91st season at 2 p.m. today at 8:30 tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. Soloist is violinist Christiane Edinger who makes her debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts. Mr. Steinberg conducts Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 "Pastoral" followed by Einem's Violin concerto with soloist Christiane Edinger. Hindemith's Symphony " Mathis der Maler" concludes the program.

* * *

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 49,250

SEP 20 1971

New England Newsclip

A Place in... THE SUN

By MIRIAM DEMERS

Music lovers will be happy to know that William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the opening pair of Friday/Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony's 91st season Friday afternoon, Sept. 24, at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Sept. 25, at 8:30 p.m. in Boston Symphony Hall. Soloist is violinist Christiane Edinger who makes her debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

Individual tickets for Friday/Saturday concerts will be available at the Symphony Hall Box Office beginning Friday, Sept. 24. Single tickets for all other series will be available the day of the opening concert of each series.

As in the past, "Rush Line" seats at $1 each for all Friday and Saturday concerts will go on sale in the Huntington Avenue Lobby two hours before the starting time of each concert. Student tickets for all Boston Symphony concerts, except for the Cambridge series, at $3 each, regardless of face value, are available in a limited quantity one-half hour before the starting time of each concert in the Huntington Avenue lobby. Students must present a current i.d. card.

POST-GAZETTE
WESTFIELD, MASS.

SEP 24 1971

New England Newsclip

STAR
BRAINTREE, MASS.
W. 10,402

SEP 23 1971

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens 91st Season

BOSTON—William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the opening pair of Friday/Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony's 91st season Friday afternoon, September 24 at 2:00 p.m. and Saturday evening, September 25 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston. Soloist is violinist Christiane Edinger who makes her debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

Mr. Steinberg conducts Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 "Pastoral", followed by Einem's Violin concerto with soloist Christiane Edinger. Hindemith's symphony MATHIS DER MALER concludes the program.

Near the Waterfront

A Potpourri of people, places and things . . .

By LILLIAN BONO

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
D. 24,000

JUL 13 1971

New England Newsc

New BSO Season Starts Sept. 24

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — the Boston Symphony opens Sept. 24 with a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston conducted by William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director. Violinist Christiane Edinger is soloist.

Details of this series as well as programs for the orchestra's tours and its shorter series whose repertoire is drawn mainly from the Friday-Saturday series, will be announced shortly.

their 60th today. They are the parents of seven children, twenty-four grandchildren and 29 great-grandchildren.

* * *

At the five chateaux Restaurant, Hotel Sonesta in Cambridge, the Jazz Gallery is open daily for your dining and dancing pleasure Mondays through Saturdays from 7:30 p.m. to 12:30 a.m.

* * *

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the opening pair of Friday/ Saturday concerts of the B.S.O.'s 91st season at 2 p.m. today at 8:30 tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. Soloist is violinist Christiane Edinger who makes her debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts. Mr. Steinberg conducts Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 "Pastoral" followed by Einem's Violin concerto with soloist Christiane Edinger. Hindemith's Symphony " Mathis der Maler" concludes the program.

* * *

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

SEP 24 1971

New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

* * *

Symphony opens today with the first concert taking place this afternoon at Symphony Hall. This unofficial start of the new fall social season is the signal for activities of every type to blossom forth all over the area.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 242,500

SEP 25 1971

New England Newsclip

Fresh, vital performance

Pastoral opens BSO season

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

I wonder how many times in his 51 years in the profession William Steinberg has conducted Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

He began yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert with it — the first of the orchestra's 91st season and of Steinberg's third and last as Music Director — and the question occurred to me because the performance, though unassuming in manner and without anything aggressively original about it, felt so fresh and vital, as though the playing of it were a new experience for orchestra and conductor.

It was both quick and leisurely, a lovely combination for that piece if you know how to find it, and it was a performance that very quietly made much of Beethovan's understanded but still always startling, dissonances and of his really strange ideas about continuity. The most beautiful detail in the interpretation was the freedom and independence with which the fragments of lyric melody moved across the accompanient in the scene by the brook, particularly the entrance into and exits from those fragments and the sense of having the music continue across the silences so as to unfold always into larger and larger units. There was some imprecision in the orchestra's playing, but in a context of work that was tonally lovely as well as spirited and alert.

It was a beautiful start, and I was sorry that things went so drastically downhill after that. The second half brought the first American performance of the Violin Concerto written in 1966 by the then 48-year-old Austrian composer, Gottfried von Einem.

The program note quites von Einem as saying, "the work is tonal, which will annoy a lot of people." Now that is bad music criticism and just a touch paranoid. Schoenberg used to insist that there was "still plenty of good music to be written in C major," and there are composers like Britten, Shostakovich, and Piston who frequently demonstrate the truth of Schoenberg's assertion. The issue about von Einem is that, in or out of whatever key, he has always written a superficial, derivative sort of music, and that it is the triviality of his work which has annoyed a lot of people, not his conservative harmonies. His four-movement concerto is an empty-headed, pretty girl with a little too much makeup and hair-spray (and who loves "Der Rosenkavalier"). The soloist was Christiane Edinger, a young German violinist, whose playing was unpleasantly out of tune and rather blowzy.

After all that came Hindesmith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony. I cannot swear that the concerto did not leave me too stuffed as well as too cross to take in anything else, but with that caution I will report that the performance struck me as energetic but quiet coarse.

AN OPENING — Woman holds door for companion entering Symphony Hall for first concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra's 91st season. (Ted Dully Photo)

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

SEP 16 1971

New England Newsclip

The PERFORMING ARTS

By MARY-ALICE KING

* * *

And for music buffs, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, back from Tanglewood, features violinist Christiane Edinger in its opening concerts, Friday and Saturday, Sept. 24 and 25. William Steinberg conducts Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Einem's "Violin Concerto" and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

The orchestra looks back to its first performance in 1881 when it celebrates its 90th anniversary with the original repertoire chosen for its first performance. On Friday, Oct. 22, former music director Erich Leinsdorf will conduck Weber's "Jubel-Overture" and contralto Lili Chookasian joins Leinsdorf in a scene from Bruch's "Odysseus" and arias from Gluck's "Orfeo." The 1881 concert was conducted by the orchestra's first conductor, George Henschel, with his wife as soloist.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,903

SEP 27 1971 N Eng

BSO opens season with concerto premiere

By Louis Snyder

"Festive gathering of the country people" is the title Beethoven gave the third movement of his "Pastoral" Symphony, which opened the Boston Symphony's 91st season in weekend concerts at Symphony Hall. Although the composer had in mind "country people" in the country, he probably wouldn't have objected to having his music used to celebrate the return of subscribers, students, or even stay-at-homes to an urban center of festive musical occasions, where their friendly band of musicians, also fresh from the country, would be holding forth for several months to come.

William Steinberg, beginning the third year of his three-year term as the BSO's music director, again chose to have Beethoven on his season's opening program, and the "Pastoral" was a pleasant inspiration. It is full of passages to stir the mind and heart, as well as opportunities to make the listener grateful for some virtuoso performances within the body of the orchestra. On Friday afternoon, there were moments when all did not quite mesh, surprisingly enough, as perfectly as it should — occasional frayed ends, as it were. But the overall tonal glory was there to make city living sound promising after all.

Gottfried von Einem's Violin Concerto (Op. 33), first performed in Vienna in May, 1970, made its American debut at these concerts. Another debut with the orchestra was that of the impressive German violinist, Christiane Edinger, a rather slight young woman with a strong, vibrant tone and, apparently, arms and fingers of steel. For in this work the composer has given the soloist the burden of the action — there are few moments in its course when the violin isn't playing alone (the concerto opens unconventionally with a long solo cadenza), or performing the most difficult instrumental derring-do against a complementary, if hardly costarring, orchestral background. The effective third movement, presto-andante, is written for violin solo and bongo drums (smartly handled by Arthur Press), first clarinet, bassoon, and orchestra, returning to the violin-bongo duet before it concludes.

All in all the scoring is tonal, although its rhythmic contrasts, its almost ceaseless solo drive, and its wiry texture make it anything but old fashioned. There are melodic passages — yes, in 1970-71 — which must have surprised some who had come expecting the worst. And considering the recent success of another Einem work, his opera based on Duerrenmatt's "The Visit," it just may be that the Violin Concerto similarly is not here today and gone tomorrow.

Paul Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maler," based on material from his earlier opera, is by now recognized as a monumental work, and Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra gave it the majestic kind of performance it demands. Coincidentally, both this work of Hindemith and earlier compositions of Einem incurred the wrath of the Hitler regime because of their "musical Bolshevism," and resulted in the composers' eventual voluntary exile from their native land. On the basis of their subsequent output, one can perhaps refer gracefully back to the final, serene movement of the Beethoven symphony which opened the program, and note the composer's designation: "Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm."

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

OCT 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Unsinkable BSO

BY RICHARD BUELL

If (unthinkable thought) the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever ceased to exist, it — or something like it — would have to be reinvented. It belongs to that class of institutions everybody bitches about sooner or later, but whose disappearance would impoverish us all. In other words, like railroads, museums, the Post Office and Hershey bars.

The B.S.O. is going on ninety-one now, and from the evidence of the season's opener on the 24th, showing signs of life, as distinct from medicated survival. William Steinberg, beginning his final year as Music Director, conducted a program of works by Beethoven, Gottfried von Einem and Paul Hindemith.

He seems to have had a beneficent influence on the orchestra. The modesty and precision of his cues in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony encouraged the self-correction and internal balance that are sure signs of ensemble health. The reading itself was uneccentric, slightly quicker than expected, with a good, firm ryhthmic pulse throughout, and a "vocal" kind of naturalness to the phrasing.

Gottfried von Einem's Violin Concerto, (1966) in its American premiere, seemed, like other contemporary pieces Mr. Steinberg has played recently, to have arrived on the programs by a kind of negative recommendation. It is not lacking in traditional virtuoso display, nor in finesse of orchestration. It will not terrify an audience with dissonance or atonal procedures. What it is is your late Romantic ewige Melodie gussied up with extrinsic modernities of orchestration (two bongos!); Richard Strauss posthumous and decomposing. Winthrop Sargeant will love it. Christiane Edinger's playing of the solo part, which was very attentively watched by the orchestra's violinists, was surer in dramatic gesture than in intonation.

The Symphony Mathis der Maler of Paul Hindemith is one of the small canon or really popular "modern" pieces, perhaps because it is so colorful in its dour way, and tied in with a program. Hindemith's orchestration ought to be idiomatic and knowing. He was surely the only composer or conductor capable of playing every instrument in the orchestra. This orchestra's way with the piece was burly, energetic and hall-filling.

And the Boston Symphony can really make a glorious noise. Hearing a responsive concert room like Symphony hall fill up with big, robust tone is one of the simpler musical pleasures, but a basic one. The quality of instruments and executive skills in this orchestra can deliver a visceral pleasure (or impact, anyway) that only two dozen or so ensembles on the entire planet are capable of. Rafael Kubelik said last year that whereas he urged the Cleveland Orchestra to play out more, he asked the Boston players to listen to each other more and to soften things. Bernard Haitink, another visitor, said the players were willing to work.

If any symphony orchestra is most of the time an aggregate of maddeningly unrealized potential, extra-musical reasons will not be hard to find. Overwork, inadequate rehearsal time, considerations of social function and show-biz, financial vulnerability. It may even be that this paricular institution is incompatible with democratic procedures and the values of the market place. In any case, vivat, B.S.O.!

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

SEP 25 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins 91st Season

By HARRY NEVILLE

The Boston Symphony began its 91st season yesterday afternoon with the kind of concert that has become an altogether too familiar event in Symphony Hall during the past few years: a pair of competent but undistinguished performances of works from the standard repertory, and a more than competent performance of a totally undistinguished contemporary work.

For the majority of experienced listeners I should think the time would have long since been past when merely adequate performances of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony could evoke much pleasure. These are great works and there are good reasons for their popularity and frequency of performance.

That an orchestra can put them together easily, however, is not a compelling reason to program them, and yet it was easy to suspect that this was the kind of logic behind the choice of those works in yesterday's concert.

WILLIAM STEINBERG, who conducted, has a great deal to say about Beethoven and especially about the "Pastoral," as anyone who's heard his recordings must know. Little of this, however, came out yesterday, unless one was blessed with the faculty of hearing between the notes. The most obviously good thing was his choice of tempos—faster (and closer to Beethoven's markings) than in most performances and yet never rushed or destructive to the character of such things as the "Brook" movement.

The most obviously bad things were a great many instances of sloppy entrances, undistinguished solo work (although clarinetist Harold Wright was a notable exception to this), poor balances and a lack of vividly etched details.

The players seemed terribly relaxed and uninvolved. Whether they were confused by Steinberg's micro-mini-conducting or simply overcome by the serenity of the "Pastoral I don't know. The former case, probably, since many of the same faults were evident in Hindemith's "Mathis."

CHRISTIANE EDINGER was the soloist in the first U.S. performance of Gottfried von Einem's Violin Concerto, Op. 33. In her debut with the orchestra she displayed a technique that seems capable of handling just about any kind of bravura-type writing. Because of the nature of the work she played, it was difficult to get a clear idea of her ability to phrase or to deal with sustained cantabile passages. She has a big tone and I liked her somewhat gutsy style of playing, at least in this work.

The concerto is an annoying piece, not, as its composer suggests, because it is tonal or old-fashioned or unashamedly romantic, but simply because nowhere in any of its four movements does it speak with any individuality, which is surely something we can reasonably expect of anything that pretends to be more than mere background music. The liveliest music occured in the third movement, which utilizes a solo bongoist. The performance of Arthur Press, BSO percussionist, was a model of discrete virtuosity.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

OCT 7 1971 New England Newsclip

In Concert

William Steinberg's Achievements

By Peter M. Knapp

This is the year of decision for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when it must decide ~~on its future~~ musical leadership. For its 91st season, however, the orchestra remains in the hands of the redoubtable William Steinberg, whose concert Tuesday night illustrated some of his best qualities.

Steinberg is an old-school carrier of the great Middle European musical tradition, serious, solid, devoted to excellence. He frankly hasn't set Boston on fire during his time here; but he has been a steadying influence, made important choices of personnel and led thoughtful performances despite his illness, age and double-duty between Boston and Pittsburgh.

His program Tuesday night included Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, the "Pastoral," Gottfried von Einem's Violin Concerto, Op. 33, and Paul Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony — two acknowledged masterpieces surrounding a modern lightweight.

Happy Combination

Beethoven and Steinberg seem rarely to be far from each other. In the case of the "Pastoral," it was a happy combination. The conductor moved things right along, resisting temptations to linger over phrase endings yet shaping the lines nicely. It was far from sentimental, yet not antiseptic — fresh air and countryside without the applesauce.

The "brook movement", for example, was done with careful placement of stresses and attention to rise and fall of line and cadence, and the "storm" section was powerful and vital. There were a few problems of intonation and coordination among the winds, but this year's horns seem to be the best we have had in Boston for some time and the horn solos were done with genuine distinction.

Similarly, the rich colors and polyphony of Hindemith's "Mathis" were splendidly laid out in a performance of unusual coherence, bite and potency. Steinberg managed to project tension and propulsion, but kept it under control, and the running lines of the fugal passages never became tangled.

Premiere and Soloist

The Einem concerto has been receiving its first performances in this country by the BSO, though it wasn't much of an event. It is a four-movement work by the 53-year-old Austrian composer, written in 1966 and premiered last year in Vienna. Despite its youth, the concerto is rooted more in the past than in contemporary compositional techniques, though that is not necessarily a fault.

It does not grate on the ears, has melody, tonal harmony and an imaginative duet for the soloist and bongos, yet winds up being a lot of busy work in need of a profile and a goal. Its lines seem to follow the physical maxim of what goes up must go down, but the motion seems largely vertical than horizontal, and one rarely has a sense of where the music has been or where it is going.

The soloist, Christiane Edinger, is a young German violinist making her first appearances with the Boston Symphony, and she ought to return for something more substantial. She has a good-sized tone, an agile technique, and a good deal of temperament — one that requires a stout, well-strung bow. She can be lyrical, but the chief impression is that of a violent, spunky player leaning into her instrument for better attacks. Not always on target perhaps, but a violinist who comes to play for keeps.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 2 1971 New England Newsclip

With violin and bongos

Von Einem premiere

By Louis Snyder

Boston

"Festive gathering of the country people" is the title Beethoven gave the third movement of his "Pastoral" Symphony, which opened the Boston Symphony's 91st season last weekend at Symphony Hall. Although the composer had in mind "country people" in the country, he probably wouldn't have objected to having his music used to celebrate the return of subscribers, students, or even stay-at-homes to an urban center of festive musical occasions, where their friendly band of musicians, also fresh from the country, would be holding forth for several months to come.

William Steinberg, beginning the third year of his three-year term as the BSO's music director, again chose to have Beethoven on his season's opening program, and the "Pastoral" was a pleasant inspiration. It is full of passages to stir the mind and heart, as well as opportunities to make the listener grateful for some virtuoso performances within the body of the orchestra. On Friday afternoon, there were moments when all did not quite mesh, surprisingly enough, as perfectly as it should — occasional frayed ends, as it were. But the overall tonal glory was there to make city living sound promising after all.

Gottfried von Einem's Violin Concerto (Op. 33), first performed in Vienna in May, 1970, made its American debut at these concerts. Another debut with the orchestra was that of the impressive German violinist, Christiane Edinger, a rather slight young woman with a strong, vibrant tone and, apparently, arms and fingers of steel. For in this work the composer has given the soloist the burden of the action — there are few moments in its course when the violin isn't playing alone (the concerto opens unconventionally with a long solo cadenza), or performing the most difficult instrumental derring-do against a complementary, if hardly costarring, orchestral background. The effective third movement, presto-andante, is written for violin solo and bongo drums (smartly handled by Arthur Press), first clarinet, bassoon, and orchestra, returning to the violin-bongo duet before it concludes.

All in all the scoring is tonal, although its rhythmic contrasts, its almost ceaseless solo drive, and its wiry texture make it anything but old fashioned. There are melodic passages — yes, in 1970-71 — which must have surprised some who had come expecting the worst. And considering the recent success of another Einem work, his opera based on Duerrenmatt's "The Visit," it just may be that the Violin Concerto similarly is not here today and gone tomorrow.

Paul Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maler," based on material from his earlier opera, is by now recognized as a monumental work, and Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra gave it the majestic kind of performance it demands. Coincidentally, both this work of Hindemith and earlier compositions of Einem incurred the wrath of the Hitler regime because of their "musical Bolshevism," and resulted in the composers' eventual voluntary exile from their native land. On the basis of their subsequent output, one can perhaps refer gracefully back to the final, serene movement of the Beethoven symphony which opened the program, and note the composer's designation: "Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm."

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,261

OCT 2 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony: Michael Tilson Thomas Conducts All-Russian Concert

By HARRY NEVILLE

Michael Tilson Thomas is a conductor who always can be counted on for panache when that quality is needed, and there was much need of it in the all-Russian concert he led yesterday in Symphony Hall. Particularly so in the more familiar works of the program: The Polonaise and Krakoviak from Glinka's "A Life for the Tsar," Stravinsky's Symphony In C, and Borodin's Second Symphony.

Thomas nearly always gets lively, intense and spirited playing from the Boston Symphony, which is a statement that applies to very few of the orchestra's regular guest conductors and not at all to its last two music directors. The players seem to enjoy his leadership — not, one suspects, out of profound regard for his interpretive abilities, impressive as those are, but out of respect for the craftsmanship of his conducting.

HE GIVES a clear and precise beat, he cues important entrances, he's sensitive to balances, and he has an extremely fine ear for the rhythmic intricacies of a score. In short, he doesn't make the mistake of assuming that an "interpretation" is something that exists independently of technical precision.

He's not the kind of conductor who thinks his main job is to "inspire" the orchestra, and I think the BSO likes him for this attitude. At least the players respond remarkably well to his direction.

Yesterday's concert, to be repeated tonight, was another instance of Thomas's flair for excellent programming. There was an obvious link, of course, between the Glinka and Borodin selections, but the Stravinsky Symphony and the fourth work — a concerto (without orchestra) for flute, oboe, piano and percussion by Edison Denisov, a contemporary Russian — had little in common and yet managed to say something revealing about each other.

THE CONCERTO is in three brief movements entitled Overture, Cadenza and Coda, which turn out to be highly compact little essays in, respectively, rhythmic propulsion, lyric melodic writing, and "pointillistic" writing a la Webern. The program notes stated that Denison had used serial techniques in the Concerto's composition, which is a rather astonishing thing for a Russian composer to have done, although the work is not particularly "far out" or avant-garde by U.S. standards.

The Concerto is an unpretentious piece and it was well served by the soloists — flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, oboist Ralph Gomberg, pianist Gilbert Kalish and percussionist Everett Firth. Unfortunately, it was played after Stravinsky's magnificent Symphony in C, which is a hard act to follow, even with the help of an intermission.

Among other things, Stravinsky demonstrated with this 1940 work how it was possible to say something utterly fresh and original within the framework of a very old harmonic concept. After this extraordinary display of inventiveness, it was impossible not to notice the staleness of Denisov's rhythmic devices — especially annoying in the context of a piece so liberated in other respects.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 241,642 SUN. 505,

OCT 2 1971 New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

Russian's music no longer underground

BSO plays Denisov's concerto

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

Early in 1964, one began to hear rumors that there was a Russian avant-garde musical underground. There was some melodrama and mystification — pieces were performed with no composers' names given on the program for the protection of these subversive types — but before long, names and identities began to emerge. The name that came up most often was Edison Denisov (really named after the inventor by his electrical engineering father), and Denisov, now 42 and visible even to the point of a lectureship at the Moscow Conservatory, got a performance at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert when Michael Tilson Thomas conducted his Concerto for flute, oboe, piano, and percussion.

DORIOT A. DWYER
. . . fine performance

The Concerto is a quartet actually: there are only the four solo instrumentalists, no orchestra. It is also very short, beginning with an overture, moving through a series of unaccompanied solos for each player in turn, and going then into a brief and rapid coda. I cannot imagine that anything except the coda, in which a perky music a bit like Prokofiev's has its texture broken up in a pointillistic way, would have seemed alarming to Soviet critics. The piece goes back to 1963, and I imagine it represents a very early venture for Denisov of sticking his neck out. It comes across as a cautious piece, one that in spite of its obvious competence has something tentative about it. I remember Denisov's "Le Soleil des Incas" in 1967 as a real piece, even as quite a striking one, but the Concerto was mostly an interesting cultural and historic document, one with both sad and admirable elements to it. There was fine playing by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Ralph Gomberg, Gilbert Kalish, and Everett Firth.

Thomas began his concert with something fresh and surprising, a splendid Polonaise and a lively Krakoviak from Mikhail Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar" (1836), inventive, charming music, and really well made. In each half of the program there was a symphony, Stravinsky's in C and the Borodin No. 2 in B minor. The Symphony in C seems to me one of Stravinsky's greatest works, a masterpiece that is staggeringly rich, alive, densely packed, a marvelous coming together of wit, elegance and lyric inspiration. It is a piece that wants to live next to the best of the Haydn symphonies, and it is as fresh and challenging and modern.

Borodin, the illegitimate son of an elderly Imeretian prince (so says Groves Dictionary, but where is Imeretia?), was a scientist who attended ophthalmological congresses and taught chemistry at the Medico-Surgical Academy in St. Petersburg (specializing in the products of the condensation of the aldehydes of valerian, enantol and vinegar), was a remarkable composer, but within limits. He invented wonderfully flavorful, sexy melodies, over and over again, and altogether he had an unusual sense for piquant detail. It was possible, therefore, to extract "Kismet" from his work, and in his B minor Symphony what works best is a character piece like the scherzo or a movement like the Andante whose character is primarily lyric or melodic. When he tries hardest to be symphonic, as in his motto-ridden first movement, he is apt to be clumsy and artificial. The best of him has enormous vitality and charm, and so, even with its unsolved problems, the Second Symphony gives great pleasure, particularly in so good a performance as the one yesterday afternoon.

Thomas did everything with assurance, brio, intelligence and taste, and the difficult Stravinsky Symphony got an especially impressive performance. The Boston Symphony's playing was on a high level of excellence. There were occasional glaring blemishes, like the wild intonation of the harp-and-clarinet dialogue at the beginning of the Borodin slow movement ("hey, do you know where D flat is?"), but most of the playing was a firm and spirited declaration of "listen, we really are a first-rate orchestra." Ralph Gomberg's playing of the many oboe solos in the Stravinsky was an outstanding achievement instrumentally and as an assertion of musical taste.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS
14,900

OCT 1 1971 New England

Near the Waterfront

A Potpourri of people, places and things . . .

By LILLIAN BONO

Understand that Frances Tomasello is vacationing in Europe. . .

* * *

Happy birthday greetings are extended to Vincent M. Russo of Maynard; Peter Lombardi of Natick, Joseph Picariello of Saugus; Sal Barbaro; Dominic Romano; A. Roscioli; Anthony Meola; Rubin Epstein; Mel Massucco; Joseph Timilty; Modest Mele; Phil Cacciatore; Stanley Malvarosa; Donald Saccone; Orlando Germano; Ronald White; Richard Duca; Richard Settipane; Antoinette Mannarino; Chief Justice G. Joseph Tauro and John Driscoll.

* * *

This evening at 8:30 p.m. the Circolo Letterario Italiano will hold its first meeting at the Harvard Club in Boston. It is the club's 39th season. Commentator for the evening will be Dr. Antonio Giarraputo who will speak of Columbus' great discovery. . .

* * *

This afternoon and again tomorrow evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the B.S.O. There will be an all Russian program opening with Glinka's "Polonaise" and Krakoviak from "A Life for the Tsar, followed by Stravinsky's Symphony in C. After intermission, Mr. Thomas will conduct the first Boston Symphony performance of Edison Denisov's Chamber concerto for flute, oboe, piano and percussion. Soloists are B.S. principals Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Everett First, percussion and guest pianist Gilbert Kalish. The concert concludes with Borodin's Symphony No. 2 in B-flat.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,261

SEP 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony Russian program

Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony in an all-Russian program Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

The program will include Glinka's Polonaise and Krakoviak from "A Life for the Tsar," Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Borodin's Second Symphony and Edison Denisov's Chamber Concerto for Flute, Oboe, Piano and Percussion.

Taking part in the first Boston Symphony performance of the Denisov work are flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, oboist Ralph Gomberg, percussionist Everett Firth and pianist Gilbert Kalish.

William Steinberg conducts the opening concert of the Thursday A series Sept. 30, at 8:30 p.m. The program includes Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," and von Einem's Violin Concerto with soloist Christiane Edinger.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,261

OCT 4 1971 New England Newsclip

A U.S. first

BSO plus Thomas's Russian equation

By Louis Snyder

Michael Tilson Thomas has previously demonstrated that his concert programming has the cool logic of a mathematical equation, and in two weekend appearances at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony's associate conductor proved it again. Under the umbrella of "Music by Russian Composers," he chose symphonies by Stravinsky (in C) and Borodin (No. 2 in B minor), some dance music from Glinka's "A Life for the Tsar," and a miniconcerto by the contemporary Soviet composer, Edison (named for Thomas A.) Denisov, the latter piece a first American performance. Problem — what equals what, and why?

Of all of them only the Borodin symphony (a trail-blazer in its day) had the earmarks of what one thinks of as "Russian music," with its portentous Slavic themes and Oriental tinges, melancholy winds and daring brasses. The Stravinsky is unique unto himself, no echoes of others in this case, conscious or unconscious. The Glinka excerpts —a Polonaise and Krakoviak—adaptations of Polish rhythms, are zesty and danceable but not natively Russian in form. And what of the scarcely known Denisov?

Going it alone

The Concerto for Flute (Doriot Anthony Dwyer), Oboe (Ralph Gomberg), Piano (Gilbert Kalish), and Percussion (Everett Firth), with Mr. Thomas conducting, turned out to be for those four instruments alone, without orchestra. Published in 1968 and composed five years earlier, it is an eye- and ear-opener for those who feel that modern Soviet composers aren't permitted to stray very far from the key of C.

Using serial techniques (he is said to have been influenced in his compositions by Stravinsky, Boulez, and Nono, as well as the more advanced Russian composers), Denisov has devised a tight little work in which the four instruments join in a rhythmic Overture, have their individual musical say in a Cadenza (the percussionist says it with tom-tom, four bongos, wood block, and suspended cymbal), and conclude with a free-wheeling Coda, backed by a runaway marimba.

Tart and spare

Its effect is appealingly tart and spare, it doesn't play too long, and if nothing else it permits us to lend an ear to at least one corner of the Moscow Conservatory, where Denisov (engineer turned composer) is a lecturer. Audience response was cordial.

Dropped as it was in the middle of heartier fare, the four-way Concerto made its point rather effectively if one chooses to think that Mr. Thomas had in mind innovators and innovations, widely separated by time, as his problem for the day. Whatever, he never allowed any of the examples to become dull, in which he was aided by four virtuoso performances in the Denisov, and some outstanding sounds from Paul Fried's flute, Harold Wright's clarinet, Matthew Ruggiero's bassoon, and Charles Yancich's horn, among others, in the rest of the program.

PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
M. 25,990

OCT 5 1971 New England Newsclip

A New Season of Music

By Laura Shapiro

It's a lot more trouble to put on shoes, catch the MBTA, get there on time, stay awake and go home again than it is to sit home plugged into your components, I grant you. But life, dear reader, is short, and there are a good five or ten years at the end of it with nothing to do but watch the tube in an old people's home, so I present here some forthcoming delights in music and dance for those still undrained of life, passion and a true Greek sense of universal harmonies. Ready?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has two new creations this year: Collage and the Spectrum Concerts. Collage is a chamber group made up of six young orchestra players who in their secret lives specialize in obscure contemporary music-making. Their repertoire runs the avant-garde from Gilbert Amy to Yannis Xenakis, and the composers will be working with them whenever possible, performing, coaching or conducting. It's intended to be more of an open setting for music than the BSO has traditionally offered: the group will experiment with different ways of presenting, discussing, listening and relistening, which really has to be done with this music since some of it is so peculiar. Soprano Joan Heller and dancer Ina Hahn are also in Collage, and performance dates are being set up now for colleges in the area. You'll notice from the picture, by the way, that the musicians are not standing in rows dressed in tails, holding their instruments and looking helpless — this is a photographic first for the BSO.

The Spectrum Concerts represent a lot more firsts for the orchestra. Four Friday-Saturday spots have been taken from the regular series for it, and four Friday afternoons have become Friday nights, which is absolutely unheard of. Each concert has a theme: "A Multiples Concert," "A Stravinsky Retrospective" (two of those) and "Four Religious Ceremonies." All are conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and he's planned great programs, including the first Boston performance of Stravinsky's "Introitus" and "Requiem Canticles." Other high spots are Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum," and a David del Tredici work consisting of Jabberwocky, the Virgin Mary, a rock band, chorus, orchestra and soprano with bullhorn. The first program, October 8 and 9, features works for odd groups of instruments by Mozart, Bartok, Liszt and Steve Reich. Mr. Reich's piece, "Four Organs," calls for four rock organs and an ensemble of maracas, and somebody who's heard it says, "If you can stand the first 30 seconds it'll blow your mind." Most revolutionary about the series is that, in the earthy phrase of a BSO spokesman, "It's goddamn cheap." You can get three concerts for $6 to $11, or one concert for $3 to $5.50.

Elsewhere in Symphony Hall the regular series does not turn me on unduly, the programming can best be called safe. I suppose this was necessary to pacify the Friday/Saturday subscribers who are now having heart attacks at the thought of four rock organs. You can still go for a dollar, though, if you line up at noon on Friday and 6:30 p.m. on Saturday.

Collage — a chamber ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

new from the
B.S.O.

Spectrum Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor two series of really different concerts on Friday and Saturday evenings

A Multiples Concert

October 8 & 9, 1971

Mozart Notturno for four orchestras K. 286
Bartok Music for strings, percussion and celesta
Steve Reich Four Organs, for four rock organs and an ensemble of maracas
Liszt Hexameron for six pianos and orchestra with Raymond Lewenthal taking the part of Liszt, John Atkins, Antonio Barbosa, Gilbert Kalish, Marilyn Neeley and Ilana Vered.

A Stravinsky Retrospective

part I
January 7, 1972
Symphonies of wind instruments
Introitus
Requiem canticles
Rite of spring

A Stravinsky Retrospective

part II
January 8, 1972
Scenes de ballet
Violin concerto, Joseph Silverstein, Soloist
Symphony of psalms

Four Religious Ceremonies

March 31 and April 1, 1972
Bach Christ lag in Todesbanden, cantata no. 4
David del Tradici Pot-Pourri
Josquin des Prez Deploration on the death of Gehan Okeghem
Messiaen Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum

Series Tickets $6, $9, $11 Single tickets $3, $4.50, $5.50

Buy a Series ticket and get three concerts for the price of two.

Friday series: October 8, January 7 and March 31
Saturday Series: October 9, January 8 and April 1
All concerts begin at 8:30 p.m.
Tickets available at the Symphony Hall Box Office 266-1492

[18]

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

OCT 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Thomas to Conduct New Spectrum Series

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the opening pair of concerts of his new Spectrum Concerts series Friday at 8:30 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Created by Thomas, this new series of unusual and imaginative programs is designed to attract new audiences as well as the seasoned concert - goer. Tickets have been reasonably priced, offering the subscriber three concerts for the price of two.

Three entirely different programs have been scheduled: A Multiples Concert (Oct. 8 and 9,) A Stravinsky Retrospective (Part I, Jan. 7; Part II, Jan. 8), and Four Religious Ceremonies (March 31 and April 1).

The first program of the new series, A Multiples Concert, begins with a performance of Mozart's Notturno in D for four orchestras.

Conductors assisting Thomas in this performance are Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, Joseph Silverstein, Boston Symphony concertmaster and newly appointed assistant conductor of the orchestra, and Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops.

Thomas next conducts Bartok's Music for strings, percussion and celesta. Following intermission, Steve Reich's Four organs receives its first performance in Boston. Soloists are the composer, Michael Tilson Thomas, Newton Wayland, and Ayrton Pinto.

The concert concludes with a first performance by the Boston Symphony of Liszt's Hexameron for six pianos and orchestra. Soloists are Raymond Lewenthal, Gilbert Kalish, Marilyn Neeley, John Atkins, Ilana Vered, and Antonio Barbosa.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.

NOV 6 1971

★ Music

Michael Tilson Thomas is 26 years old. He is also associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And he's winning acclaim for his easy flair on the podium and his imaginative Spectrum Concerts.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.

OCT 12 1971 En Ne

Harold Banks

The Boston Symphony shed its outer dignity but none of its ingrained polish. For the first concerts in the new Spectrum series led by Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, the players performed in sports shirts and slacks. The casual attire apparently didn't damage their image. One listener assured a violinist, "You all played the Bartok as if you were wearing white ties and tails, anyway."

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

OCT 6 1971 OCT 6 1971 New England Newsclip

Concert series starts Friday

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts an opening of his new Spectrum Concerts series Friday.

Two concerts are planned at 8:30 p.m. Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, Boston. Created by Thomas, this new series of unusual and imaginative programs is designed to attract new audiences as well as the seasoned concert - goer.

Tickets have been reasonably priced, offering the subscriber three concerts for the price of two. Three entirely different programs have been scheduled: A Multiples Concert (October 8 and 9), A Stravinsky Retrospective (Part I, January 7; Part II, January 8), and Four Religious Ceremonies (March 31 and April 1).

Commenting on the new series, Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees, said, "I expect to hear every 'Spectrum Series' program, and to find in them new insights into this endlessly fascinating art, new dimensions, and new beauties of which I have been unaware."

The first program of the new series, A Multiples Concert, begins with a performance of Mozart's Notturno in D for four orchestras.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,212 SUN

OCT 10 1971 New England Newsclip

Classical set plays it safe

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

The theater season is ailing, we're told; its symptoms including status quoism, revivals of old, sure-fire hits, and darkened houses. The movies are in a similar state with lots of reruns and a handful of new important films. And the music season, I'm afraid, does not hold out great promise, either. It has been a chronic case for years.

With a few striking exceptions, most of the repertory — orchestral, chamber, vocal — is safe and audience-approved. My estimate is that the repertory falls somewhere withing "the 50 and 150 most frequently performed" category.

As for guest performers, they are mostly old familiar faces.

What to look forward to, then?

Two new series from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first, "Spectrum," is the creation of Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas and was originally to have been called "Series X." Scheduled for Friday and Saturday nights at accessible prices, the programs will include a Stravinsky Retrospective (Jan. 7 and 8) and Four Religious Ceremonies (March 31 and April 1) that features Del Tredici's "Potpourri" for Jabberwocky, Soprano, and Bullhorn among other things.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 219,540 S. 104,951

OCT 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Spectrum Friday, Saturday

Michel Tilson Thomas will conduct the opening program of the new Boston Symphony Spectrum Concerts this Friday and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Created by Thomas, the new series is designed to attract new audiences as well as the seasoned concert-goer. Tickets have been reasonably priced, offering the subscriber three concerts for the price of two.

Three different programs have been scheduled: "A Multiples Concert" (Oct. 8 and 9), "A Stravinsky Retrospective" (Part I, Jan. 7; Part II, Jan. 8), and "Four Religious Ceremonies" (Mar. 31 and April 1).

The opening program will include Mozart's Notturno in D for four orchestras, with conductors Arthur Fiedler, Joseph Silverstein and Harry Ellis Dickson assisting Thomas; Bartok's Music for Strings, percussion and celesta; Steve Reich's "Four Organs, with Thomas, Newton Wayland, Ayrton Pinto and the composer as soloists; and (Liszt's Hexameron for Six Pianos and Orchestra, with soloists Raymond Lewenthal, Gilbert Kalish, Marilyn Neeley, John Atkins, Ilana Vered and Antonio Barbosa.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,[illegible]

OCT 8 1971 New England Newsclip

By Paul Buck Hoeffler

Spectrum swinger

Michael Tilson Thomas, Boston Symphony's associate conductor, initiates a new BSO Spectrum series of old and contemporary music jointly programmed on Oct. 8-9 ("A Multiples Concert"); a Stravinsky Retrospective (part 1—Jan. 7; part 2—Jan. 8), and "Four Religious Ceremonies" (March 31-April 1). All are at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

NOV 15 1971

MIRRORS OF OUR TIME

Shaking Up the Musical Establishment

By ROY HEMMING

AMERICA'S musical "establishment" was being shaken up from all directions this fall.

On New York's Broadway, a stage production of Jesus Christ, Superstar had audiences and critics sharply divided. Some hailed it as the most exciting musical production to reach Broadway since Hair revolutionized the style and content of musical shows. Some (including religious spokesmen) praised the attempt of Superstar authors, Britain's Tim Rice and Andrew Lloyd Webber, to tell the story of Jesus' last seven days in contemporary language as a rock opera – thereby reaching many young people "turned off" by traditional religious messages.

But there were plenty of critics too. They fell into two major categories: those who liked the idea of the show but disliked either the cast or director Tom O'Horgan's production, and those (including religious spokesmen) who objected to what one critic called "the selling of the Savior." Several Jewish groups also charged that the show has an undercurrent of anti-Semitism in some parts – a charge the authors have vigorously denied.

Zodiac
Superstars: super-flack Jeff Fenholt

Whatever the arguments pro and con about Jesus Christ, Superstar, it quickly became a hit – with performances sold out for months ahead, and with some available tickets being sold by Broadway "scalpers" at $75 each. (Senior will take an in-depth look at "Rock and the Jesus Movement" in its Dec. 13 issue.)

Elsewhere in New York, the concert life of the nation's "music capital" was being shaken up by the New York Philharmonic's new music director, Pierre Boulez. He took over from the popular Leonard Bernstein in September, amid all sorts of dire predictions that his championing of contemporary music would drive away most of the Philharmonic's audience. Many subscribers did indeed cancel this year, but more than half the cancellations were made up by ticket sales to new subscribers. Moreover, the first Boulez series to sell out this season was an all-avant garde series being held in a theatre in Greenwich Village, at which Boulez and other musicians play and discuss new music in an informal atmosphere.

Columbia — Paul J. Hoeffler
Boulez, Thomas: new ideas, new dress

In a 1969 interview with Senior, Boulez lashed out at the stuffy atmosphere at most concerts, particularly the conductor and orchestra having to wear formal "evening dress" or "tails." "You don't put on a powdered wig to play Mozart, so why should we wear tails?" he complained. "They represent the style of a century ago. If I would be a music director, I would immediately forbid formal tails for the performers." And this fall he did just that. Instead of tails, both he and the orchestra now wear tuxedos.

A much more revolutionary change in attire came from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has long been billed as "the aristocrat of orchestras." Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, 26, had the orchestra's players turn out in multicolored sport shirts for his first in a new series of Spectrum concerts, aimed at attracting a new and younger audience to the BSO.

Thomas' innovations went much deeper than dress, however. He programmed five works around a single theme, and spoke briefly (and entertainingly) to the audience about each of the pieces before they were played. The pieces ranged over different periods (from Gabrieli to the super-modern Steve Reich), and were climaxed by the first known public performance anywhere of Liszt's Hexameron for six pianos and orchestra. The first six rows of seats in Boston's Symphony Hall had to be removed in order to extend the stage to hold all the grand pianos plus the full symphony orchestra. Perhaps more than any other "new generation" conductor, Thomas believes in concerts as fun and entertainment as well as intellectual stimulation – and his Liszt Hexameron proved it.

PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 25,000

OCT 26 1971

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted four orchestras, four rock organs and six pianos October 8 and 9 in the first of the "new from the BSO" Spectrum concerts, designed to draw all you alienated, disaffected young folks into Symphony Hall at long last. It worked, too. Except for about half the floor the Hall was full of kids. It was just like a movie theater, except everyone was much more dressed up than the orchestra players, who wore casual shirtsleeves in solid colors. I guess so you could relate to them. There was a nice personal feeling to the evening, as if they were performing because they thought we'd like it and not because they had to plow out another series concert, note after bored note. Thomas introduced each piece, one of the most successful attempts I've seen of someone on stage trying to include the audience in what was going on, not at all academic or patronizing.

The theme was "Multiples" and it began with the Mozart "Notturno in D" (K. 286) for four orchestras – little ones, two on stage and two out in the halls off the balcony. Thomas and Arthur Fiedler conducted the stage and Joseph Silverstein and Harry Ellis Dickson took the other two; they were all hitched up with television. The piece itself is a game of echoes, from stage to balcony; so you get the delightful vision of Michael Tilson Thomas passionately conducting rows of empty chairs, while the music drifts in from behind. This was followed by an antiphonal interlude not on the program, a Gabrieli canzone for brass played from either side of the first balcony, and then a good performance of Bartok's beautiful "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta."

Steve Reich's "Four Organs" got both cheers and boos. "You just soak in this wonderful bath of E major 9th and 11th chords," said Thomas optimistically. The idea is that you really care where the note comes from, and when; the fact that it's the same note, with bare variations, is part of the deal. Four rock organs were clustered in front of the stage, lit by little red lamps, and Thomas, Reich, Newton Wayland and Ayrton Pinto were at the keyboards. Behind them sat four men each holding two maracas, which they tapped evenly on their thighs, and tapped and tapped and tapped. Their faces as they tapped in the dim light got grimmer and grimmer. The work is not boring, actually, because it's so very intense, and the sound of an electric organ is deep and wide enough to hear lots of others things in. Mesmerizing may be the word. I'm not sure what it would be like stoned but that's probably also part of the deal. Although groovy as the new BSO image is I doubt if they're up to slipping a smoke in your ticket envelope. An added effect was that the seats kept vibrating, like Magic Fingers in a motel bed.

The last number was the first performance anywhere in the world ever of the Liszt "Hexameron" for six pianos and orchestra. Liszt and five other piano whizzes of the day (Chopin, Thalbert, Pixis, Herz and Czerny) had to write variations on the march from Bellini's "I Puritani." It was supposed to be for a charity concert for Italian refugees. Evidently four of the whizzes left town before the performance, so Liszt and Thalbert had to play the whole thing rearranged for two pianos. They really could have kept the six and just changed seats, but the other way there was more room for the Italian refugees who were flooding Paris at the time. Anyway, it was never done as Liszt had intended until this performance, with Marilyn Neeley, John Atkins, Ilana Vered and Antonio Barbosa taking the parts of the four who split, and Raymond Lewenthal and Gilbert Kalish as the two who stayed to play. It's a very funny piece, especially when all six are pounding away together; they're all trying to out-flourish each other and the music is hilarious. The next Spectrum concerts take place in January, all Stravinsky, so come. ■

Michael Tilson Thomas

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

NOV 15 197

MIRRORS OF OUR TIME

Shaking Up the Musical Establishment

By ROY HEMMING

AMERICA'S musical "establishment" was being shaken up from all directions this fall.

On New York's Broadway, a stage production of Jesus Christ, Superstar had audiences and critics sharply divided. Some hailed it as the most exciting musical production to reach Broadway since Hair revolutionized the style and content of musical shows. Some (including religious spokesmen) praised the attempt of Superstar authors, Britain's Tim Rice and Andrew Lloyd Webber, to tell the story of Jesus' last seven days in contemporary language as a rock opera – thereby reaching many young people "turned off" by traditional religious messages.

But there were plenty of critics too. They fell into two major categories: those who liked the idea of the show but disliked either the cast or director Tom O'Horgan's production, and those (including religious spokesmen) who objected to what one critic called "the selling of the Savior." Several Jewish groups also charged that the show has an undercurrent of anti-Semitism in some parts – a charge the authors have vigorously denied.

Zodiac
Superstar: super-flack Jeff Fenholt

Whatever the arguments pro and con about Jesus Christ, Superstar, it quickly became a hit – with performances sold out for months ahead, and with some available tickets being sold by Broadway "scalpers" at $75 each. (Senior will take an in-depth look at "Rock and the Jesus Movement" in its Dec. 13 issue.)

Elsewhere in New York, the concert life of the nation's "music capital" was being shaken up by the New York Philharmonic's new music director, Pierre Boulez. He took over from the popular Leonard Bernstein in September, amid all sorts of dire predictions that his championing of contemporary music would drive away most of the Philharmonic's audience. Many subscribers did indeed cancel this year, but more than half the cancellations were made up by ticket sales to new subscribers. Moreover, the first Boulez series to sell out this season was an all-avant garde series being held in a theatre in Greenwich Village, at which Boulez and other musicians play and discuss new music in an informal atmosphere.

Columbia Paul J. Hoeffler
Boulez, Thomas: new ideas, new dress

In a 1969 interview with Senior, Boulez lashed out at the stuffy atmosphere at most concerts, particularly the conductor and orchestra having to wear formal "evening dress" or "tails." "You don't put on a powdered wig to play Mozart, so why should we wear tails?" he complained. "They represent the style of a century ago. If I would be a music director, I would immediately forbid formal tails for the performers." And this fall he did just that. Instead of tails, both he and the orchestra now wear tuxedos.

A much more revolutionary change in attire came from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has long been billed as "the aristocrat of orchestras." Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, 26, had the orchestra's players turn out in multi-colored sport shirts for his first in a new series of Spectrum concerts, aimed at attracting a new and younger audience to the BSO.

Thomas' innovations went much deeper than dress, however. He programmed five works around a single theme, and spoke briefly (and entertainingly) to the audience about each of the pieces before they were played. The pieces ranged over different periods (from Gabrieli to the super-modern Steve Reich), and were climaxed by the first known public performance anywhere of Liszt's Hexameron for six pianos and orchestra. The first six rows of seats in Boston's Symphony Hall had to be removed in order to extend the stage to hold all the grand pianos plus the full symphony orchestra. Perhaps more than any other "new generation" conductor, Thomas believes in concerts as fun and entertainment as well as intellectual stimulation – and his Liszt Hexameron proved it.

PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 25,000

OCT 26 1971

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted four orchestras, four rock organs and six pianos October 8 and 9 in the first of the "new from the BSO" Spectrum concerts, designed to draw all you alienated, disaffected young folks into Symphony Hall at long last. It worked, too. Except for about half the floor the Hall was full of kids. It was just like a movie theater, except everyone was much more dressed up than the orchestra players, who wore casual shirtsleeves in solid colors. I guess so you could relate to them. There was a nice personal feeling to the evening, as if they were performing because they thought we'd like it and not because they had to plow out another series concert, note after bored note. Thomas introduced each piece, one of the most successful attempts I've seen of someone on stage trying to include the audience in what was going on, not at all academic or patronizing.

The theme was "Multiples" and it began with the Mozart "Notturno in D" (K. 286) for four orchestras – little ones, two on stage and two out in the halls off the balcony. Thomas and Arthur Fiedler conducted the stage and Joseph Silverstein and Harry Ellis Dickson took the other two; they were all hitched up with television. The piece itself is a game of echoes, from stage to balcony; so you get the delightful vision of Michael Tilson Thomas passionately conducting rows of empty chairs, while the music drifts in from behind. This was followed by an antiphonal interlude not on the program, a Gabrieli canzone for brass played from either side of the first balcony, and then a good performance of Bartok's beautiful "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta."

Steve Reich's "Four Organs" got both cheers and boos. "You just soak in this wonderful bath of E major 9th and 11th chords," said Thomas optimistically. The idea is that you really care where the note comes from, and when; the fact that it's the same note, with bare variations, is part of the deal. Four rock organs were clustered in front of the stage, lit by little red lamps, and Thomas, Reich, Newton Wayland and Ayrton Pinto were at the keyboards. Behind them sat four men each holding two maracas, which they tapped evenly on their thighs, and tapped and tapped and tapped. Their faces as they tapped in the dim light got grimmer and grimmer. The work is not boring, actually, because it's so very intense, and the sound of an electric organ is deep and wide enough to hear lots of others things in. Mesmerizing may be the word. I'm not sure what it would be like stoned but that's probably also part of the deal. Although groovy as the new BSO image is I doubt if they're up to slipping a smoke in your ticket envelope. An added effect was that the seats kept vibrating, like Magic Fingers in a motel bed.

The last number was the first performance anywhere in the world ever of the Liszt "Hexameron" for six pianos and orchestra. Liszt and five other piano whizzes of the day (Chopin, Thalbert, Pixis, Herz and Czerny) had to write variations on the march from Bellini's "I Puritani." It was supposed to be for a charity concert for Italian refugees. Evidently four of the whizzes left town before the performance, so Liszt and Thalbert had to play the whole thing rearranged for two pianos. They really could have kept the six and just changed seats, but the other way there was more room for the Italian refugees who were flooding Paris at the time. Anyway, it was never done as Liszt had intended until this performance, with Marilyn Neeley, John Atkins, Ilana Vered and Antonio Barbosa taking the parts of the four who split, and Raymond Lewenthal and Gilbert Kalish as the two who stayed to play. It's a very funny piece, especially when all six are pounding away together; they're all trying to out-flourish each other and the music is hilarious. The next Spectrum concerts take place in January, all Stravinsky, so come. ■

Michael Tilson Thomas

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

OCT 12 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO musical 'multiples' a 'historical happening'

By Louis Snyder

In what turned out to be a joyous historical happening, the Boston Symphony led by Michael Tilson Thomas burst out of its shell last weekend. The occasion was the first of three sets of Spectrum concerts, devised by the orchestra's brilliant young associate conductor, to give a new look to music old and new under circumstances calculated (not defiantly, but casually) to break the rather crusty mold of concert-going at Symphony Hall.

The coatless musicians looked fresh and relaxed in colored shirts and dark slacks, and Mr. Thomas prefaced each of the evening's selections with brief conversational remarks that were lucid, helpful, and unpatronizing—a candid invitation to share with him the deep interest and belief in certain music which he finds challenging, and presents as such. So in this "Multiples Concert"—each of the compositions had its basis in numbers of instruments or divisions of them—he proceeded to provide a very stimulating demonstration that organized sound still has the power to surprise, shock, charm, and amuse, given a little imagination, and considerable taste and inventiveness in the stage-managing department.

Mozart's Notturno in D for Four Orchestras began the proceedings—the multiple ensembles directed onstage by Mr. Thomas and Arthur Fiedler, and in opposite first balcony corridors by Joseph Silverstein and Harry Ellis Dickson. They achieved an echo effect, capitivating in conception, and [illegible] realized in performance with[illegible] the complex mechanics there[illegible] an unprogrammed jewel followed—Gabrieli's Canzona No. 2 of 1597—in which four sets of brasses exchanged golden sonorities across the hall at first balcony level, to chill the spine and warm the heart.

Heartwarming too was the performance of Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta, for which the orchestra was divided into two string quartets (in multiples), each backed by double basses, and joined by a formidable percussion section, harp, and one piano, which in the concluding Allegro acquires a second pair of hands. The Bartok's inclusion in a "multiple" context is certainly not incidental, even though the interplay of the sections is directed to the ear and not the eye. And Mr. Thomas and his men made it sound for all its inestimable worth.

There was bound to be a speck in the Spectrum and, for some, Steve Reich's piece "Four Organs," which is for four electric organs and four pairs of maracas, was it. Among the composer's program notes—a credo which is a spectrum in itself—he says "it begins with a short pulsing chord which gradually gets longer and longer in duration. As the chord stretches out, slowly resolving and unresolving, a sort of slow motion is created. The maracas lay down a steady grid of even eighth notes throughout, enabling the performers (four organists) to play together while mentally counting up to as much as 200 beats and more on a given cycle of sustained notes." (A "perceptible process" in "sounding music.")

This was indeed what happened for from 18 to 20 minutes with nary a decible spared. One increasingly pitied the maraca-ists, relegated to the status of automatons, and admired the organists (Mr. Reich, Mr. Thomas, Ayrton Pinto, Newton Wayland) for their skill in maintaining form and continuity through this trying piece. Mr. Thomas had previously expressed hope for unfettered listening and "involvement," which certainly helped make the work tenable first time around. But there were those who left, those who squirmed, and some who booed when "Four Organs" finally quit. The composer and the performers took it good-naturedly, as well they might. For chances are that Mr. Reich is going to leave a permanent mark on contemporary compositional thought, even if "Four Organs" doesn't.

The evening ended in grandiose style with "Hexameron" by Franz Liszt, a composer who also influenced his contemporaries, and who, in this first complete realization ever, did Mr. Reich two better by writing for six pianos and full orchestra. Liszt, on this occasion impersonated by Raymond Lewenthal, had as his virtuoso colleagues Gilbert Kalish (Thalberg), Ilana Vered (Czerny), Antonio Barbosa (Chopin), Marilyn Neeley (Pixis), and John Atkins (Herz), each of whom played his own solo variation, and joined in an "Allegro marziale" and a Finale "molto vivace quasi prestissimo" to the general delight.

Aside from the undeniable interest of each of the program's selections, and the uniformly high level of performance, this first Spectrum concert as an entity filled Symphony Hall with some of the freshest air generated there in some time. The audience (except for the few Reich dropouts) was enthralled; it departed chattering and glowing—always a good sign for the future. Next: two different Stravinsky retrospective pro[illegible] and 8.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,000

OCT 4 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO, under Thomas, launches new series

BOSTON, Mass. — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the opening pair of concerts of his new spectrum concerts series Friday evening, Oct. 8, at 8:30 and Saturday, Oct. 9 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Created by Thomas, this new series of unusual programs is designed to attract new audiences as well as the seasoned concert-goer.

Tickets have been reasonably priced, offering the subscriber three concerts for the price of two. Three entirely different programs have been scheduled:

A Multiples Concert (Oct. 8 and 9), A Stravinsky Retrospective (part I, Jan. 7, part II, Jan. 8), and four religious ceremonies (March 31 and April 1).

Commenting on the new series, Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees said, "I expect to hear every 'spectrum series' program, and to find in them new insights into this endlessly fascinating art, new diminsions, and new beauties of which I have been unaware."

The first program of the new series, A Multiples Concert, begins with a performance of Mozart's Notturno in D for four orchestras. Conductors assisting Thomas in this performance are Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, Joseph Silverstein, Boston Symphony Concertmaster and newly appointed assistant conductor of the orchestra, and Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops. Thomas next conducts Bartok's Music for strings, percussion and celesta.

Following intermission, Steve Reich's "Four organs" receives its first performance in Boston. Soloists are the composer, Michael Tilson Thomas, Newton Wayland, and Ayrton Pinto.

The concert concludes with a first performance by the Boston Symphony of Liszt's "Hexameron for six pianos and orchestra." Soloists are Raymond Lewenthal, Gilbert Kalish, Marilyn Neeley, John Atkins, Ilana Vered, and Antonio Barbosa.

Subscription prices for the three programs are $6 (second balcony), $9 (first balcony), and $11 (floor). Single tickets are $3, $4.50, and $5.50. Please contact the subscription office at Symphony Hall (617-266-1492) for further information.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the opening concert of the Tuesday A series, Tuesday evening, Oct. 5 at 8:30. Soloist is violinist Christiane Edinger. The program includes Beethoven's Sixth symphony, von Einem's Violin concerto, with soloist Christiane Edinger, and Hindemith's symphony "Mathis der Maler."

This same program will be given on Thursday evening, Oct. 7 at 8:30 as the opening concert of the 1971-1972 season of concerts in Providence, Rhode Island at the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
OCT 3 1971
New England Newsclip

'Series X' offers unusual music, bargain prices

BSO 'Spectrum' aims at new audience

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Asked if "Spectrum Concerts" was his own name for the new concert series he would begin with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Friday and Saturday evenings, Oct. 8 and 9, Michael Tilson Thomas said, no, he had really wanted to call it "Series X." He went on to tell how when he heard that a committee with representation from trustees, management, and players, was working on coming up with something new by way of concerts for the Boston Symphony to play, he went to present some of his ideas, which were then bought.

Spectrum Concerts is two series "of really different concerts" (as the BSO's flyer has it) on Friday and Saturday evenings, all led by the orchestra's young Associate Conductor. Through the 1969-70 season, the main Friday-Saturday subscription series had 24 concerts. In 1970-71, it was reduced to 22 — "to accommodate the European tour" (24 days in April), was the reason given. Like the nickel candy bar that gets smaller and smaller while holding its price, the series this year has shrunk to 20. Spectrum in a way bring it up to 23, though of course at extra cost to the customers. The orchestra is not going to get rich off Spectrum, though. The earning power of the series is that of a long-term investment in audience-building, and in that cause, the Symphony is offering one of the most spectacular bargains ever dangled before the Greater Boston music public: the series of three can be had for as little as $6 (with an $11 top), and singles run from $3 to $5.50.

Thomas calls his first program (Oct. 8, 9) a "multiples concert." It begins with Mozart's Notturno for four orchestras, K.286, which is an echo piece, and continues with an antiphonal work, Bartok's Music for strings, percussion, and celesta ("very much restudied" since his last performance here, Thomas says). Then comes Steve Reich's "Four Organs," for four rock organs and an ensemble of maracas, and finally the "Hexameron" for six pianos and orchestra by Liszt.

Steve Reich was indentified by Thomas as "a New York-type composer, in the forefront of the rebellion against the continuous use of all 12 pitches. He uses as few notes as possible, but they are beautiful notes." "Four Organs" is based on a single chord, "sumptuously spaced," which occurs first as just a chord, but which is eventually the source of broad, luscious melodies. The four electronic organs, of which Thomas will be playing one, sometimes double each other for just the length of a single note, a procedure Thomas compared to the fragmented trumpet line in the Sly and the Family Stone record of "I Can Take You Higher." Listening, he suggested, will be a bit like learning to look at one of Ad Reinhardt's black-on-black paintings.

"Hexameron," organized by Liszt and in part composed by him, was someone's idea for a benefit concert for Polish war refugees in 1837 the idea being to bring together the six most renowned pianists of the day and have them each contribute a variation on a well-known theme. The theme is the march from Bellini's "I Puritani" ("Suoni la tromba, e intrepido"), and the composers were Liszt, who provided the introduction, coda, connecting links between variations, and one variation of his own, and then Karl Czerny, Henri Herz, Peter Pixis, Sigismond Thalberg, and Chopin, to whom Liszt gave the supreme place of honor, the slow variation traditionally placed just before the end.

Only Chopin and Liszt actually appeared at the concert, said Thomas, but the other variations were written, and "Hexameron" was published in a version for solo piano from which Robert Linn made an orchestration to replace the one by Liszt which is lost. More recently Thomas found a fuller version for two pianos, and he himself has scored the new material. He describes most of the variations as an "anything you can do, I can do better" game, but describes Liszt's variation as "meditative, something like the beginning of 'Funerailles,' and Chopin's poetic slow variation does not have a bravura surface either."

The cast for this performance is headed by Raymond Lewenthal as Liszt, and includes John Atkins (Czerny), Antonio Barbosa (Chopin), Gilbert Kalish (Thalberg), Marilyn Neely (Pixis), and Ilana Vered (Herz). Thomas acknowledged the help of Jack Rohmann of the Baldwin Piano Artists Department in assembling these pianists. Did that mean they were all Baldwin people, would have be Baldwins and Steinways on stage together (tuned to the same A), or what? Thomas held his head: "Just don't ask me about that."

The second Spectrum pair (Jan. 7 and 8) is a Stravinsky Retrospective consisting of two different programs, Symphonies of Wind Instruments, Introitus, Requiem Canticles, and "Rite of Spring" on Friday, "Scenes de ballet," the Violin Concerto (Joseph Silverstein, soloist), and Symphony of Psalms, on Saturday. This tour deforce is made possible by borrowing and transferring rehearsal time from earlier weeks. "Scenes de ballet," which Stravinsky wrote in 1944 for Billy Rose's "Seven Lively Arts," has never been played by the Boston Symphony. "It's all there, and it's all masterful," says Thomas. He is, beyond that, particularly attached to "Scenes de ballet" because it is one of only two pieces, the other being "Danses concertantes," in which Stravinsky had someone else fill in parts of the orchestration, that work having been done by Thomas's own teacher, the composer Ingolf Dahl.

The final Spectrum pair happens on Good Friday and Holy Saturday (March 31, April 1), is called Four Religious Ceremonies, and includes Bach's Cantata No. 4, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," "Pop-pourri" by David del Tredici, the "Deploration" the Renaissance master Josquin des Prez wrote on the death of his teacher, Gehan Okeghem, and Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum." The piece by del Tredici, who teaches at Harvard, Thomas describes as quotations and variations, the material being Bach's chorale, "Es ist genug" (the one quoted by Berg in his Violin Concerto), something Thomas describes as Greek funeral keening, the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the Mock Turtle and Jabberwocky Songs from "Alice in Wonderland," and the orchestra includes a solo rock ensemble and amplified piano.

Speaking of his "Series X" in general, Thomas says he wants them "festive" and with a sense about them of special event. The concerts may include commentary and other special features as yet undisclosed.

The first pair includes music requiring special physical setups, the Mozart with its sub-orchestras spread around the hall, the stage extension for the six pianos of "Hexameron," and which could not therefore be done on a normal Boston Symphony subscription concert. The others represent something of a departure from the usual BSO program density and flavor, but they are only a small step beyond what is fairly typical of Thomas programs with the Boston Symphony the Philharmonia, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, and so forth. In Buffalo, where Thomas takes over as Music Director of the Philharmonic this month, he has subscription programs that run like "Viderunt omnes" by the 12th century composer, Perotin, Josquin's "Deploration," "Integrales" by Varese, "Schoen Hedwig," which is a "melodrama" for recitation and piano by Schumann, and Schumann's "Spring" No. 3, "Evocation" by Ruggles, a group of pieces by Isaac, Willaert, and other turn-of-the-16th century masters, and the Hindemith Cello Concerto. Did that mean that aside from special problems like stage extensions, programs of that range were feasible and desirable for orchestral subscription concerts? "Yup," he said.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 557,977

OCT 16 1971 New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

Mahler's 6th unwisely placed

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The conductor Frederik Prausnitz once wrote that "the placing of one work next to another is the performer's first active, and powerful, step in its interpretation," which is both sensible and wise, and altogether one of the best things ever said about program-building. The first active step Williams Steinberg took in the interpretation of Mahler's Symphony No. 6 at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert was the unwise one of playing it after the Ravel G major Piano Concerto, which had been preceded by Mozart's Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito."

The glossy, flirting-with-Gershwin world of Ravel's amusing, coolly sentimental Concerto is impossible as preparation for entry into Mahler's grim, exceedingly unglossy, lonely tragic masterpiece. I wonder, anyway, if the Mahler 6th does not really want to be on a program by itself. It is long — about 70 minutes — but it is also dense, strange, and requires hard listening. The powerful impact of Bernstein's performance here of the Beethoven 9th in April of last year owed very much to his decision to put only that one work on the program — a choice he has recently made for his Mahler performances as well — and in general I have come to feel more and more that the 9th, and the massive Bruckner an Mahler symphonies modeled on it, stand alone not just adequately, but really more effectively. It is not only a question of there length: rather, these are works thought of by their composers as ones whose performance should have a special character of solemn celebration about them. To give over a whole program to a work like the Mahler 6th is the best way to speak to that important point. Besides, it might in this case have spared us the ugly exits after each movement.

That (in Prausnitzian terms) Steinberg's first interpretive step was negative was particularly frustrating because almost all the subsequent steps were positive and strong. The performance he conducted was outstanding in its concentration, intensity, energy, and architectural cohesiveness. I had doubts about a few transitions in the finale (problems both of overdoing and underdoing), and I would have preferred a performance with more pianissimos, partly a question of careless playing, but also a product of Steinberg's unusually open, anti-mysterious view of the piece. Even given those reservations, it was an extraordinarily impressive performance, and one which except for the inadequate horn solos, was brilliantly played by the orchestra. It was an event for which to be grateful: a more sympathetic context would have raised it to a higher order of musical and human experience.

In the Ravel, we got glittering but musically brittle and hard playing from the soloist, Alexis Weissenberg, who was provided by Steinberg and the orchestra with an alert, lively accompaniment. The orchestral part bristles with all sorts of difficulties — the piano solo contrariwise being a masterful job of writing stuff that sounds much harder than it is — and there were excellently played solos by, among others, Laurence Thorstenberg (English horn), David Ohanian (French horn), Harold Wright (clarinet), and Matthew Ruggiero (bassoon). The overture, rather neutral in content but scored with uniquely Mozartean gorgeousness, had a first-rate performance, dignified but not stuffy, finely rhythmic, and with a real sense of musical character.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

OCT 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Concert series slated

BOSTON — Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts the third pair of Friday-Saturday concerts of the Orchestra's ninety-first season this week.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Oct. 16 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Steinberg opens the concert with a performance of Mozart's Overture to La clemenza di Tito, followed by Ravel's Piano concerto with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program concludes with Mahler's Symphony no. 6.

Alexis Weissenberg, born in Sofia, Bulgaria, studied in his native country and in Israel before coming to the United States to study at the Juilliard School. After his studies at Juilliard, he toured Israel, Egypt, Turkey and South America.

He made his American orchestra debut with the New York Philharmonic. Weissenberg's most recent appearance with the Boston Symphony was during the 1971 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in a performance of Tchaikovsky's First piano concerto. Michael Tilson Thomas was the conductor.

William Steinberg conducts the opening concert of the Tuesday "Cambridge" series, Tuesday evening, Oct. 12 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Soloist is pianist Jeffrey Siegel who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert which includes Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 "Pastoral," Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, and Hindemith's symphony Mathis der Maler.

Chicago - born Jeffery Siegel began his early piano studies with Rudolf Gaz. After winning the Chicago Symphony's youth concert auditions in 1957, he gave two performances of Beethoven's Third piano concerto with the Chicago Symphony. His advanced musical studies were with Rosina Lhevinne and Ilona Kabos at the Juilliard School. He was graduated with highest honors from Juilliard and won several important prizes during the following years, including the Leventritt Award. In 1965 he made his debut in London with the London Symphony, and appeared for the first time at Carnegie Hall two years later. During the past three years, Siegel has performed with many of the world's major orchestras, including the St. Louis Symphony, the Detroit Symphony, the New Orleans Philharmonic and the National Symphony.

Symphony: William Steinberg Conducts BSO in Mahler's Sixth

By HARRY NEVILLE

William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony were in fine fettle yesterday, which was a good thing since the program was the season's most difficult to date. The major work was Mahler's Sixth Symphony, a sprawling work that presents all manner of difficulties.

Balance and coordination, always problems in Mahler, left something to be desired but these matters were nothing near the stumbling blocks they proved to be in last season's performances of the Mahler Seventh. It seems likely, too, that the technical quality of the performance is destined to improve at tonight's repeat concert.

Steinberg is not this listener's idea of an ideal Mahler conductor. He seldom makes as much as he might of the neurotic aspects of the music — the quality that has been labeled "Viennese soul-searching" — and he doesn't often project enough fantasy onto those brief magical moments that continually pop up in Mahler — the opening bars of the Sixth's finale, for example.

YESTERDAY'S performance was still strong and satisfying, however — primarily because of his superlative choice of tempos. Unlike many other conductors, he chose a speed that really conveyed the spirit of the first movement's "Allegro energico" marking, and yet there was no feeling of rush. His tempo for the scherzo was a shade slower than in most performances, and it seemed exactly right for this movement's slightly grotesque flavor.

One could have asked for a more sensuous quality in the third movement, but it did flow nicely and its simplicity proved an effective contrast to the surrounding movements. The finale lacked bite and the proper nervous impulse, but it held together very well nevertheless. Steinberg obviously has a clear idea of the direction he wants the music to take, and his choice of tempos and dynamics made a compelling case for this most problematical of the symphony's four movements.

THERE WAS some excellent solo work from the principal flute and oboe, but Harold Wright's gorgeous tone didn't seem appropriate to some of the clarinet solos. Mahler buffs will be interested to know that C. F. Kahnt's edition was used for the performance, that the third "hammer-stroke" of the finale was omitted, and that the movements were played in Mahler's original order.

The concert opened with a bright, clean-cut performance of the overture to Mozart's "La Clemenzo di Tito," after which Alexis Weissenberg performed Ravel's Piano Concerto in G. It was on the whole a stylish performance, not overly sentimental, perhaps a bit too remote and detached. The solo part didn't always come through with ideal clarity, but I'm not sure if that was the fault of the soloist or of the conductor.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

OCT 16 1971 New England

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
W. 4,093

OCT 7 1971 New England Newsclip

SAKONNET TIMES
PORTSMOUTH, R. I.
W. 3,737

OCT 7 1971

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.
W. 4,600

OCT 8 1971

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

OCT 8. 1971 New England Newsclip

1971-1972 Music Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra has scheduled three evening appearances in Providence this year, the first tonight at 8:30 with William Steinberg conducting works by Beethoven, Einem, and Hindemith. On November 18 Seiji Ozawa will be guest conductor and on Dec 16 a Christmas concert will feature Aldo Ceccato as conductor. All concerts will take place in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Tickets are available from Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass 02115 and from Avery Piano Company, 256 Weybosset St, Providence (421 1434).

TIMES-GAZETTE
WARREN, R. I.
W. 2,825

OCT 7 1971

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.
W. 4,600

AUG 13 1971 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

SEP 5 1971

Music Last Night

Steinberg Brings Hindemith, Einem, Beethoven to R.I.

By EDWIN SAFFORD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought along a slip of a German girl last night for its opening Providence concert of the season at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Her name is Christiane Edinger and she played Gottfried von Einem's violin concerto, with William Steinberg conducting, while the rest of the program contained the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony and the "Mathis der Maler" Symphony of Hindemith.

In advance the Einem concerto held most interest. And it turned out interestingly even though it is hardly revolutionary.

You can hear shades of Liszt, Richard Strauss and, at the very end, Mahler here and there in the piece, but rather as if they had been invited in more than being strongly influential. It must be admitted a Strauss vocal line, plus an orchestrational touch or two, were most evident.

Yet this is a concerto, no mistake, and it has variety as well as rhythmic interest. The third movement is largely a duet between soloist and bongo drums, indeed. Elsewhere, too, syncopations add to its enjoyment. If the individual personality might not be recognized until a third or fourth meeting, at least there is personality.

Miss Edinger gave the work a truly distinguished performance. She played like a violinist, not a "lady violinist," nor worse, in an aggressive, mock-masculine way. Her tone was songful and carrying as required and at all times pitch was accurate.

Since the concerto gave her almost no respite in technical demands, either, and very little pause for refreshment, she can be called master of this particular concerto. She is, by the way, a Berliner who has received training in Europe and at Juilliard.

The evening began a bit too much in relaxed fashion. Beethoven, under Steinberg's direction, was more classical, really, than his Sixth Symphony is able to sustain. In the main it made good background music for a post-dinner nap.

Boston Symphony Will Present Three Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 88th consecutive season of concerts in Providence opens on Thursday, Oct 7, at 8:30 p m in the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium.

Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts. Two other concerts, both Thursdays at 8:30 p m in the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium are Nov 18 and Dec 16.

Soloist with Mr Steinberg for the opening concert on Oct 7 is violin soloist Christiane Edinger. The program opens with a performance of Beethoven's Symphony 6, followed by the Einem Violin concerto. The concert concludes with Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

The second concert of the series, Nov 18, is conducted by Seiji Ozawa. The program includes Xenakis' "Polla ta dina," Beethoven's Symphony 4 and Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony, the "Pathetique."

The final concert of the series takes place Dec 16 and is conducted by Aldo Ceccato. The program is Corelli's Concerto grosso in G "Christmas Concerto," Mendelssohn's First Symphony and Dvorak's Symphony 9, the "New World."

Subscriptions for the three concerts are available until Sept 1 from the subscription office, Box PR, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass 02115. After Sept 1, subscriptions may be purchased at the Avery Piano Co, 256 Weybosset Street, Providence, telephone GA4-1434.

The music calendar, full and attractive

LOOKING FORWARD to the 1971-72 music calendar tends to hasten its arrival, quicken its passing. All the same, there is fun in the anticipation, especially as the coming season looks attractive and full in so many large and small ways.

We are to have eight concerts by the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra at Veterans Auditorium, six under Francis Madeira's direction (Oct. 23, Nov. 20, Dec. 18, Jan. 29, April 8 and 29), one with guest conductor Paul Vermel, of the Portland Symphony Orchestra (March 4), and one with the orchestra's newly named assistant conductor, George Kent (May 20). There are to be three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Oct. 7, Nov. 18 and Dec. 16, all in Veterans Auditorium) and one by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra (March 12 at Roberts Hall, RIC).

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

AUG 18 1971 New England Newsclip

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127

SEP 13 1971 New England Newsclip

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127

OCT 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony In Three Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Providence concert series this year includes three Thursday evening programs in Veterans Memorial Auditorium. It is the orchestra's 88th season here.

The opening concert will be on Oct. 7 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg will conduct, and Christiane Edinger, violinist, is guest soloist.

Two guest conductors will direct the remaining programs. Seiji Ozawaon Nov. 18 and Aldo Ceccato on Dec. 16.

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Opens Season In Providence

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with William Steinberg conducting and Christine Edinger, a young and talented violinist, as guest artist, opened its 91st season in Providence Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F, the "Pastoral" with its musical paintings of sun-kissed meadows and crystal brooks, its rustic festival and summer tempest, was the main work of the evening, requiring the entire opening half of the program. An overflow audience gave them resounding applause.

Christine Edinger gave a superb performance of Gottfried von Einem's "Violin Concerto, opus 33" which was a balanced composition of contrasting tonal beauty and distorted harmonics and rhythms which she played with a virtuoso finesse. The orchestra's faultless accompaniment and Steinberg's sensitive interpretation of phrase and mood brought an ovation to Miss Edinger that lasted through three recalls.

The concluding work, that ran a half hour beyond the Boston's usual closing time, was Hindemuth's musical imagery of three allegorical paintings of Mathis Gothart Nithart-"Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "Temptation of St. Anthony."

The "Angelic Concert" was sublimely beautiful, the "Entombment" was sobbingly solemn, and the "Temptation" was shudderingly gruesome, particularly so after the most beautiful of all of Beethoven's symphonies, and paeons of praise in the "Angelic Concert."

C.H.L.

Symphony plans fall concert series

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's eighty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in New York City opens on Oct. 27 at 8:30 p.m. in Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the opening concerts. Dates for the five Wednesday-Friday pairs of concerts at Philharmonic Hall are Oct. 27-29, December 1-3, January 12-14, February 9-11, and April 5-7.

The Orchestra will also play four Saturday evening concerts at Carnegie Hall opening October 30, followed by January 15, February 12, and April 8. The new starting time for concerts at Carnegie Hall is 8 p.m.

Subscriptions for the series of five concerts at Philharmonic Hall are available from the Subscription Office, Box PR, Symphony Hall, Boston until September 1. After September 1, subscriptions will be available at the Philharmonic Hall Box Office at Lincoln Center.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

AUG 18 1971

PEDDLER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
13,000

OCT 23 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony celebrates its 90th birthday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrates its 90th birthday Friday, Oct. 22, in Symphony Hall with a special concert conducted by former music director Erich Leinsdorf with alto soloist Lili Chookasian at 2 p.m. The concert includes music from the Orchestra's first concert which took place Saturday, Oct. 22, 1881, at 8 p.m. in the Boston Music Hall. Sir George Henschel, the Orchestra's first music director, conducted with Annie Louise Cary, alto soloist.

Erich Leinsdorf opens the special birthday concert with Weber's Jubel-Overture, followed by Miss Chookasian's performances with the Orchestra of Bruch's "Penelope's mourning" from Odysseus, Gluck's "Che faro senza Euridice" from Orfeo and Euridice, and Brahms' Two songs for contralto, with viola and piano. In order to give some of the flavor of the Orchestra's first concert in 1881 when Mr. Henschel accompanied Miss Cary at the piano during the concert. Mr. Leinsdorf will accompany Miss Chookasian with Burton Fine, violist, in Brahms' Two songs for contralto, ciola and piano. The concert concludes with music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet.

The fourth concert of the Saturday evening series takes place Oct. 23 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts performances of Schumann's Second symphony and music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet. This same concert opened the Tuesday "B" series, Tuesday evening, Oct. 19.

Mr. Leinsdorf directs the first of the Orchestra's six Open Rehearsals of the Ninety-first season Thursday evening, Oct. 21 at 7:30 p.m. Subscription prices for the series of six Open Rehearsals are $15, and $3 for single seats. All seats are unreserved and proceeds from the sale of tickets and subscriptions benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Please call the Symphony Hall Box Office at 266-1492 for further information on this and all other concert series.

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

OCT 21 1971 New England Newscli

Symphony Orchestra To Observe 90th Birthday, Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrates its ninetieth birthday Friday, Oct. 22, in Symphony Hall with a special concert conducted by former music director Erich Leinsdorf with alto soloist Lili Chookasian at 2 p.m.

The concert includes music from the Orchestra's first concert which took place Saturday, October 22, 1881 at 8 p.m. in the Boston Music Hall. Sir George Henschel, the Orchestra's first Music Director conducted with Annie Louise Cary, alto soloist.

Erich's Leinsdorf opens the special birthday concert with Weber's "Jubel-Overture," followed by Miss Chookasian's performances with the Orchestra of Bruch's "Penelope's mourning" from "Odysseus," Gluck's "Che faro senza Euridice" from "Orfeo and Euridice," and Brahms' Two songs for contralto, with viola and piano. In order to give some of the flavor of the Orchestra's first concert in 1881, when Mr. Henschel accompanied Miss Cary at the piano during the concert, Leinsdorf will accompany Miss Chookasian with Burton Fine, violist, in Brahms' Two songs for contralto, viola and piano. The concert concludes with music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet."

The fourth concert of the Saturday evening series takes place Oct 23 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts performances of Schumann's Second symphony and music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet.

Mr. Leinsdorf directs the first of the Orchestra's six Open Rehearsals of the Ninety-first season Thursday evening, Oct. 21 at 7:30 p.m. All seats are unreserved and proceeds from the sale of tickets and subscriptions benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

OCT 21 1971

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

OCT 21 1971

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

OCT 21 1971

Symphony celebrates its 90th birthday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrates its 90th birthday Friday, Oct. 22, in Symphony Hall with a special concert conducted by former music director Erich Leinsdorf with álto soloist Lili Chookasian at 2 p.m. The concert includes music from the Orchestra's first concert which took place Saturday, Oct. 22, 1881, at 8 p.m. in the Boston Music Hall. Sir George Henschel, the Orchestra's first music director, conducted with Annie Louise Cary, alto soloist.

Erich Leinsdorf opens the special birthday concert with Weber's Jubel-Overture, followed by Miss Chookasian's performances with the Orchestra of Bruch's "Penelope's mourning" from Odysseus, Gluck's "Che faro senza Euridice" from Orfeo and Euridice, and Brahms' Two songs for contralto, with viola and piano. In order to give some of the flavor of the Orchestra's first concert in 1881 when Mr. Henschel accompanied Miss Cary at the piano during the concert. Mr. Leinsdorf will accompany Miss Chookasian with Burton Fine, violist, in Brahms' Two songs for contralto, ciola and piano. The concert concludes with music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet.

The fourth concert of the Saturday evening series takes place Oct. 23 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts performances of Schumann's Second symphony and music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet. This same concert opened the Tuesday "B" series, Tuesday evening, Oct. 19.

Mr. Leinsdorf directs the first of the Orchestra's six Open Rehearsals of the Ninety-first season Thursday evening, Oct. 21 at 7:30 p.m. Subscription prices for the series of six Open Rehearsals are $15, and $3 for single seats. All seats are unreserved and proceeds from the sale of tickets and subscriptions benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Please call the Symphony Hall Box Office at 266-1492 for further information on this and all other concert series.

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

OCT 21 1971 Ne Engl

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

OCT 22 1971 New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf conducts a Boston Symphony 90th Birthday Concert tomorrow at 2 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Miss Lili Chookasian will be alto soloist.

Music from BSO's first concert in 1881 includes Weber's "Jubel Overture" followed by Miss Chookasian's performances with the orchestra in Bruch's "Penelope's Mourning" from Odysseus, Gluck's "Che faro Senza Euridice" from "Orfeo and Euridice" and Brahms' Two Songs for Contralto with viola and piano. The concert will conclude with music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet." Saturday evening's 8:30 performance will include music by Schumann and Prokofiev.

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
W. 5,150

OCT 21 1971 New England Newsclip

BOB DAVIS

The Arts Views Reviews and Pre-views to elementary school children (last weeks column) I would think the Fitchburg showing would be great for classes in junior and senior high schools. At any rate it will hang through November 1 and is open Tuesday thru Saturday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., and Sunday afternoon from 2 to 5 p.m. Admission free.

On Friday, October 22nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents its ninetieth birthday concert. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct and Lili Chookasian will be the contralto soloist. The program will include Prokofiev's music from "Romeo and Juliet", Weber's "Jubel-Overture," and Glucks Arias and Incidental music from "Orfeo". Leinsdorf will also conduct on Saturday the 23rd. He will do Schumann's second symphony and repeat the "Romeo and Juliet".

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

OCT 20 1971 New England Newsclip

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

OCT 20 1971

Boston orchestra is 90 years old Friday

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrates its ninetieth birthday Friday in Symphony Hall with a special concert conducted by former music director Erich Leinsdorf with alto soloist Lili Chookasian at 2 p.m. The concert includes music from the Orchestra's first concert which took place Saturday, Oct. 22, 1881, at 8 p.m. in the Boston Music Hall. Sir George Henschel, the Orchestra's first Music Director conducted with Annie Louise Cary, alto soloist.

Erish Leinsdorf opens the special birthday concert with Weber's Jubel-Overture, followed by Miss Chooksian's performances with the Orchestra of Bruch's "Penelope's mourning" from Odysseus, Gluck's "Che faro senza Euridice" from Orfeo and Euridice, and Brahms' Two songs for contralto, with viola and piano.

In order to give some of the flavor of the Orchestra's first concert in 1881 when Henschel accompanied Miss Cary at the piano during the concert, Leinsdorf will accompany Miss Chookasian with Burton Fine, violist, in Brahms' Two songs for contralto, viola and piano. The concert concludes with music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet.

The fourth concert of the Saturday evening series takes place Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Leinsdorf conducts performances of Schumann's Second symphony and music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet. This same concert opens the Tuesday "B" series Tuesday evening at 7:30 p.m.

Leinsdorf directs the first of the Orchestra's six open rehearsals of the Ninety-first season Thursday, Oct. 21 at 7:30 p.m. Subscription prices for the series of six open rehearsals are $15 and $3 for single seats. All seats are unreserved and proceeds from the sale of tickets and subscriptions benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Please call the Symphony Hall Box Office at 266-1492 for further information on this and all other concert series.

The Salt Lake Tribune
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
D. 108,270 SUN. 188,699

OCT 29 1971

90 Years Young

Nobody could have guessed it at the time but the year 1881 made at least three significant contributions to the arts. And 90 years later those contributions are still going strong.

Pablo Picasso, the giant of modern art, was born Oct. 25, 1881, in Malaga, Spain. Special showings of his paintings are being held in connection with his 90th birthday observance.

P. G. Wodehouse, the english-born humorist novelist, short story writer and playwright, was born Oct. 15, 1881. Mr. Wodehouse marked his 90th birthday by publishing his umpteenth book, "Jeeves and the Tie That Binds."

Finally, 1881 was the first year for the Boston Symphony, the nation's second oldest symphony orchestra and long one of its best.

If, as the once popular book says, "life begins at 40," Picasso, Wodehouse and the Boston Symphony are zesty proof that it doesn't have to end at 90.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 232,064 SUN. 275,535

OCT 28 1971

Mrs. Strauss To Attend Meeting

Mrs. Theodore H. Strauss, president of the Women's Association for Symphony Orchestras, will be in Boston next week attending the annual convention of WASO. Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, Mass., vice president and chairman of the education committee, will be hostess for the Monday through Thursday event.

Business sessions during the day will be followed by entertainment during the evenings. The 32 member clubs will be the guests of the president and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a performance of the orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

OCT 21 1971 New Englai Newsc

Leinsdorf Returns For BSO's 90th

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrates its 90th birthday Friday in Symphony Hall with a special concert conducted by former music director Erich Leinsdorf. Lili Chookasian is alto soloist.

The program at 2 p.m. includes music from the orchestra's first concert, which took place Saturday, Oct. 22, 1881, at 8 p.m. in the Boston Music Hall. Sir George Henschel, the BSO's first music director, conducted with Annie Louise Cary, alto soloist.

Leinsdorf opens the birthday concert with Weber's "Jubel-Overture," followed by Miss Chookasian's performance of Bruch's "Penelope's Mourning" from "Odysseus," Gluck's "Che faro senza Euridice" from "Orfeo and Euridice," and Brahms' Two Songs for Contralto, with viola and piano.

In order to give some of the flavor of the first concert in 1881, when Henschel accompanied Miss Cary at the piano, Leinsdorf will accompany Miss Chookasian with Burton Fine, violist, in the Brahms piece.

[2]

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

OCT 21 1971 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

BSO does justice to Schumann works

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf as guest conductor, opened its Tuesday "B" Series in Symphony Hall with a program comprising only two works — Schumann's "Symphony No. 2 in C Major" and Prokofiev's "Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet,'" Opus 64.

The Schumann, written when its composer was convalescing from a nervous disorder, seems to have in it a sort of synthesis of some of the qualities Schumann had perfected in his previous work. There is the fecund and fresh melodic and harmonic inspiration, the same charm and passion that one finds in Schumann's songs, the lofty and intimate note of his chamber music period.

Unfortunately, the symphony also has its weaknesses — the rhythmical monotony of the opening Allegro's principal subject, the too exclusive modulatory development sections of the finale. But these limitations are balanced by the Scherzo, Schumann's happiest essay in this form, and by the glowing and emotionally effective Adagio, which is, I think, the supreme point of all of Schumann's symphonies.

Maestro Leinsdorf, conducting without a score, obviously loves the work and knows it well. He led the orchestra with precision, with a nice eye for detail and dynamic range, and with a contagious enthusiasm that was communicated to his musicians.

As for the Prokofiev, it is one of the genuine masterpieces of 20th century music. Written originally for a ballet version of the Shakespeare tragedy, first performed by the Kirov Ballet in 1940, two suites selected by the composer from the work were actually performed as orchestral pieces before the ballet itself was given its world premiere.

The two sections of the work that Leinsdorf chose to perform last night included the bright Introduction, a brief tone poem representing Juliet as a young girl, the dance of the knights, a charming gavotee, the stirring and martial musical setting for Romeo's resolve to avenge Mercutio's death, and the lovely funeral music for Juliet.

For this Prokofiev gem, the orchestra was in top form, with many of its sections shining in solo work which won a merited ovation from the audience.

The second concert of the series will be performed on Nov. 16 with Seiji Ozawa as guest conductor.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

OCT 24 1971 New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

Boston Symphony Orchestra opens 'B' series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is alive, well, and still making pleasurable music at venerable Symphony Hall — or at least it was last week in the first program of the Tuesday "B" Series, with Erich Leinsdorf as guest conductor.

Maestro Leinsdorf chose Schumann's "Symphony No. 2 in C Major" and two suites from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" as the only two works on the program. Despite its occasional defects — monotonous rhythm in the Allegro and a somewhat tedious modulatory development in the Finale, the Schumann is an ingratiating piece, because of its melodic invention, its brilliant Scherzo, and its moving Adagio, the latter perhaps the high point of Schumann's symphonic writing.

As for the Prokofiev, it is nothing less than a masterpiece — one of the genuinely bright pages of 20th Century music. Leinsdorf and his musicians made it a listening delight — memorable, often touching, and filled with glorious sound.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 500,118 SUN. 657,560

OCT 19 1971

Music Notes

Four Concertos

5454

By Paul Hume

Antal Donati, having opened the National Symphony season last week with an evening of symphonies, is building this week's program out of concertos. Four of them each for a different instrumental combination, will bring symphony listeners a Handel Concerto Grosso, a Mozart Sinfonia Concertante for four solo woodwinds, the Second Violin Concerto of Bartok, and the Concerto for Orchestra by Zoltan Kodaly. Rafael Druian, concertmaster of the New York Philharmonic and a longtime associate of Dorati's, is the soloist in the Bartok.

The Argentine folk mass, "Misa Criolla," brought top prominence several years ago through a vivid recording, will be sung in Lisner Auditorium at 8 p.m. Wednesday by Los Fronterizos, with Ariel Ramirez and the Interamerican Chamber Chorus of Washington. Tickets are available at the Disc Shop and at the door.

The World Symphony Orchestra, drawing together 140 musicians from around the world to play a concert at Walt Disney World in Florida as well as in New York Philharmonic Hall and the Kennedy Center Opera House, will play its Washington program on Oct. 25, at 9 p.m.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the short-lived ensemble. The concert is under the auspices of the Federation of People-to-People Programs, 1146 16th St. NW.

At the same time the World Symphony is playing on the Opera House stage, the Boston Symphony under the direction of William Steinberg will be making its initial appearance in the Concert Hall. With Alexis Weissenberg as soloist in the Ravel G Major Piano Concerto, the program, opening with Mozart's "Titus" Overture, will close with the Mahler Sixth Symphony

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 208,095 SAT. 163,707

OCT 26 1971

Boston and First World

William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concert hall, and Arthur Fiedler and the First World Orchestra in the opera house gave the Kennedy Center its first symphonic double-header.

The Boston, coming as part of the National Symphony Orchestra Association's series, sounded magnificent in the new hall, both in chamber orchestra size for the Mozart Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito" and in full in the Ravel Piano Concerto in G.

Mr. Steinberg's Mozart everything it should be—airy graceful and buoyant.

The Ravel was no less effective with the soloist, Alexis Weissenberg, contributing a stunningly virtuoso performance in the outer movements and a sensitive one in the melodic and thoughtful Adagio.

By passing up the Mahler Symphony No. 6, I was able to hear some of the First World Symphony program which was an experience in sight as well as sound.

Filling the huge opera house stage were 145 musicians from 63 countries, 30 states and the District (Emerson Head, trumpet, and Joseph Reines, contra-bassoon).

The group has given only two concerts before last night's but no allowances need be made. It was an extremely well disciplined group with a fine sound in a truly international program covering works by an American composer (Copland), Russian (Shostakovitch), German (Wagner), Italian (Respighi) Argentine (Ginastera) and French (Offenbach).

M.B.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

NOV 4 1971 New England Newsclip

In Concert

Leinsdorf: On the Move

By Peter M. Knapp

Former Music Director Erich Leinsdorf has returned for a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony. For Tuesday night's program, he chose two works: Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C, and Scenes from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet.

Leinsdorf has joined, it appears, the jet-set conductors and since his last appearance here earlier in the year, has guest conducted in Europe, the Middle East and the United States. He looks confident, relaxed, well-fed and prosperous. Some of his gestures look casual and he has developed a kind of knee-jig, left leg limp, to his repertoire.

Done Better

His program was not the most disciplined, nor well played, Leinsdorf has presented in Boston. The Schumann symphony went very fast most of the way, with slashing phrasing, some steely violin tone and not a few moments of just plain raucous playing. Leinsdorf gave it quite a ride — and it sounded driven.

There were, however, some effective moments, neat use of crescendo and decrescendo, and the lovely adagio with its expansive, blooming melody, was expressively played. As for the finale — one of Schumann's grander symphonic statements — it was enough just to keep up with the swift pace.

The Prokofiev also suffered from ragged passages (the mandolin of the serenade in particular was far out of tune), though it ended strongly. This score has become a familiar staple in Boston in the last few years (remember when it used to be "Daphnis and Chloe"?) and Leinsdorf is one of its finest interpreters.

The conductor used his own arrangement of scenes from the complete ballet score which he first introduced in 1967. Slightly altered for the current performances, Leinsdorf's version incorporates the best of the score and music not included in the three orchestral suites.

Great Score

It is a great ballet score, full of color, originality and Prokofiev's piquant harmonic talent. Leinsdorf gives a vivid and dramatic accounting of it — most especially in the Dance of the Knights, the duel scene and death of Mercutio, and Juliet's funeral music which seldom fails to make my scalp prickle with its soaring pathos.

ERICH LEINSDORF

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 303,506 SUN. 338,862

OCT 27 1971

BOSTON SOUNDS GOOD AT CENTER

By ROBERT EVETT
Special to The Star

Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, conductor. Alexis Weissenberg, piano. At the Kennedy Center Concert Hall. Program: Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," K. 621, Mozart; Piano Concerto in G Major, Ravel; Symphony No. 6, Mahler.

Under auspices of the Washington Performing Arts Society, the Boston Symphony made its first Kennedy Center appearance Monday night. The orchestra sounds good in the hall, and the players, reportedly, were as pleased as the audience.

William Steinberg led the orchestra in a program that displayed it, first, reduced to chamber proportions, then in collaboration with a piano soloist, and finally as a full orchestra augmented with extra percussion and brass.

The big event of the evening was the performance of the Sixth Symphony of Mahler. No two conductors hear this music the same way. I thought Steinberg's interpretation was marvelous, though not without its surprises.

He took the first movement at an extremely good clip, and seemed to be working for a brittle texture, especially in the long martial episodes.

The scherzo in his hands became a nightmarish, sinister minuet, flexible in tempo, full of rubato.

The slow movement, one of the shortest in the Mahler literature, was rich almost to excess. The long, songful string lines were poignant and beautifully modeled.

Steinberg brought great urgency to the finale, a piece which in itself is of symphonic proportions, full of misleading climaxes and abrupt changes of mood.

This symphony is not a pleasant piece of music. It is profoundly tragic, and a good performance of it is bound to be a bit unnerving. This was a bitter but very beautiful reading.

Kennedy Center

SUNDAY: David Bar-Illan, pianist. Concert Hall. Program includes works by Rameau, Schubert, Ben-Haim, Chopin and Liszt; 3 p.m. Call 393-4433.

"Candide," by Leonard Bernstein. Opera House, 8 p.m. Call 254-3600.

Charles Aznavour. Concert Hall; 8:30 p.m. Call 393-4433.

MONDAY: Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, conductor; Alexis Weissenberg, piano. Concert Hall. Program includes the overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," by Mozart; Piano Concerto in C, Ravel, and Symphony No. 6, Mahler; 8:30 p.m. Call 393-4433.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 303,506 SUN. 338,862

OCT 23 1971

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

OCT 21 1971 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

BSO does justice to Schumann works

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf as guest conductor, opened its Tuesday "B" Series in Symphony Hall with a program comprising only two works — Schumann's "Symphony No. 2 in C Major" and Prokofiev's "Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet,'" Opus 64.

The Schumann, written when its composer was convalescing from a nervous disorder, seems to have in it a sort of synthesis of some of the qualities Schumann had perfected in his previous work. There is the fecund and fresh melodic and harmonic inspiration, the same charm and passion that one finds in Schumann's songs, the lofty and intimate note of his chamber music period.

Unfortunately, the symphony also has its weaknesses — the rhythmical monotony of the opening Allegro's principal subject, the too exclusive modulatory development sections of the finale. But these limitations are balanced by the Scherzo, Schumann's happiest essay in this form, and by the glowing and emotionally effective Adagio, which is, I think, the supreme point of all of Schumann's symphonies.

Maestro Leinsdorf, conducting without a score, obviously loves the work and knows it well. He led the orchestra with precision, with a nice eye for detail and dynamic range, and with a contagious enthusiasm that was communicated to his musicians.

As for the Prokofiev, it is one of the genuine masterpieces of 20th century music. Written originally for a ballet version of the Shakespeare tragedy, first performed by the Kirov Ballet in 1940, two suites selected by the composer from the work were actually performed as orchestral pieces before the ballet itself was given its world premiere.

The two sections of the work that Leinsdorf chose to perform last night included the bright Introduction, a brief tone poem representing Juliet as a young girl, the dance of the knights, a charming gavotee, the stirring and martial musical setting for Romeo's resolve to avenge Mercutio's death, and the lovely funeral music for Juliet.

For this Prokofiev gem, the orchestra was in top form, with many of its sections shining in solo work which won a merited ovation from the audience.

The second concert of the series will be performed on Nov. 16 with Seiji Ozawa as guest conductor.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

OCT 24 1971 New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

Boston Symphony Orchestra opens 'B' series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is alive, well, and still making pleasurable music at venerable Symphony Hall — or at least it was last week in the first program of the Tuesday "B" Series, with Erich Leinsdorf as guest conductor.

Maestro Leinsdorf chose Schumann's "Symphony No. 2 in C Major" and two suites from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" as the only two works on the program. Despite its occasional defects — monotonous rhythm in the Allegro and a somewhat tedious modulatory development in the Finale, the Schumann is an ingratiating piece, because of its melodic invention, its brilliant Scherzo, and its moving Adagio, the latter perhaps the high point of Schumann's symphonic writing.

As for the Prokofiev, it is nothing less than a masterpiece — one of the genuinely bright pages of 20th Century music. Leinsdorf and his musicians made it a listening delight — memorable, often touching, and filled with glorious sound.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 500,113 SUN. 657,960

OCT 19 1971

Music Notes

Four Concertos

By Paul Hume

Antal Donati, having opened the National Symphony season last week with an evening of symphonies, is building this week's program out of concertos. Four of them each for a different instrumental combination, will bring symphony listeners a Handel Concerto Grosso a Mozart Sinfonia Concertante for four solo woodwinds the Second Violin Concerto of Bartok, and the Concerto for Orchestra by Zoltan Kodaly. Rafael Druian, concertmaster of the New York Philharmonic and a longtime associate of Dorati's is the soloist in the Bartok.

The Argentine folk mass, "Misa Criolla," brought top prominence several years ago through a vivid recording, will be sung in Lisner Auditorium at 8 p.m. Wednesday by Los Fronterizos, with Ariel Ramirez and the Interamerican Chamber Chorus of Washington. Tickets are available at the Disc Shop and at the door.

The World Symphony Orchestra, drawing together 140 musicians from around the world to play a concert at Walt Disney World in Florida as well as in New York Philharmonic Hall and the Kennedy Center Opera House, will play its Washington program on Oct. 25, at 9 p.m.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the short-lived ensemble. The concert is under the auspices of the Federation of People-to-People Programs, 1146 16th St. NW.

At the same time the World Symphony is playing on the Opera House stage, the Boston Symphony under the direction of William Steinberg will be making its initial appearance in the Concert Hall. With Alexis Weissenberg as soloist in the Ravel G Major Piano Concerto, the program, opening with Mozart's "Titus" Overture, will close with the Mahler Sixth Symphony

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 308,395 SAT. 163,707

OCT 26 1971

Boston and First World

William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concert hall, and Arthur Fiedler and the First World Orchestra in the opera house gave the Kennedy Center its first symphonic double-header.

The Boston, coming as part of the National Symphony Orchestra Association's series, sounded magnificent in the new hall, both in chamber orchestra size for the Mozart Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito" and in full in the Ravel Piano Concerto in G.

Mr. Steinberg's Mozart is everything it should be—airy, graceful and buoyant.

The Ravel was no less effective with the soloist, Alexis Weissenberg, contributing a stunningly virtuoso performance in the outer movements and a sensitive one in the melodic and thoughtful Adagio.

By passing up the Mahler Symphony No. 6, I was able to hear some of the First World Symphony program which was an experience in sight as well as sound.

Filling the huge opera house stage were 145 musicians from 63 countries, 30 states and the District (Emerson Head, trumpet, and Joseph Reines, contra-bassoon).

The group has given only two concerts before last night's but no allowances need be made. It was an extremely well disciplined group with a fine sound in a truly international program covering works by an American composer (Copland), Russian (Shostakovitch), German (Wagner), Italian (Respighi), Argentine (Ginastera) and French (Offenbach).

M.B.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

NOV 4 1971 New England Newsclip

In Concert

Leinsdorf: On the Move

By Peter M. Knapp

Former Music Director Erich Leinsdorf has returned for a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony. For Tuesday night's program, he chose two works: Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C, and Scenes from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet.

Leinsdorf has joined, it appears, the jet-set conductors and since his last appearance here earlier in the year, has guest conducted in Europe, the Middle East and the United States. He looks confident, relaxed, well-fed and prosperous. Some of his gestures look casual and he has developed a kind of knee-jig, left leg limp, to his repertoire.

Done Better

His program was not the most disciplined, nor well played, Leinsdorf has presented in Boston. The Schumann symphony went very fast most of the way, with slashing phrasing, some steely violin tone and not a few moments of just plain raucous playing. Leinsdorf gave it quite a ride — and it sounded driven.

There were, however, some effective moments, neat use of crescendo and decrescendo, and the lovely adagio with its expansive, blooming melody, was expressively played. As for the finale — one of Schumann's grander symphonic statements — it was enough just to keep up with the swift pace.

The Prokofiev also suffered from ragged passages (the mandolin of the serenade in particular was far out of tune), though it ended strongly. This score has become a familiar staple in Boston in the last few years (remember when it used to be "Daphnis and Chloe"?) and Leinsdorf is one of its finest interpreters.

The conductor used his own arrangement of scenes from the complete ballet score which he first introduced in 1967. Slightly altered for the current performances, Leinsdorf's version incorporates the best of the score and music not included in the three orchestral suites.

Great Score

It is a great ballet score, full of color, originality and Prokofiev's piquant harmonic talent. Leinsdorf gives a vivid and dramatic accounting of it — most especially in the Dance of the Knights, the duel scene and death of Mercutio, and Juliet's funeral music which seldom fails to make my scalp prickle with its soaring pathos.

ERICH LEINSDORF

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 303,506 SUN. 338,862

OCT 27 1971

BOSTON SOUNDS GOOD AT CENTER

By ROBERT EVETT
Special to The Star

Boston Symphony Orchestra. William Steinberg, conductor. Alexis Weissenberg, piano. At the Kennedy Center Concert Hall. Program: Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," K. 621, Mozart; Piano Concerto in G Major, Ravel; Symphony No. 6, Mahler.

Under auspices of the Washington Performing Arts Society, the Boston Symphony made its first Kennedy Center appearance Monday night. The orchestra sounds good in the hall, and the players, reportedly, were as pleased as the audience.

William Steinberg led the orchestra in a program that displayed it, first, reduced to chamber proportions, then in collaboration with a piano soloist, and finally as a full orchestra augmented with extra percussion and brass.

The big event of the evening was the performance of the Sixth Symphony of Mahler. No two conductors hear this music the same way. I thought Steinberg's interpretation was marvelous, though not without its surprises.

He took the first movement at an extremely good clip, and seemed to be working for a brittle texture, especially in the long martial episodes.

The sherzo in his hands became a nightmarish, sinister minuet, flexible in tempo, full of rubato.

The slow movement, one of the shortest in the Mahler literature, was rich almost to excess. The long, songful string lines were poignant and beautifully modeled.

Steinberg brought great urgency to the finale, a piece which in itself is of symphonic proportions, full of misleading climaxes and abrupt changes of mood.

This symphony is not a pleasant piece of music. It is profoundly tragic, and a good performance of it is bound to be a bit unnerving. This was a bitter but very beautiful reading.

Kennedy Center

SUNDAY: David Bar-Illan, pianist. Concert Hall. Program includes works by Rameau, Schubert, Ben-Haim, Chopin and Liszt; 3 p.m. Call 393-4433.

"Candide," by Leonard Bernstein. Opera House, 8 p.m. Call 254-3600.

Charles Aznavour. Concert Hall; 8:30 p.m. Call 393-4433.

MONDAY: Boston Symphony Orchestra. William Steinberg, conductor; Alexis Weissenberg, piano. Concert Hall. Program includes the overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," by Mozart; Piano Concerto in C, Ravel, and Symphony No. 6, Mahler; 8:30 p.m. Call 393-4433.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 303,506 SUN. 338,862

OCT 23 1971

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

OCT 27 1971

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Carmen," with Ruza Baldani, Lucine Amara, Jon Vickers, Robert Merrill; Gabor Otvos (debut), conductor; 8.

New York City Opera: "Carmen," with Joy Davidson, Bianca Sauler, Michele

Davidson Weissenberg

Molese, Norman Treigle; Julius Rudel, conductor; N. Y. State Theater, 8:15.

City Center Joffrey Ballet: "Petrouchka," "Wee Wis," "Green Table"; City Center Theater, 8.

Senegalese National Dance Company; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8.

Boston Symphony: William Steinberg, conductor; Alexis Weissenberg, pianist; Mozart's Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," Ravel's "Piano Concerto in G," and Mahler's "Symphony No. 6 in A minor"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30. Opening of five-concert series.

Ralph Wade, Tenor; N.Y. Cultural Center, 2 Columbus Circle, N.Y., 8:30.

Jam Session, MUSE, 1530 Bedford Av., Brooklyn, 7:30.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

OCT 28 1971

Words & Music

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Steinberg Opens Boston Series

The Boston Symphony, long eminent, has been giving concerts here for 84 seasons. Its 85th opened last night in Philharmonic Hall with a solemn air. Mozart's Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," is the composer's last opera, completed only two months before his death. Music director William Steinberg was on the podium.

After this beginning the orchestra gamboled until the intermission by whizzing through musical water on a surfboard with Ravel's Piano Concerto in G Major. Alexis Weissenberg was the soloist. Later it took a 70 minute obstacle course with Mahler's Symphony No. 6 in D Minor.

By its contrast the program was well chosen especially because Steinberg was a penetrating stylist, conducting without aberration or prejudice. He saw through the music and illuminated it in the re-creation.

Weissenberg Understood Wit

Weissenberg also understood his way in the Ravel, turning out a most engaging expression of the composer's wit, a wit which is insouciantly thrust but infinitely careful and elegant in its detailed manner of saying.

Ravel's jazz touches are sublimated into the Gallic transparency of his style with a flair which belies the fact that its origins were an ocean away.

Weissenberg's tone is sounded with little weight but this kind of timbre suits the Ravel style while the pianist's impeccable, crisp technical account gave the piece a quick intelligence which made a delight of its conversation with the orchestra.

Steinberg's urbane collaboration, brilliantly projected by the orchestra, contributed immeasurably to the whole. The conductor's urbanity continued into the Mahler which he led from memory. I remember a feeling of utter desolation after hearing Dimitri Mitripolous lead this most pessimistic of Mahler's symphonies, the one the composer, himself, called "tragic."

Bruno Walter, Mahler's student and colleague said of the symphony: "It reeks of the bitter taste of the cup of life."

Steinberg, in a masterful interpretation, discovered in it a more varied spirit. With a structural comprehension which was overwhelming in the way everything fit, he made us hear how it is more a mosaic than any other of Mahler's symphonies. There is far less of a soaring melodic line and more of network of phrases, whether ominous as in the Scherzo, or asking but not receiving calm as in Movement II or implying transfiguration but never realizing it as in Movement IV.

Mahler once wrote to Wagner: "What a man composes is surely the whole man, his feelings, thoughts, his breathing, his suffering." This work is primarily concerned with the agony of facing life by an immensely complicated man.

His widow, Alma, called the "Sixth", "the most completely personal of his works."

Its instrumentation is personal too: the hammering of fate in repeated notes by the timpani; shudders in the strings; high screech and snort of the trumpet; calm of occasional bucolic melody; calm of celesta and cowbells.

The symphony's final movement builds to a grim, volcanic triumph yet it expires with a mere breath quickly come and gone: like life itself, a beginning and an end surrounded by a moat of mystery.

WESTPORT NEWS
WESTPORT, CONN.
SEMI-WEEKLY 10,000

OCT 29 1971

New England Newsclip

Boston batonist at Philharmonic

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the opening pair of concerts of the orchestra's 85th consecutive season of concerts in New York City, tonight and Friday night, at 8:30 p.m., at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall.

Mr. Steinberg will open the concert with a performance of Mozart's Overture to "La clemenza di Tito," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg will conduct Mahler's Sixth Symphony.

Alexis Weissenberg, born in Sofia, Bulgaria, studied in his native country and in Israel before coming to the United States to study at the Juilliard School.

William Steinberg will also conduct the first of a series of four concerts at Carnegie Hall, Saturday evening, October 30 at 8 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Sixth symphony "Pastoral," followed by a performance of Einem's Violin concerto with soloist Christiane Edinger. The concert concludes with the symphony from Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

Boston Symphony: In Exalted Form

Wash. Post - Oct. 26, 1971

By Paul Hume

It is a good thing for music that Mr. Nixon's Phase I and Phase II were not around in pre-World War I Austria. If they had been, Gustav Mahler's later symphonies would never have gotten off the ground. They are prize examples of the good that can come from inflation.

William Steinberg proved this over and over last night as he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a heaven-storming account of the Mahler Sixth. At least twice during the course of the violent finale, Mahler reaches a point at which any of his predecessors would have ended it all. Both times it seemed that all that could possibly be said on the subject had been said. But that is only the way it seemed to those who lack Mahler's vision for the greater apocalypse. Had the symphony stopped at either of those moments, we would not have heard the ravishing violin solos, the startling crashes of the double cymbals, or the final peroration from the horns.

Inflation in music is by no means always a bad thing. Mahler was producing the last products of a madly rhetorical epoch, an era that Barbara Tuchman says suffered from giantism. But today many are finding in Mahler not excess but only that extension of thought and sound that seems right for this age. That which was once abused as trite is now seen to be, even if trite, somehow lifted to a higher level than the merely banal plane on which men of lesser genius would have left it. And when Mahler's inspiration is at a sensitive high, as in the simplicity of the slow movement, or the vast, soaring reaches of the finale's most probing pages, the result is unmatched in the literature.

The world of Mahler seems easily contained within the mind and heart of William Steinberg. Last night, with his magnificent orchestra in exalted form for its Kennedy Center debut, Steinberg led the Mahler with gestures, looks, and manner that conveyed to both players and audience all that was going on in the music. With the characteristic stamp of his left foot, sometimes as if to punctuate other times for added emphasis, he placed before his listeners the mind and the soul of the work, which is surely the sternest of all Mahler's symphonies, for all its lovely bending.

While the entire orchestra played as if inspired, the frequent horn solos were memorable. The entire finale, with its repetitions of the upleading octave figure, finally inverted in the horns, and echoed by the lonely tuba, was a grand structure, complete with cowbells from the room behind the orchestra.

Earlier in the evening, Steinberg led an immaculate Ravel G Major Piano Concerto with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist, and the entire orchestra joining in the sinuous but rhythmically alert proceedings. This time it was Bernard [illegible] harp solos that provoked ravishment.

Weissenberg had the [illegible] under fantastic control, playing it with an easy but pointed mastery that tolled its constant intricacies.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 232,064 SUN. 275,535

NOV 2 1971

Boston in N.Y.

Steinberg Displays Orchestra Levels

By OLIN CHISM
Music Editor

NEW YORK—While Dallas is caught in the doldrums of a symphonic drought New York finds itself with almost an embarrassment of riches.

The New Philharmonia of London, the Boston Symphony, the National Symphony of Washington, the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Cincinnati Symphony, and Leopold Stokowski's American Symphony—not to mention the hometown New York Philharmonic—all are presenting concerts within the space of a few days. The activity is almost as feverish as the uncommonly muggy weather that is keeping the city sweating.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg . . . soloist in a Boston Symphony concert at Philharmonic Hall.

THE BOSTON Symphony — one of the country's great ones — is currently in town on one of its periodic visits, playing a series of concerts under the direction of its music director, William Steinberg, and his bright young associate, Michael Tilson Thomas.

A concert at Philharmonic Hall, with Steinberg conducting, showed how great the orchestra can sound—and how it can fall short of the mark, just as any lesser orchestra can. The program included music by Mozart, Ravel and Mahler. The opening overture to Mozart's late but rarely performed opera "La Clemenza Di Tito" was a gem. Steinberg, reducing the orchestra to just above chamber size, took the piece at a deliberate pace, one that might have deadened the performance under other circumstances.

WHAT MADE the difference here was the great precision of attack, ensemble in general, and pitch—and Steinberg's great range of dynamic levels. The veteran maestro took pains to see that the woodwinds came through with 3-D clarity, holding the strings down to a just comfortably audible level when they were in accompanying passages.

Overall the performance was thrilling. I think that Mozart, who complained once that his music was played too fast, would have been pleased.

TAKING SECOND place on the program was Ravel's Piano Concerto in G, with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist. Here again on a different level was a marvelous performance.

This concerto reminds me a little of Spain as heard through Gershwin's ears, with a little Bach thrown in—but the whole remaining unmistakeably Ravel's. It is atmospheric and cheerful and not to be recommended for the amateur pianist. Weissenberg, as those who heard him in Dallas not so long ago know, is one of the more formidable technicians around, and he played brilliantly. One cannot soon forget the final movement, which goes like wildfire and must never sound heavy. It was a dazzling feat.

The orchestra, now up to full size, collaborated with great elan under Steinberg's direction.

THE LAST half of the program, alas, did not fulfill the expectations raised by the first. With orchestra now expanded to super size (nine horns, two sets of timpani and five trumpets, for instance) Steinberg conducted Mahler's Symphony No. 6 in A Minor.

This work, like Orpheus' violin concerto in Offenbach's "Orpheus In The Underworld," lasts an hour and 15 minutes. It's a joke, of course, in "Orpheus" but in Mahler it's definitely not a joke. Even so this is not Mahler's longest symphony.

MUCH OF the discomfiture of the performance, however, involved technical matters. Several times, for instance, the first violins could not come to agreement on pitch—surprising, considering that this was the Boston Symphony. Also, I have heard better horn and trombone playing. And the trumpets, playing fortissimo, sometimes reduced the rest of the orchestra to a subsidiary level and dealt near-pain to the ears. It was not a subtle performance.

Steinberg conducts with deliberate motions, most of the time with head bowed, appearing to contemplate a spot on the floor about five feet in front of him, raising his head now and then for an important cue.

In fairness it should be said that the beautiful slow third movement soared magnificently and that there was a rugged power to the rest of the performance.

But the Mozart and the Ravel are the works still singing in my ears.

New York Post
D. 623,215 SAT. 354,797
OCT 27 1971

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Carmen," with Ruza Baldani, Lucine Amara, Jon Vickers, Robert Merrill; Gabor Otvos (debut), conductor; 8.

New York City Opera: "Carmen," with Joy Davidson, Bianca Sauler, Michele

Davidson

Weissenberg

Molese, Norman Treigle; Julius Rudel, conductor; N. Y. State Theater, 8:15.

City Center Joffrey Ballet: "Petrouchka," "Wee Wis," "Green Table"; City Center Theater, 8.

Senegalese National Dance Company; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8.

Boston Symphony: William Steinberg, conductor; Alexis Weissenberg, pianist; Mozart's Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," Ravel's "Piano Concerto in G," and Mahler's "Symphony No. 6 in A minor"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30. Opening of five-concert series.

Ralph Wade, Tenor; N.Y. Cultural Center, 2 Columbus Circle, N.Y., 8:30.

Jam Session, MUSE, 1530 Bedford Av., Brooklyn, 7:30.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
OCT 28 1971

Words & Music

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Steinberg Opens Boston Series

The Boston Symphony, long eminent, has been giving concerts here for 84 seasons. Its 85th opened last night in Philharmonic Hall with a solemn air. Mozart's Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," is the composer's last opera, completed only two months before his death. Music director William Steinberg was on the podium.

After this beginning the orchestra gamboled until the intermission by whizzing through musical water on a surfboard with Ravel's Piano Concerto in G Major. Alexis Weissenberg was the soloist. Later it took a 70 minute obstacle course with Mahler's Symphony No. 6 in D Minor.

By its contrast the program was well chosen especially because Steinberg was a penetrating stylist, conducting without aberration or prejudice. He saw through the music and illuminated it in the re-creation.

Weissenberg Understood Wit

Weissenberg also understood his way in the Ravel, turning out a most engaging expression of the composer's wit, a wit which is insouciantly thrust but infinitely careful and elegant in its detailed manner of saying.

Ravel's jazz touches are sublimated into the Gallic transparency of his style with a flair which belies the fact that its origins were an ocean away.

Weissenberg's tone is sounded with little weight but this kind of timbre suits the Ravel style while the pianist's impeccable, crisp technical account gave the piece a quick intelligence which made a delight of its conversation with the orchestra.

Steinberg's urbane collaboration, brilliantly projected by the orchestra, contributed immeasurably to the whole. The conductor's urbanity continued into the Mahler which he led from memory. I remember a feeling of utter desolation after hearing Dimitri Mitripolous lead this most pessimistic of Mahler's symphonies, the one the composer, himself, called "tragic."

Bruno Walter, Mahler's student and colleague said of the symphony: "It reeks of the bitter taste of the cup of life."

Steinberg, in a masterful interpretation, discovered in it a more varied spirit. With a structural comprehension which was overwhelming in the way everything fit, he made us hear how it is more a mosaic than any other of Mahler's symphonies. There is far less of a soaring melodic line and more of network of phrases, whether ominous as in the Scherzo, or asking but not receiving calm as in Movement II or implying transfiguration but never realizing it as in Movement IV.

Mahler once wrote to Wagner: "What a man composes is surely the whole man, his feelings, thoughts, his breathing, his suffering." This work is primarily concerned with the agony of facing life by an immensely complicated man.

His widow, Alma, called the "Sixth", "the most completely personal of his works."

Its instrumentation is personal too: the hammering of fate in repeated notes by the timpani; shudders in the strings; high screech and snort of the trumpet; calm of occasional bucolic melody; calm of celesta and cowbells.

The symphony's final movement builds to a grim, volcanic triumph yet it expires with a mere breath quickly come and gone: like life itself, a beginning and an end surrounded by a moat of mystery.

WESTPORT NEWS
WESTPORT, CONN.
SEMI-WEEKLY 10,000
OCT 29 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston batonist at Philharmonic

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the opening pair of concerts of the orchestra's 85th consecutive season of concerts in New York City, tonight and Friday night, at 8:30 p.m., at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall.

Mr. Steinberg will open the concert with a performance of Mozart's Overture to "La clemenza di Tito," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg will conduct Mahler's Sixth Symphony.

Alexis Weissenberg, born in Sofia, Bulgaria, studied in his native country and in Israel before coming to the United States to study at the Juilliard School.

William Steinberg will also conduct the first of a series of four concerts at Carnegie Hall, Saturday evening, October 30 at 8 p.m. The concert opens with Beethoven's Sixth symphony "Pastoral," followed by a performance of Einem's Violin concerto with soloist Christiane Edinger. The concert concludes with the symphony from Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

Boston Symphony: In Exalted Form

Wash. Post - Oct. 26, 1971

By Paul Hume

It is a good thing for music that Mr. Nixon's Phase I and Phase II were not around in pre-World War I Austria. If they had been, Gustav Mahler's later symphonies would never have gotten off the ground. They are prize examples of the good that can come from inflation.

William Steinberg proved this over and over last night as he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a heaven-storming account of the Mahler Sixth. At least twice during the course of the violent finale, Mahler reaches a point at which any of his predecessors would have ended it all. Both times it seemed that all that could possibly be said on the subject had been said. But that is only the way it seemed to those who lack Mahler's vision for the greater apocalypse. Had the symphony stopped at either of those moments, we would not have heard the ravishing violin solos, the startling crashes of the double cymbals, or the final peroration from the horns.

Inflation in music is by no means always a bad thing. Mahler was producing the last products of a madly rhetorical epoch, an era that Barbara Tuchman says suffered from giantism. But today many are finding in Mahler not excess but only that extension of thought and sound that seems right for this age. That which was once abused as trite is now seen to be, even if trite, somehow lifted to a higher level than the merely banal plane on which men of lesser genius would have left it. And when Mahler's inspiration is at a sensitive high, as in the simplicity of the slow movement, or the vast, soaring reaches of the finale's most probing pages, the result is unmatched in the literature.

The world of Mahler seems easily contained within the mind and heart of William Steinberg. Last night, with his magnificent orchestra in exalted form for its Kennedy Center debut, Steinberg led the Mahler with gestures, looks, and manner that conveyed to both players and audience all that was going on in the music. With the characteristic stamp of his left foot, sometimes as if to punctuate other times for added emphasis, he placed before his listeners the mind and the soul of the work, which is surely the sternest of all Mahler's symphonies, for all its lovely bending.

While the entire orchestra played as if inspired, the frequent horn solos were memorable. The entire finale, with its repetitions of the upleading octave figure, finally inverted in the horns, and echoed by the lonely tuba, was a grand structure, complete with cowbells from the room behind the orchestra.

Earlier in the evening, Steinberg led an immaculate Ravel G Major Piano Concerto with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist, and the entire orchestra joining in the sinuous but rhythmically alert proceedings. This time it was Bernard Zighera's harp solos that provided [illegible] ed ravishment.

Weissenberg had the [illegible] under fantastic [illegible] playing it with an [illegible] but pointed mastery that [illegible] its constant intricacies.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 232,064 SUN. 275,535
NOV 2 1971

Boston in N.Y.

Steinberg Displays Orchestra Levels

By OLIN CHISM
Music Editor

NEW YORK—While Dallas is caught in the doldrums of a symphonic drought New York finds itself with almost an embarrassment of riches.

The New Philharmonia of London, the Boston Symphony, the National Symphony of Washington, the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Cincinnati Symphony, and Leopold Stokowski's American Symphony—not to mention the hometown New York Philharmonic—all are presenting concerts within the space of a few days. The activity is almost as feverish as the uncommonly muggy weather that is keeping the city sweating.

THE BOSTON Symphony — one of the country's great ones — is currently in town on one of its periodic visits, playing a series of concerts under the direction of its music director, William Steinberg, and his bright young associate, Michael Tilson Thomas.

A concert at Philharmonic Hall, with Steinberg conducting, showed how great the orchestra can sound—and how it can fall short of the mark, just as any lesser orchestra can. The program included music by Mozart, Ravel and Mahler. The opening overture to Mozart's late but rarely performed opera "La Clemenza Di Tito" was a gem. Steinberg, reducing the orchestra to just above chamber size, took the piece at a deliberate pace, one that might have deadened the performance under other circumstances.

WHAT MADE the difference here was the great precision of attack, ensemble in general, and pitch—and Steinberg's great range of dynamic levels. The veteran maestro took pains to see that the woodwinds came through with 3-D clarity, holding the strings down to a just comfortably audible level when they were in accompanying passages.

Overall the performance was thrilling. I think that Mozart, who complained once that his music was played too fast, would have been pleased.

TAKING SECOND place on the program was Ravel's Piano Concerto in G, with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist. Here again on a different level was a marvelous performance.

This concerto reminds me a little of Spain as heard through Gershwin's ears, with a little Bach thrown in—but the whole remaining unmistakeably Ravel's. It is atmospheric and cheerful and not to be recommended for the amateur pianist. Weissenberg, as those who heard him in Dallas not so long ago know, is one of the more formidable technicians around, and he played brilliantly. One cannot soon forget the final movement, which goes like wildfire and must never sound heavy. It was a dazzling feat.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg . . . soloist in a Boston Symphony concert at Philharmonic Hall.

The orchestra, now up to full size, collaborated with great elan under Steinberg's direction.

THE LAST half of the program, alas, did not fulfill the expectations raised by the first. With orchestra now expanded to super size (nine horns, two sets of timpani and five trumpets, for instance) Steinberg conducted Mahler's Symphony No. 6 in A Minor.

This work, like Orpheus' violin concerto in Offenbach's "Orpheus In The Underworld," lasts an hour and 15 minutes. It's a joke, of course, in "Orpheus" but in Mahler it's definitely not a joke. Even so this is not Mahler's longest symphony.

MUCH OF the discomfiture of the performance, however, involved technical matters. Several times, for instance, the first violins could not come to agreement on pitch—surprising, considering that this was the Boston Symphony. Also, I have heard better horn and trombone playing. And the trumpets, playing fortissimo, sometimes reduced the rest of the orchestra to a subsidiary level and dealt near-pain to the ears. It was not a subtle performance.

Steinberg conducts with deliberate motions, most of the time with head bowed, appearing to contemplate a spot on the floor about five feet in front of him, raising his head now and then for an important cue.

In fairness it should be said that the beautiful slow third movement soared magnificently and that there was a rugged power to the rest of the performance.

But the Mozart and the Ravel are the works still singing in my ears.

[07]

STRAVINSKY SET FOR SYMPH SERIES

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

NOV 6 1971

MUSICAL EVENTS

Rarae Aves

LAST week was remarkable for the performance of two symphonies which are encountered here so seldom that a decade may pass, or in one case almost a lifetime, between hearings of them. And they are both works of great nobility, well worth performing. The first, which turned up with William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony last Wednesday night in Philharmonic Hall, was Mahler's Sixth, admittedly the knottiest of all the Mahler symphonies. The other was Bruckner's Second, which I was hearing for the first time live, rather than on records. It had been done a year or so ago by the London Philharmonic—the only performance of this work I recall in all the many years I have been attending symphony concerts.

The Mahler Sixth is peculiar, even for Mahler. Warren Storey Smith, the Boston critic, has referred to it as "the black sheep of the Mahler flock," and even to Mahler the original sequence of the movements was unsatisfactory; it was changed in a later edition, the orchestra parts of which were burned up in the bombing of Leipzig. Fortunately, a score still existed in London. It received its first New York performance in 1947, under Dimitri Mitropoulos—a performance I remember vividly, mainly because of the mood of abject depression the music conveyed to its audience. Since then, it has been done by Bernstein and perhaps some others. But to me it remained the most gloomy of all Mahler's works, and Mahler was a specialist in gloom. Mr. Steinberg relieved the mood of despair. His was a lighter and less melodramatic interpretation, and it was almost cheerful in contrast to Mitropoulos's version. But even I, a dedicated Mahler buff, was not much stirred by the first movement and the scherzo that followed. The first movement had spooky moments, and the scherzo seemed to oscillate between self-laceration and aggressive pronouncements. It was not until the slow movement and the finale that I really began to enjoy the work, and that is because the first is a lyric idyll in the best Mahler tradition and the second is one of those ringing, tumultuous statements that Mahler was so good at. Everywhere, Mahler's extreme neuroticism was evident (he had had at least one session of analysis with the great Sigmund Freud, which apparently didn't take), but his neuroticism, like Kafka's, was part and parcel of his artistic personality, and we would be the poorer if he had been cured. As it is, he speaks for our disturbed era more eloquently than any composer who has written since then.

Mr. Steinberg filled out his program with the overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," K. 621, a late Mozart work (and a beauty, coming from a time when men's minds were at ease), and Ravel's Piano Concerto in G Major, a bit of fluff influenced by jazz and by Stravinsky in equal measure, except for its adagio, which is Ravel at his purest. Alexis Weissenberg performed the solo part with the requisite dexterity. It is too special a work to judge a pianist by. But Mr. Weissenberg managed all its digital calisthenics without a flaw.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

OCT 5 1971

Boston Symphony At Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning Oct. 28 at 8:30 P.M. Additional concerts by the Boston will be on Dec. 2 and Feb. 10, 1972.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Symphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 27, and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20.

Information regarding subscriptions and single ticket prices for the series of five concerts is available at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, 200 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, New York 11238 (Telephone (212) 638-5000, Ext. 7).

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

OCT 28 1971

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Der Freischuetz," with Pilar Lorengar, Edith Mathis, Sandor Konya, Gerd Feldhoff; Leopold Ludwig, conductor; Metropolitan Opera House, 8.

New York City Opera: "Giulio Cesare," with Beverly Sills, Kay Creed, Dominic Cossa, Robert Hale, William Ledbetter; Julius Rudel, conductor; N. Y. State Theater, 8:15.

FELDHOFF SILLS

Joffrey Ballet: "Kettentanz," "The Lesson," "The Clowns"; City Center Theater, 8.

New York Philharmonic: Michael Gielen, conductor; Siegfried Palm, cellist; Liszt's "From the Cradle to the Grave," Ligeti's "Concerto for Cello and Orchestra," Bruckner's "Symphony No. 2, C minor"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30. Program repeated tomorrow at 2.

Robert Goldsand, pianist; Mozart's "Sonata in D Major, K. 576," Chopin's "Sonata in B minor, Opus 58," Liszt's "Three Etudes"; works of Bach; Carnegie Hall, 8.

Chung Lee, pianist (N. Y. debut); Beethoven's "Sonata in A Major, Opus 101," Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasie in C Major, Opus 15," works of Mozart, Chopin; Alice Tully Hall, 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Stravinsky's "Symphony in C," Borodin's "Symphony No. 2," works of Glinka, Denisov; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning October 28 at 8:30PM. Additional concerts by the Boston Symphony will be on December 2 and February 10.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Symphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on February 27, and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20.

The opening program will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and will include Glinka's 'Polonaise' and Krakoviak from 'Life of the Tzar', Stravinsky's 'Symphony in C', Denisov's 'Chamber Concerto' and Borodin's 'Symphony No.2'.

Information regarding subscriptions and single ticket prices for the series of five concerts is available at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, 200 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, New York 11238 (telephone: 638-5000, extension 7). Tickets may be purchased at the box office beginning October 7. Students may purchase discount tickets at $2 each for a single performances on the day of the performance only.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000

OCT 9 1971

Boston Symphony Opens 84th Season in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning Oct. 28 at 8:30 p.m. Additional concerts by the Boston will be on Dec. 2 and Feb. 10, 1972.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Symphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 27, 1972 and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20, 1972.

The opening program will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and will include Glinka's Polonaise and Krakoviak from "Life of the Tzar," Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Denisov's Chamber Concerto and Borodin's Symphony No. 2.

Information regarding subscriptions and single ticket prices for the series of five concerts is available at the B'klyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, 200 Eastern Pwy., B'klyn, N.Y. 11238 (638-5000, Ext. 7). Mail order requests for single performances will be taken from Sept. 27 through Oct. 7 at the Academy of Music Box Office, 30 Lafayette Ave., and tickets may be purchased there beginning Oct. 7. Students may purchase discount tickets at $2 each for single performances on the day of the performance only.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000

OCT 23 1971

Boston Symphony Opens 84th Season in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning Oct. 28 at 8:30 p.m. Additional concerts by the Boston will be on Dec. 2 and Feb. 10, 1972.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Symphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 27, and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20.

The opening program will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and will include Glinka's Polonaise and Krakoviak from "Life of the Tzar," Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Denisov's Chamber Concerto and Borodin's Symphony No. 2.

Information regarding subscriptions and single ticket prices for the series of five concerts is available at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, 200 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11238 (Tel.: 638-5000, Ext. 7). Mail order requests for single performances will be taken from Sept. 27 through Oct. 7 at the Academy of Music Box Office, 30 Lafayette Ave., and tickets may be purchased there beginning Oct. 7. Students may purchase discount tickets at $2.00 each for single performances on the day of the performance only.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 16,000

OCT 23 1971

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000

OCT 23 1971

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

OCT 11 1971

STRAVINSKY SET FOR SYMPH SERIES

LONG ISLAND
ENTERTAINER
CEDARHURST, N. Y.
W. 10,000

OCT 21 1971

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

NOV 6 1971

MUSICAL EVENTS

Rarae Aves

LAST week was remarkable for the performance of two symphonies which are encountered here so seldom that a decade may pass, or in one case almost a lifetime, between hearings of them. And they are both works of great nobility, well worth performing. The first, which turned up with William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony last Wednesday night in Philharmonic Hall, was Mahler's Sixth, admittedly the knottiest of all the Mahler symphonies. The other was Bruckner's Second, which I was hearing for the first time live, rather than on records. It had been done a year or so ago by the London Philharmonic—the only performance of this work I recall in all the many years I have been attending symphony concerts.

The Mahler Sixth is peculiar, even for Mahler. Warren Storey Smith, the Boston critic, has referred to it as "the black sheep of the Mahler flock," and even to Mahler the original sequence of the movements was unsatisfactory; it was changed in a later edition, the orchestra parts of which were burned up in the bombing of Leipzig. Fortunately, a score still existed in London. It received its first New York performance in 1947, under Dimitri Mitropoulos—a performance I remember vividly, mainly because of the mood of abject depression the music conveyed to its audience. Since then, it has been done by Bernstein and perhaps some others. But to me it remained the most gloomy of all Mahler's works, and Mahler was a specialist in gloom. Mr. Steinberg relieved the mood of despair. His was a lighter and less melodramatic interpretation, and it was almost cheerful in contrast to Mitropoulos's version. But even I, a dedicated Mahler buff, was not much stirred by the first movement and the scherzo that followed. The first movement had spooky moments, and the scherzo seemed to oscillate between self-laceration and aggressive pronouncements. It was not until the slow movement and the finale that I really began to enjoy the work, and that is because the first is a lyric idyll in the best Mahler tradition and the second is one of those ringing, tumultuous statements that Mahler was so good at. Everywhere, Mahler's extreme neuroticism was evident (he had had at least one session of analysis with the great Sigmund Freud, which apparently didn't take), but his neuroticism, like Kafka's, was part and parcel of his artistic personality, and we would be the poorer if he had been cured. As it is, he speaks for our disturbed era more eloquently than any composer who has written since then.

Mr. Steinberg filled out his program with the overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," K.621, a late Mozart work (and a beauty, coming from a time when men's minds were at ease), and Ravel's Piano Concerto in G Major, a bit of fluff influenced by jazz and by Stravinsky in equal measure, except for its adagio, which is Ravel at his purest. Alexis Weissenberg performed the solo part with the requisite dexterity. It is too special a work to judge a pianist by. But Mr. Weissenberg managed all its digital calisthenics without a flaw.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,061 SUN. 423,790

OCT 5 1971

Boston Symphony At Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning Oct. 28 at 8:30 P.M. Additional concerts by the Boston will be on Dec. 2 and Feb. 10, 1972.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Symphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 27, and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20.

Information regarding subscriptions and single ticket prices for the series of five concerts is available at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, 200 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, New York 11238 (Telephone (212) 638-5000, Ext. 7).

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

OCT 28 1971

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Der Freischuetz," with Pilar Lorengar, Edith Mathis, Sandor Konya, Gerd Feldhoff; Leopold Ludwig, conductor; Metropolitan Opera House, 8.

New York City Opera: "Giulio Cesare," with Beverly Sills, Kay Creed, Dominic Cossa, Robert Hale, William Ledbetter; Julius Rudel, conductor; N. Y. State Theater, 8:15.

FELDHOFF SILLS

Joffrey Ballet: "Kettentanz," "The Lesson," "The Clowns"; City Center Theater, 8.

New York Philharmonic: Michael Gielen, conductor; Siegfried Palm, cellist; Liszt's 'From the Cradle to the Grave,' Ligeti's "Concerto for Cello and Orchestra," Bruckner's "Symphony No. 2, C minor"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30. Program repeated tomorrow at 2.

Robert Goldsand, pianist; Mozart's "Sonata in D Major, K. 576," Chopin's "Sonata in B minor, Opus 58," Liszt's "Three Etudes", works of Bach; Carnegie Hall, 8.

Chung Lee, pianist (N. Y. debut); Beethoven's "Sonata in A Major, Opus 101," Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasie in C Major, Opus 15," works of Mozart, Chopin; Alice Tully Hall, 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Stravinsky's "Symphony in C," Borodin's "Symphony No. 2," works of Glinka, Denisov: Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning October 28 at 8:30PM. Additional concerts by the Boston Symphony will be on December 2 and February 10.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Symphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on February 27, and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20.

The opening program will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and will include Glinka's 'Polonaise' and Krakoviak from 'Life of the Tzar', Stravinsky's 'Symphony in C', Denisov's 'Chamber Concerto' and Borodin's 'Symphony No.2'.

Information regarding subscriptions and single ticket prices for the series of five concerts is available at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, 200 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, New York 11238 (telephone: 638-5000, extension 7). Tickets may be purchased at the box office beginning October 7. Students may purchase discount tickets at $2 each for a single performances on the day of the performance only.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000

OCT 9 1971

Boston Symphony Opens 84th Season in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning Oct. 28 at 8:30 p.m. Additional concerts by the Boston will be on Dec. 2 and Feb. 10, 1972.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Symphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 27, 1972 and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20, 1972.

The opening program will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and will include Glinka's Polonaise and Krakoviak from "Life of the Tzar," Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Denisov's Chamber Concerto and Borodin's Symphony No. 2.

Information regarding subscriptions and single ticket prices for the series of five concerts is available at the B'klyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, 200 Eastern Pwy., B'klyn, N.Y. 11238 (638-5000, Ext. 7). Mail order requests for single performances will be taken from Sept. 27 through Oct. 7 at the Academy of Music Box Office, 30 Lafayette Ave., and tickets may be purchased there beginning Oct. 7. Students may purchase discount tickets at $2 each for single performances on the day of the performance only.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000

OCT 23 1971

Boston Symphony Opens 84th Season in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning Oct. 28 at 8:30 p.m. Additional concerts by the Boston will be on Dec. 2 and Feb. 10, 1972.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Symphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 27, and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20.

The opening program will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and will include Glinka's Polonaise and Krakoviak from "Life of the Tzar," Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Denisov's Chamber Concerto and Borodin's Symphony No. 2.

Information regarding subscriptions and single ticket prices for the series of five concerts is available at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, 200 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11238 (Tel.: 638-5000, Ext. 7). Mail order requests for single performances will be taken from Sept. 27 through Oct. 7 at the Academy of Music Box Office, 30 Lafayette Ave., and tickets may be purchased there beginning Oct. 7. Students may purchase discount tickets at $2.00 each for single performances on the day of the performance only.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 16,000

OCT 23 1971

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000

OCT 23 1971

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,061 SUN. 423,790

OCT 11 1971

[29]

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

NOV 1 1971

Rarely Given Einem Concerto Performed by Bostonians Here

By ALLEN HUGHES

Gottfried von Einem's Violin Concerto was given what seems to have been its first New York performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Christiane Edinger at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night, and there is little reason to think that another performance will be demanded in the near future, if ever.

This half-hour work by the eclectic Austrian composer is written in a style that, as a European critic has already said, suggests Sibelius and Richard Strauss, but Einem has failed to energize it with any arresting thematic material. The solo part is virtually nonstop and ranges up and down the fingerboard with writing that is felicitous for the violin but dull to listen to. For some strange reason, the composer elected to feature bongos in the third of the concerto's four movements. This relieves the tedium for a moment, but does not save the piece.

Since Miss Edinger's playing was expert, it was a pity that she was applying her talents to such dreary material.

William Steinberg's other program choices for the Bostonians' fourth and final concert of the week here were Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony.

The Daily Times
MAMARONECK, N. Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 9,835

OCT 22 1971

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play two concerts in Manhattan and one in Brooklyn next week. On Thursday at 8:30 p.m. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, the music will be by Glinke, Stravinsky, Denisov and Borodin. Friday at Philharmonic Hall at 8:30 p.m. the program will feature Mozart, Ravel and Mahler. On Saturday at 8 p.m. at Carnegie Hall, Beethoven, Einem and Hindemith works will be played.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

NOV 11 1971

Boston Ork At Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play its second concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music at 8:30 p.m. Dec. 2. Max Rudolph, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, will conduct. Tickets may be purchased at the Academy box office, 30 Lafayette Ave.

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
LEADER-HERALD
D. 14,000

OCT 20 1971

Calender of Events

Brooklyn Academy of Music

AFRO-ASIAN FESTIVAL. Dance troupes from Cambodia, Senegal, Morocco, Iran and Sierra Leone. Five week Festival from Oct. 19-Nov. 21. Oct. 19-24, Classical Khmer Dancers of Cambodia. Oct. 26-31, Senegalese National Dance Co. Nov. 2-7, National Dance Co. of Morocco. Nov. 9-14, Ritual Acrobats of Persia. Nov. 15-21, Sierra Leone National Dance Troupe. Tickets available now.

BELLA LEWITZKY DANCE COMPANY - Los Angeles based troupe. First N.Y. appearance. Oct. 15-17, in the Opera House. Performances at 8 p.m. on Oct. 15 and 16; 2 p.m. on Oct. 17. Tickets at $4.50, $3.50, $2.50. Information, call 783-6700.

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIA - to accept limited number of singers for its Choral Society for this season. For choral auditions information and appointments, call ST 3-0482 or ST 3-4346. Rehearsals begin Tues., Oct. 5, 8 p.m., at the Academy.

CHELSEA THEATER CENTER - new season. Nov. 30-Dec. 19, Jean Genet's "The Screens" directed by Minos Volanakis. Feb. 1-Feb. 20, Allen Ginsberg's "Kaddish"; March 21-April 9, John Gay's "The Beggar's Opera"; May 9-May 28, "The Water Hen" by Polish playwright Stanislaw Ignacy Witkiewicz. Also - Special "Brown Bag" experimental theater: Oct.-Nov., introduction of works by six young Americans; Dec., American premiere of Hans Magus Enzenberger's "The Interrogation of Havana"; March-April, Agrule's Esalen experiment "Eros and Psyche." Performances - Tues. & Sun. evenings at 7:30 p.m.; Wed., Thurs., Fri. & Sat., 8:30 p.m.; Sunday matinees at 3 p.m. No performances on Monday. All performances in Third Theater. Subscription tickets now available. Call 783-6700 ext. 49.

ROBERT F. KENNEDYTHEATRE for Children. Many attractions. Each stage event plays for four weeks; each motion picture plays for two weeks. 3 Live Attractions: Dec. 6-Jan. 2, John Carradine in "The Stingiest Man in Town," original musical based on "A Christmas Carol"; April 4-May 7, "Peter Pan"; May 9-June 4, "Toby Tyler at the Circus." Family Film Festival, running Jan. 24-March 19, 2 weeks each film. "The Secret Garden" starring Dean Stockwell, Margaret O'Brien. "Tom Thumb" starring Russ Tamblyn. "The Glass Slipper" starring Leslie Caron. Special offer now underway, with discount rates. Information, call 875-6261.

GILELA MAY, leading actress of Berliner Ensemble, East Berlin. Evening of songs by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill - "From Four Decades." Six performances from Nov. 2-7. In the Music Hall. 8 p.m. curtains. (7:30 p.m. on Nov. 7). Information: 783-6700 ext. 10.

DANCE EVENT - On one bill -- Murray Louis Dance Co./Nikolais Dance Theatre. Together for the first time. Jan. 18-30. Information -- 783-6700.

MERCE CUNNINGHAM & DANCE CO -- Feb. 1-13, collage of artists including Andy Warhol, Jasper Johns. Composers - David Tudor and John Cage. Information: 783-6700.

ORCHESTRA SERIES -- Boston Symphony Orchestra, 8:30 p.m., on Oct. 28, Dec. 7, Feb. 10; Vienna Symphony - 3 p.m. on Feb. 27; Minnesota Orchestra, 8:30 p.m., on April 20.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 16,000

OCT 23 1971

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,891 SUN. 423,790

OCT 24 1971

Boston Symphony at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 84th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning Thursday at 8:30 p.m. Additional concerts by the Boston will be on Dec. 2 and Feb. 10.

These concerts are part of the Brooklyn Institute's Sumphony Series, which will also feature the Vienna Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 27, and the Minnesota Orchestra on April 20.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

NOV 11 1971

New England Newsclip

N.Y. Report

Listening to the BSO on Tour

By David Noble
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual New York concert series, a tradition dating back 84 years and one that is taken seriously by the orchestra, resumed for the 1971 season with a pair of concerts given in Manhattan's Philharmonic and Carnegie Halls Oct. 28 and 30 and one in Brooklyn's Academy of Music Oct. 29.

With music director William Steinberg conducting Ravel and Mahler for the Thursday night program in Philharmonic Hall and Beethoven and Hindemith Saturday in Carnegie Hall, the Manhattan concerts hit a strong meat-and-potatoes average for programming.

Meanwhile, in Brooklyn, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the exquisite Russian repast he recently led in Boston. (A woman at the sponsoring Brooklyn Academy of Arts and Sciences explained, "We prefer to think that they send their very best to Brooklyn.")

The New York concerts have always been important as a seal on the BSO's success; controversial new men in the orchestra's past, such as Muck and Monteux, rested easier on the podium after being reviewed well in New York, and Koussevitsky's first round of New York concerts seems to have been a showcase occasion the orchestra looked forward to eagerly 50 years ago.

Last month's concerts, then, seemed an ideal opportunity for a summary and assessment of what the Boston Symphony has been up to in the past few years, and being in New York at the time, I went along. What follows is the conjectured musing that might have run through the mind of an experienced New York concertgoer, one who had not heard the orchestra in several years and was interested in its current state.

Wednesday night, Philharmonic Hall:

Mozart ("Clemenza di Tito" overture): "Nice. Strong; broad phrasing, but firmly etched. Maybe this Steinberg fellow has sharpened them up."

Ravel (Piano Concerto in G, Alexis Weissenberg, soloist): "All the energy and zip the piece wants, but a curious thinness in the strings — it doesn't quite sound like Ravel. And, oddly, the wind soloists don't perk up as they should; sound like they're thinking about something else when they come in — that same curious, abstracted effect you got when Leinsdorf was conducting. That Weissenberg is incredible, though. He's not quite playing jazzily enough, but whatever he's doing, it sounds grand.

Mahler (Symphony No. 6): "Great, roughhewn sound at the beginning. They don't keep it up though. Like a stylistic kaleidoscope, taking each bit as it comes. I think Solti and Bernstein made a lot more out of this piece. Nice energy in that last movement, but too late. They did an interesting performance of something, but it didn't sound like Mahler's Sixth.

—Thursday night, Brooklyn Academy of Music:

Glinka (orchestral excerpts from "A Life for the Czar"): "Nice little pieces. And the warm, relaxed playing Thomas gets out of the orchestra, my goodness, I don't know when I've heard them sound like that. I hope this is as much fun for them as it is for me."

Stravinsky (Symphony in C): "Strong complicated rhythms they're playing. I'd always heard this piece sound a little more like Mozart, but Thomas may know what he's doing. Sounds good so far. But, no. Can it be? The orchestra is having trouble playing the piece. Not so bad in the second movement — not much happening rhythmically. Not so good in the scherzo. Now, in this last movement, Thomas suddenly seems more intense. That's the Stravinsky you waited to hear: clear, sharp, almost burning in its sound. The whole performance, though, confirms last night's impression that the brass section simply is not what it should be in a major orchestra, and the wind soloists need some sort of energization."

Denisov (Concerto for four instruments): "Hm. Only four players, and there's Thomas getting up on the podium. Nice little piece though. The first movement sounds like scrambled-up Shostakovich, but this middle section has some awfully nice solos. That last movement sounds like the avant-garde fellows, but you're half lulled into it by the way those solos came first."

Borodin (Symphony No. 2): "Not a deep, strong sound at the beginning, like most everyone else gets there. This fellow Thomas works with light sounds most of the time, maybe he's uncomfortable with this growly stuff. The second movement sounds funny: they're making it jerky and rigid — and he is conducting it that way. Something strange about that: maybe they're giving him a hard time, like it said in the Times article last Sunday. But now this third movement, deep and slow, sounds sharp and clear, almost like it was written by Stravinsky. Glad they got the problems out of their systems while there was still some music to go."

—Saturday night Carnegie Hall:

Beethoven (Symphony Nov. 6):

WILLIAM STEINBERG

"They're starting out with a rich, beautiful sound, almost like the old Boston Symphony —a bit slow and clipped in phrasing, like some Boston accents you hear; a resonant sound with just a tasteful hint of dryness in it. It doesn't really sound like Beethoven when they play that way—not chunky enough. But aside from that, gorgeous. So that's what Steinberg's been doing the last couple of years. I see why they sent Thomas to Brooklyn."

Einem (Violin Concerto, Christine Edinger, soloist): "She's pretty, and she plays the devil out of it. But I don't believe that music. Every cheap, bold gesture is seized upon mindlessly. I guess I can tell why the girl plays the piece — it lets her show off — but I can't imagine why anyone encourages, much less accompanies, her in it."

Hindemith (symphony from "Mathis der Maler"): "More of that superbly processed sound. Works even better this time because the music actually is written that way. In fact, this is a knockout. Standing ovation, shouts, all deserved this time. At that rate the piece could replace the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite as a standard program closer."

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,319

OCT 17 1971

Boston Ork Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its 85th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning Oct. 28 at 8:30 p.m. Additional concerts by the Boston will be on Dec. 2 and Feb. 10.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

NOV 6 1971 New England Newsclip

Max Rudolf Guest Conductor for Boston Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE

Max Rudolf returned to Symphony Hall Thursday night to guest-conduct the Boston Symphony in a program that was repeated yesterday and which will be played again tonight and zTuesday. Rudolk's Boston concerts nearly always include at least one very well known work from the classical or romantic repertory, a practice not every concert-goer greets with enthusiasm. For example, a performance of Schubert's Symphony No. 9 — one of the works heard Thursday — has to be rather special in order to interest the listener who's heard it a score of times previously.

RUDOLK'S PERFORMANCE of the Ninth was special — special in a way that seems to characterize his readings of the standard repertory. It was not an eccentric or highly personal vision of the work. Neither was it an inordinately fussyy account, though it was indeed respectful of the composer's indicated wishes. It was the kind of performance that was enjoyable because it seemed to let the music speak for itself, which is an altogether unusual and pleasant thing to experience in a world that values interpreters above composers.

Rudolk's account of the Ninth had breadth and grandeur, but it was refreshingly free of pomp and frandiosity. Partly this was the result of exceedingly well judged tempos, a basic pulse that didn't require a gross speeding-up or slowing-down when a contrasting theme came along. The broad opening horn solo, for example, was taken at a speed that also suited the more lyrical woodwind passage a few bars later. (The solo, incidentally, sounded distorted, as though two horns were used on the accented notes.)

THEN, TOO, THERE WAS Rudolk's sensible way with Schubert's counter-melodies, especially those beautiful ones that occure in the Andante. Too many conductors tend to milk these for all they're worth — and more. Rudolf doesn't become over indulgent in spots like these, and — not surprisingly — the counter-medodies still sound ravishing.

The program opened with a clean-textured, satisfying reading of Webern's Passacaglia, Op. 1, and then proceeded to a performance of Rachmanioff's Third Piano Concerto which featured Horacio Gutierrez as soloist. Born in 1948 in Havana and now an American citizen, Gutierrez was a prize winner of the 1970 Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow. This was his first appearance with the Boston Symphony, and he appeared to make a rather sensational impression on both orchestra and audience Thursday night.

HIS TECHNICAL gifts are immense and he chose a debut vehicle that displayed his capabilities to the fullest. One could not help but be impressed with his brilliance and utter ease in passages of murderous difficulty, with the seemingly nonchalant way he dispatched fistfuls of notes.

I did feel that he might improve his control of the coloristic resources of the instrument. I felt, too, that his use of rubato was not always convincing and that, as a result, certain passages were devoid of the sense of mystery and poetry that is proper to them. Nonetheless, he is a fine artist, someone to be watched.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 11 1971 New England Newsclip

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

FEB 1972

Boston Symphony, Edinger (Steinberg)

The featured soloist at the October 30 Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony under William Steinberg's direction was the young German violinist Christiane Edinger, and she is an artist who knows what she is about. In Gottfried von Einem's neoromantic Violin Concerto of 1966 (which opens with a cadenza and closes with the slow movement—a pleasantly backward turn of events) she made every motion count. Without any tearing of hair or obvious emoting she revealed a temperament that is pointed, rather objective, and totally focused. Her tone is large, clear, and ringing, and she swept into von Einem's chromatic, rhapsodic, lyric lines with freedom and a sense of purpose. When the rhythms got pungent Miss Edinger did too, but what impressed one most was the clarity and direction which she imparts to a melodic line like the Mendelssohnian one in the last movement. Too bad that the work itself doesn't have more substance; it is mostly a soft and pretty piece. The bongo drum soloist paired vis à vis the solo violin in the third movement seemed a rather flashy idea intended to inject a section of contrast into a work that lacked inherent contrast in its basic materials. But the concerto was a good vehicle for Miss Edinger, whatever its shortcomings.

And the rest of the program was a good vehicle for Steinberg and the BSO: Beethoven's Sixth Symphony was the opener and it was played with a seasoned mellowness which, with no sense of stress or strain, let the music speak out. Steinberg has one of the quietest left hands in the business, and it was interesting to hear the orchestra shape its dynamics very positively with little signaling from the conductor. The hashing-over had obviously been done at rehearsal, because there was no mistaking the orderliness of events; the work was clean, alive, and beautifully laid out. Hindemith's Mathis der Maler left one wondering whether to admire the Boston brass or the Boston strings more; let's call it a tie. The former were bold and vibrant, the latter—especially in the unison passage in the last movement, played with a tone like dark honey. The principal feature of this Mathis was a superb clarity of line: Hindemith's polyphony has never been more distinctly delineated, and the combination of intelligence with glorious sound made it a performance to remember.

SHIRLEY FLEMING

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

OCT 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Rudolph Leads BSO Weekend Concerts

Max Rudolf, Music Director Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, Nov. 5, at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Nov. 6 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston. Concert opens with a performance of Webern's Passacaglia Op. 1, followed by Rachmaninov's Third piano concerto with soloist Horacio Gutierrez. Program concludes with Schubert's symphony no. 9, "The Great."

Former Music Director Erich Leinsdorf conducts the second concert of the Tuesday "A" series, Tuesday evening, Nov. 2, at 8:30 p.m. Program includes Schumann's Second symphony and music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet".

Mr. Rudolf conducts the second concert of the Thursday "A" series on Thursday evening, Nov. 4 at 8:30 p.m., repeating the Nov. 5, 6 selections.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

RUDOLF, GUTIERREZ AT BSO

An old line conductor, Max Rudolf, and somebody new among piano virtuosi, Horacio Gutierrez, arrived together on the Boston scene at Symphony last weekend. The program included Webern's "Passacaglia", op. 1, Rachmaninov Piano Concerto no. 3 in D minor and Schubert's Symphony no. 9 ("The Great C Major").

The stage appearance of the 21-year-old Cuban-born soloist was scarcely that of the man in the Stradivarius perfume ad and by the end of the work he was as disheveled as a member of the tribe from "Hair". Musically, it was another matter; he certainly managed to stir up a goodly amount of excitement before the concerto had run its course. This is the piece, incidentally, which was said to have torn the Friday afternoon ladies out of their seats when Horowitz introduced it here thirty years ago. Gutierrez has the big tone, incisively brilliant fingers and manifest capacity to extract such poetry and finesse as the D minor concerto—a block off the old chip of its parent, the C minor—possesses.

In fact his fault line was his vesting more poetry and finesse into this dessicated chestnut than it can take, particularly in the adagio movement. There his salon-like meditation tended to string things out to the point where interest discernibly sagged until rescued by the subsequent derring-do of the last movement. The big question is, as always in showcase concertos, what this young man can do with a work of real substance.

Perhaps the latter remark sounds like a knock for Rachmaninov, and that is not altogether fair. For all the conventionality of his writing and his debt to Tchaikovsky, Glazunov and Strauss, Rachmaninov possessed genuine lyric gifts and considerable strength of organization, together with an idiom that made him very much his own man. Of how many who have composed or are now composing can so much be said?

Mr. Rudolf, in his accompanying and in the doing of his own thing with the two remaining works on the program, was strictly GI, giving off neither excitement nor offense. The Webern wasn't much of a test.

It is not a display piece of anything except to demonstrate beyond peradventure how it was that the chromaticism of the late Wagner or the early Schoenberg or Scriabin left Webern with no alternative but to break out from the mold, which he was to do right after the "Passacaglia".

The Schubert "Great" C Major, on the other hand is very much a test of a conductor's mettle. Few works in the symphony literature are more protean in their melodic profusion and wealth of invention, and the injections, of course, of melancholy into what outwardly seems so joyous always come through as the sheerest of magic. But the haunting solos must be treated with rare delicacy if their poignancy is to be realized, the theme clusters need pacing and contrast, the understated climaxes must be made to sound like climaxes, and so on. Mr. Rudolf's readings revealed precious little awareness of such niceties. He plodded along vivaciously, to be sure, but propulsively and one-dimensionally, letting the score take care of itself. This is one of those symphonies where this approach does not wash, and so the "Symphony of Heavenly Length" in the end sounded more like a symphony of incredible length.

This weekend Seiji Ozawa conducts, and Andre Watts, pianist, and the Saint Paul Archdiocesan Choir School are the guest performers. The program will consist of Xenakis' "Polla ta dina", Beethoven's Symphony no. 4 in B flat, and the Tchaikovsky Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat minor.

Max Rudolf in concert of symphony

BOSTON — Max Rudolf, music director emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, conducts the fifth pair of Friday - Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, Nov. 5 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Nov. 6, at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The concert opens with a performance of Webern's Passacaglia Op. 1, followed by Rachmaninov's Third piano concerto with soloist Horacio Gutierres.

The program concludes Schubert's Symphony No. 9, "The Great."

Rudolf, currently head of the opera department at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, has been a professional musician for nearly 50 years. Born in Frankfurt - am - Main in 1902, he began to study piano at the age of five and composition at the age of 12. His high school music education included the study of composition, trumpet, cello and organ. He enrolled at Frankfurt University and the Hoch Conservatory of Music where he began his study of conducting.

In November, 1968, Rudolf announced his resignation from the Cincinnati Symphony to accept the post of head of the opera department at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, beginning in the fall of 1970. On his return to Cincinnati as a guest conductor during the 1969 - 1970 season, the Board of Directors appointed him Music Director Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony.

Horacio Gutierrez, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, was a prize winner of the 1970 Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow. Born in 1948 in Havanna, Cuba, he was soloist with the Havanna Symphony at the age of eleven. His family moved to Los Angeles in 1962. During his first five years in the United States, he performed on two occasions with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and in 1966 was chosen by Leonard Bernstein as soloist for the Young People's Concerts of the New York Philharmonic. Two years ago he performed at Tanglewood with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops. During the past season, he made an extended tour of the USSR and played again with the Los Angeles Philharmonic. His future concert engagements include performances with the Cleveland and Los Angeles Orchestras, and tours to the Netherlands and South America.

Rudolf conducts the second concert of the Thursday "A" series on Thursday evening, Nov. 4, at 8:30 p.m. The program includes Webern's Passacaglia Op. 1, Rachmaninov's Third piano concerto with soloist Horacio Gutierrez, and Schubert's Ninth symphony, "The Great."

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,261

NOV 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Philharmonia, Gutierrez

Symphony Hall firsts

By Louis Snyder

Symphony Hall was bursting over the weekend with events of ringing importance. Max Rudolf was warmly welcomed on his return to conduct three Boston Symphony concerts, which introduced 23-year-old pianist Horacio Gutierrez in a triumphant Boston debut. On Friday evening, the New Philharmonia Orchestra of London, directed by Lorin Maazel, also made its first appearance here to loud acclaim.

Mr. Rudolf's program had everything going for it, including a body of musicians who seemed to be playing their hearts out in response to his strong, no-nonsense beat. And it had the everpleasant element of discovery in the first performance here with the BSO of young Mr. Gutierrez in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto (D minor).

From the first touch of the keys, it was apparent that here was an artist of great sensitivity, and as the performance progressed, an astonishing technique emerged to give it wide-ranging expression. His playing had virility and heart, revealed not by breaking speed records or tearing the piano apart, but in an almost conversational dialogue with the orchestra, warmed and colored by an unfailing rhythmic sense. Listeners, increasingly enthused as the concerto unfolded, broke out in the most spontaneous, noisiest ovation of the season thus far as the music ended, and were joined by the musicians onstage, who obviously know one of their kind when they see one. It was a memorable moment, happily shared by soloist, conductor, orchestra, and audience.

Webern

The Rachmaninoff was preceded by Webern's Passacaglia (Op. 1), and followed by Schubert's "Great" Symphony (No. 9 in C). Webern's early "large-scale" work, has been performed only once before by the BSO (in 1964), and despite its comparatively traditional form, seems destined to make its way slowly into public favor. It had the advantage of about the most lucid exposition possible by Mr. Rudolf and the orchestra, but it will need more hearings to win a rightful place in the standard repertory.

Mr. Rudolf's reading of the Schubert emphasized two of the primary ingredients of this masterly score — grandeur and grace — in a way that negated the ponderousness of some interpretations. It was clearly textured, offered with a slight dash of theatricality, and, despite its length, didn't seem long at all. There was another hearty demonstration after this one, to send listeners on their way congratulating one another on their musical good fortune — at least two winners out of three.

The New Philharmonia of London, paying its first visit to Symphony Hall last Friday night, gave Bostonians a chance to hear in person the fabled orchestra organized following World War II, with top British musicians, as a combined recording-concert body, then abandoned in 1964, practically overnight, by its sponsor. Its subsequent assumption of self-governing status, venerable Otto Klemperer's decision to remain as its musical director, and the appointment of Lorin Maazel as principal assistant conductor have all contributed to the legend of its indestructibility.

Maazel

Mr. Maazel (newly appointed music director of the Cleveland Orchestra) was at the helm on Friday to lead a program which consisted of the Adagio from Mahler's posthumous Tenth Symphony, Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms (E minor).

The orchestra of 110 members—only a few more than the Boston Symphony—nevertheless looked massive on Symphony Hall's stage, and produced a stunningly large sound. Perhaps the seating arrangement used in tricky Royal Festival Hall, their London home—violins forestage, flanking the conductor, basses upstage center—helped make the volume torrential. Or possibly the dilemma faced by all touring orchestras and conductors, of gauging the acoustics of each hall only as they are about to leave it, was in operation. In whatever case, the New Philharmonia emerged larger than life, possibly less to their satisfaction than that of an ecstatic public.

With a highly virtuosic band of instrumentalists at his disposal, Mr. Maazel conducted the Mahler with a marked degree of expressivity, plotted the intricacies of Schoenberg's Variations with ample skill, and finally indulged himself in a ringing interpretation of the Brahms. If the end results were more technically impressive than moving, it is probably because Mr. Maazel is a conductor whose baton makes it that way. And the New Philharmonia gives him what he asks. Perhaps on their next visit (they know the way here now), the orchestra will show how they play for a conductor more sensitive to the special capabilities of each opulent choir, a tendency not conspicuous on this occasion.

Horacio Gutierrez

The 23-year-old Cuban-born pianist won standing ovations at three concerts last week when he made his Boston debut at Symphony Hall with the Boston Symphony under Max Rudolf's direction. The concert is reviewed to the left.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

NOV 5 1971 New England Newsclip

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is doing Webern's "Passacaglia," Op. 1, tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto will feature soloist Horacio Gutierrez. The program winds up with Schubert's Symphony No. 9, "The Great."

Max Rudolf, music director emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra conducts the fifth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts.

Gutierrez, who makes his debut with the BSO at these concerts, won the 1970 Tchaikowsky competition in Moscow. A native of Havana, Cuba, he was soloist with the Havana Symphony at age 11.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

NOV 6 1971 New England Newsclip

Cuban pianist, 23, BSO soloist

Gutierrez in strong debut

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, which Max Rudolf conducted, was the occasion of the debut here of Horacio Gutierrez, a much talked about Cuban-born pianist, now 23. What he chose to play was Rachmaninoff's Concert No. 3 in D minor, a useful choice insofar as it leads to a virtually guaranteed success with the audience, but one that also poses problems.

Those problems begin with the piece. It is obviously an imitation of the C minor Concerto, made by a highly intelligent composer of eight years more experience, and able now to make a piece far richer in local detail, much more inventive in its writing for the instrument (and vastly more difficult to play), and more imaginative also about the interplay of solo and orchestra. Yet it sounds like an imitation, or perhaps, better, a sequel, one with less good melodies, and with less easy relation of form and material so that it sprawls.

A big bravure concerto like the Rachmaninoff D minor first of all tells you how well the pianist masters the instrument, and in that respect Gutierrez is impressive. He played it easily, with fluency and brilliance in passage work, with clear textures, with a rich, unforced sound, and it takes a remarkable instrumentalist to do all that. He is lively, too, and an appealing performer, a friendly, bulkily unglamorous young man who gets to the audience — and he really does get to them — all on his playing.

Having heard him play only Rachmaninoff, I am less clear about what kind of a musician Gutierrez is. He certainly did nothing outrageous, but I did not hear anything extraordinary either, nothing like that marvelously idiosyncratic tiger pounce of Rachmaninoff's own playing or the nobility of taste of Cliburn's. It was a performance on which one might be tempted to stick a label, something like "standard romantic," and I was disappointed, for example, that after the attractive simplicity with which Gutierrez played the opening, he did not go on to concern himself with the problem of how to make the lyric second theme not only expressive, but also part of the larger context, not so inclined to lose the drift in a very loose rubato.

I am curious to know how Gutierre plays music of more demanding and more subtly projected content. He had an exceptional success with both audience and orchestra, but though his performance was clearly good, and good enough really to want to make me know more, I did not find it as remarkable as all that.

Max Rudolf made an admirable contribution to the concerto both as scaffold builder and as listener, and the Boston Symphony played very well. Rudolf began the concert with Anton Webern's Passacaglia, Op. 1, and produced a performance, which in sorting out the difficult tempo relations and the equally non obvious, magical textures, was by some distance the most beautiful I have ever heard of that Janus-faced work, so intense and so refined, so full of Brahms, and of mature Webern, too.

The performance after intermission of Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C major was a little disappointing. It had good things, the energy in the scherzo and the finale, the approach to the climax of the second movement and the emerging from it, and the rhythmic clarity of the first movement coda, but there was surprising awkwardness, also, like beat-clipping at the beginning to a degree that, blindfold, I would instantly have guessed Leinsdorf as the conductor, and tempo transitions, particularly those into and out of the development of the first movement, that sounded like bad tape splices.

Moreover, the orchestral playing, which had been so lovely in the Webern, was much more variable in the Schubert, the fussiness of the solo oboe and the out of tuneness with each other of the first and second horns in their opening phrase giving particularly acute displeasure.

TOWNSMAN
ANDOVER, MASS.
W. 13,492
OCT 28 1971
New England Newsclip

Symphony On Friday Is Offered

Mrs. Hart Leavitt

To music lovers in the Greater Lawrence area, the Andover-North Andover Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra issues an invitation to attend one of the regular Friday afternoon concerts of the current season.

On Friday, Nov. 12, a number of tickets have been made available for people who would like to go in to Symphony Hall for the 2 p.m. performance. The concert will be conducted by guest Conductor Seiji Ozawa, in a program of works by Xenakis, Beethoven and Tchaikovsky.

This special opportunity has been arranged as an introduction to the Boston Symphony, particularly for people who are not subscribers or who have had little chance to hear the Orchestra.

Guests of the Friends will travel to Boston on the Symphony bus which leaves Andover at 10 a.m., arriving in Boston about 45 minutes later. Stops are made at Lechmere Station, Arlington St. at Boylston St., Copley Square, Symphony Hall and the Museum of Fine Arts.

After the concert the bus will leave from Massachusetts Avenue outside Symphony Hall and return directly to Andover, arriving at about 5 p.m.

Those interested in taking advantage of this opportunity should call one of the co-chairmen of the Andover-North Andover Council of Friends, Mrs. Hart Leavitt or Mrs. Alexander Warren, as soon as possible. Requests will be filled in the order of receipt, and the number is necessarily limited. Other members of the Council of Friends are: Mrs. Philip K. Allen, Mrs. Joseph L. Daly, Mrs. Harry M. Godden, Jr., Mrs. James Grew, Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Miss Ruth Hayes, Mrs. Albert P. Manzi, Mrs. Fredric S. O'Brien, Mrs. Samuel S. Rogers, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall and Mrs. Fredric Worthen.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900
NOV 11 1971
New England Newsclip

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500
NOV 11 1971
New England

Boy choir sings for Symphony

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time this season at the sixth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday, Nov. 12, at 2 p.m., and Saturday, Nov. 13 at 8:30 p.m. The concert opens with Xenakis' "Polla ta dina" with the St. Paul Archdiocesan Boychoir, Theodore Marier, director. Beethoven's Sixth symphony follows, and the concert concludes with a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano concerto No. 1 with soloist Andre Watts.

Andre Watts, still in his mid-twenties, made his debut with the Boston Symphony during the 1968-69 season. He started to study piano with his mother at an early age, and when he was nine, he won a competition to play a Haydn piano concerto at one of the Philadelphia Orchestra's Youth Concerts. The following summer he appeared at the Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia, and at the age of fourteen he was again soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Frank's Symphonic variations. He auditioned for Leonard Bernstein and in early 1963 was soloist at the New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. Three weeks later he stepped in to take the place of Glenn Gould, who was ill, at two regular New York Philharmonic subscription concerts. Since then, he has played with many of the world's leading orchestras, and has given many solo appearances in American and European cities.

The St. Paul Choir School of Cambridge was founded eight years ago under the patronage of Cardinal Cushing. The pupils, ranging in age from ten to fourteen, receive a full academic training in addition to an extensive musical education. The Choir has toured extensively in recent years: they have performed not only throughout New England, but also New York, Florida, Wisconsin, and abroad in Italy, France, England and Ireland. The Choir has taken part in Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Harry Ellis Dickson, Director, and have sung concerts with the Harvard-Radcliffe and M.I.T. Choral Societies. The Choir appears for the first time with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

Thursday, Nov. 11 at 7:30 p.m. is the second Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal. Seiji Ozawa rehearses music for the following weekend's concerts. Tickets are $3 each with seats unreserved. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

CHRONICLE
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
W. 13,735
NOV 11 1971
New England Newsclip

St. Paul Choir Debuts With Boston Symphony

St. Paul's Boys Choir makes its debut this weekend with the Boston Symphony.

The choir will open the symphony's program Friday afternoon, November 12, at 2 p.m., and on Saturday evening, November 13, at 8:30 p.m., with Xenakis' "Polla ta dina".

The choir school was founded here eight years ago under the patronage of Cardinal Cushing. The pupils, ranging in age from 10 to 14, receive a full academic training in addition to an extensive musical education. The choir has toured extensively in recent years, performing not only throughout New England, but also New York, Florida, Wisconsin, and abroad in Italy, France, England and Ireland.

The choir has taken part in Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall and has sung concerts with the Harvard - Radcliffe and MIT choral societies. The choir appears for the first time with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program for Friday and Saturday's concerts will also include Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, with soloist Andre Watts.

Theodore Marier is director of the St. Paul Archdiocesan Boychoir.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202
NOV 13 1971
New England Newsclip

* * *

Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6 and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 will head the program. Andre Watts will be soloist in the concerto.

The St. Paul Archdiocesan Boychoir of Cambridge will perform Zenakis's "Polla ta dina" under the direction of Theodore Marier.

The Choir School, founded eight years ago under the patronage of the late Richard Cardinal Cushing, consists of pupils ranging in ages from 10 to 14. Pupils receive complete academic training with an emphasis on musical education. The choir has toured the United States, Italy, France, England and Ireland.

Watts, a young soloist in his mid-twenties, made his debut with the BSO during the 1968-69 season. He has played with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and has toured Europe and America.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Harold Banks

Bok Balks at FBI Squawk

Harvard's Derek Bok on the FBI's interrogation of Asst. Law Prof. Laurence Tribe about his public criticism of several of Nixon's nominees for the U.S. Supreme Court: "Such overtures, while perhaps not dangerous in themselves, carry overtones which we find distasteful." Bok's predecessor, Nathan Pusey, had to stand up to attacks on the faculty from another quarter — late Sen. J. McCarthy of Wisconsin . . . Tech High headmaster Ed Foley telephoned alumni Nick and Mike Valless of the Omonia restaurant, as suggested here, and they quickly agreed to have the 40-man Tech city champ football team as their guests Dec. 1, along with the coach and such members of the School Committee as can arrange to be there . . . Dame Gladys Cooper, the frequently honored British actress has made it abundantly clear that she isn't an admirer of "Jesus Christ Superstar." . . . Maybe there's a counter movement to the counterculture. At least 200 had to be turned away from the Boston Symphony's most recent open rehearsal for lack of space.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
NOV 10 1971
New England Newsclip

St. Paul's Choir gets pure A through effort

By Joan Mahoney
Globe Correspondent

Rehearsal in Cambridge, 2:10 p.m.: It was the classic classroom, full of boys elbowing, pummeling, laughing, chatting.

Rehearsal in Cambridge, 2:20 p.m.: It was a mini-symphony hall, ringing with a beautiful, rounded chanting led by a dynamic young conductor.

It all happened yesterday afternoon at St. Paul's Choir School, where 25 youngsters met with Seji Ozawa, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to run through their part in a work that will be performed for the first time this week at Symphony.

For the performance, the boys of St. Paul's will serve as a Greek chorus, chanting a text from the "Antigone" of Sophocles, set to music by the modern Greek composer Iannis Xanakis. Their part is difficult; throughout "Polla ta Dina" which lasts for a little over seven minutes, they chant — though declaim is a better description — on one note.

Ther words, which tell of the joyous wonders of the world, are sung out on that one unchanging "A", though the grouping and emphasis of the words does change.

The orchestra, meanwhile, slips around that chant. It will be an ear-opener of a work; "very modern and absolutely wild," says St. Paul's music director Theodore Marier of Belmont.

Yesterday's rehearsal was a study in contrasts as well as music. An unperformed work being rehearsed in a room sometimes filled with medieval music. A Japanese conductor leading the music of modern Greece sung by boys from West Roxbury and Malden and Dorchester.

Ozawa's coral jersey, flared jeans; the boys' dark trousers, white or pastel tailored shirts.

But the diverse elements were linked by music and the chant, preceeded by the simultaneous "whoosh" of 25 deep breaths, belled out into the room, punctuated by Ozawa's quiet comments. "Watch me! This will be difficult. Good. Very good! Now here you have to—how do you say — ah, concentrate, yes concentrate. Now! Piano, crescendo, strong! Good! Thank you."

When the rehearsal was over, he told them that the composer Xenakis is a mathematician as well as a musician. "So that is why the music sounds like Mass sometimes. Next time you work with us, we will hope to give you a melody."

The boys of the Choir School will sing at Symphony Thursday at the open rehearsal, will perform "Polla ta Dina" Friday afternoon and evening, and Saturday evening, and will travel to Providence next Tuesday to chant the modern Greek work there.

SEIJI OZAWA REHEARSES THE ST. PAUL'S BOYS' CHOIR.
(Joseph Dennehy photo)

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 266,961

NOV 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa Conducts BSO, St. Paul's Choir Boys in 'Polla Ta Dina'

By HARRY NEVILLE

There are certain Friday afternoons in Symphony Hall when the inscrutability of the audience can be as interesting, if not more so, than the music. Generally this happens during the performance of some particularly "advanced" score, such as Iannis Xenakis's "Polla ta dina," played and sung yesterday by the BSO and the Boys of the St. Paul Archdiocesan Choir School under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

"Polla ta dina" is hard-to-take music, and I wondered about its effect on the audience. Were the listeners intensely absorbed or were they merely being grimly polite? Possibly they were indulging some private fantasy, like the E. M. Forster character who constructed a story about an elephant while listening to Beethoven's Fifth.

IN ANY EVENT, an admission of such speculation says something about my own reaction, which I suspect wasn't very different from that of a majority of the audience; absorption up to a point, then confusion about the succession of events and, finally, frustration and a little boredom.

"Polla ta din" is a setting for children's choir and orchestra (the latter unusually rich in percussion resources) of the chorus of Sophocles's "Antigone" which begins, "Wonders are many, and none is more wonderful than man. . . ." The words are intoned on a pitch that remains constant throughout, while the orchestra provides an intricate commentary, "as closely approximating electronic music as can be achieved by instruments," as Andrew Raeburn's program notes pointed out.

BY CONFESSING boredom I don't mean to dismiss this work, from which I gained an impression of extraordinarily rich fantasy and inventiveness. The Piece definitely deserves to be heard more than once, but it would be immeasurably helpful to one's understanding of the music if a phonetic text as well as translation were provided.

Pianist Andre Watts was yesterday's soloist. He is nothing if not a pianist who revels in virtuosity, and he had a perfect vehicle for virtuosity in Tchaikovsky's ubiquitous, omnipresent First Concerto. Watts is an artist who seems really to enjoy the act of performance, and he communicates that enjoyment in a way that cannot help but be pleasurable for the listener.

HE PLAYED with a huge but beautifully controlled tone that to this listener suggested a bygone era of pianism. On the other hand, he seemed to have relatively modern notions about tempo and rhythm. The Andante was perhaps a little on the slow side but elsewhere there was nothing eccentric about tempos. Neither was there a great deal of license in the matter of rubato. The pyrotechnics fell short only in the celebrated octave passages, taken at a ferocious speed that he didn't quite carry off.

The remaining work on the program was Beethoven's Fourth Symphony of which Ozawa gave a reading that was poised and cool, though not lacking in underlying tenderness and depth. Particular joys of the performance were the lovely cantabile of the slow movement and the marvelous pacing of the first movement's introduction, that extraordinary bit of writing whose imaginativeness never fails to astonish.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 18 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

OZAWA AND WATTS AT BSO

One of the most frequent and welcome of guests, in these years of many guests on the Boston Symphony Orchestra podium, is Seiji Ozawa. Whatever he essays he does with notable elan, even when the program he chooses or is thrust upon him seems arrived at by lottery.

Lottery or no, last weekend's proceedings turned out notably rewarding. Not that the short opening work, a piece by Iannis Xanekis called "Polla ta dina" (Wonders are Many) for boys' choir and orchestra held forth much promise of things to come. It is a moderately far-out exercise in pushing forward the frontiers of orchestral sound combinations, in this instance to make live players emulate electronic music while accompanied by a repeated single note sung by the choir to the text of a chorus from Sophocles' Antigone. On first listening the audience, including this member thereof, rather lost the thread of construction. When the piece suddenly ceased and desisted in medias res, a kind of startled silence was followed by amiable applause when the conductor called upon the young lads of the St. Paul Archdiocesan Choir School and their director to take a bow.

Mr. Ozawa's stamp of unmistakable authority, however, was apparent within a few bars of the next work, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. One had the feeling of the relaxation but strength of a performance that comes with total control, of reservoirs of power that need never be drawn upon, of beautiful instrumental sound coupled with lively and fluid response. The various principals were at the top of their form in the solo parts, rendering whole sections of the Adagio as if it were part of a Boston Symphony Chamber Players performance. Everything was carried off with a neat admixture of restraint, virility and taste—no cheap theatricals, for example, in the pause before the closing rush of the final movement.

After intermission, Andre Watts joined the forces as soloist in Tchaikowsky's B flat minor piano concerto. Popular success was a foregone conclusion, for Watts is black and beautiful and gifted, and the Tchaikowsky, whatever else you may say about it, carries enormous clout. No matter, for Mr. Watts distinguished himself on his own merits as an artist.

If the Tchaikowsky is full of haunting themes and warm onrushes, it is also full of the stickiest Tchaikowsky goo and for the most has long been relegated to the worlds of Mantovani or Liberace or Earl Wild. Mr. Watts may well be overdoing his concentration on pieces of the sweeping romantic school, but here he certainly managed to restore authenticity and no small measure of credibility to this overworked vehicle. In doing so he made it sound like a great and exciting masterwork and not just another opportunity to display some spectacular finger technique and large sounds. The phrases were nicely shaped and the pacing, in collaboration with sympathetic and knowing accompaniment, was expressive.

As one of the most experienced string players in the orchestra remarked after the concert, "I've heard the Tchaikowsky piano concerto raped for twenty-five years, now at last I have heard it played." Mr. Watts will be returning to Boston in recital in February and it should prove of more than passing interest to hear how he plays what.

Mr. Ozawa concludes his two-week stint here this weekend with a program that consists of Haydn's Symphony No. 96 in D, the "Miracle"; Bartok's Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin"; and Takemitsu's "Dorian Horizon" for strings and "Cassiopeia" for percusesion and orchestra, premiere performances here. The percussion soloist will be John Wyre.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

NOV 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Ozawa conducts Symphony

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

An odd mixed grille of the new, the familiar and the warhorse was put together by Seiji Ozawa at Symphony yesterday afternoon. Along with the Beethoven Fourth Symphony and the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto in B-flat minor with Andre Watts as soloist, Ozawa repeated Xenakis' "Polla ta dina" which was given its U.S. premiere at Tanglewood last summer.

Based on a text from Sophocles' "Antigone" dealing with the wonders of man, "Polla ta dina" is scored for orchestra and boy choir. The words are sung on a single A with subtle variatons of rhythm, attack, and dynamics that make for a fascinating vocal line. Against this constant and around it, the orchestra provides sounds that approximate, as nearly as possible, those produced by electronic instruments.

After three listenings, I find the piece quite accessible, even attractive in its surface details, but it doesn't really speak to me. There seems to be little relation between what the orchestra is doing and what the boys are singing, and little relation between the musical setting and the text other than exploitation of the words for their purely sonic value.

The Tchaikovsky, which hasn't been heard on a subscription concert for 21 years, received the kind of performance it doesn't usually get — tasteful and conscientious, for the most part, with the orchestra playing as if this were a new piece not something the musicians could go through blind-folded.

The performance was strange, though, in that Watts could not seem to maintain this serious attitude to the music and kept reverting to something of the pops-concert sort of excesses that have become so associated with this piece. When playing with the orchestra, he was the self-effacing musician immersed in presenting the music. When it came to the cadenzas, it was a look-how - fast - I - can - play-these-octaves posture (the octaves, however, were muddy) that left the music in the background.

I keep forgetting what a fine work the Beethoven Fourth is, and I was glad to hear it again yesterday, although I'm not sure if I would have chosen that particular context for it. Ozawa's performance was clean, logical and, in the fourth movement especially, exciting. The orchestra played beautifully although there were no pianissimos anywhere or many pianos which hurt and rather coarsened the delicate second movement.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

NOV 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony

Tomorrow afternoon, Nov. 12 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its sixth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts featuring Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducting Xenakis' "Polla ta dina," Beethoven's "Sixth Symphony" and a performance of Tchaikovsky's "Piano Concerto no. 1."

The concert begins at 2 p.m. Friday afternoon and 8:30 p.m. on Saturday, Nov. 13.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

NOV 11 1971 New England

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

NOV 11 1971

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

NOV 11 1971

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

NOV 11 1971 New England

[33]

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 220,861

NOV 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa Conducts BSO, St. Paul's Choir Boys in 'Polla Ta Dina'

By HARRY NEVILLE

There are certain Friday afternoons in Symphony Hall when the inscrutability of the audience can be as interesting, if not more so, than the music. Generally this happens during the performance of some particularly "advanced" score, such as Iannis Xenakis's "Polla ta dina," played and sung yesterday by the BSO and the Boys of the St. Paul Archdiocesan Choir School under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

"Polla ta dina" is hard-to-take music, and I wondered about its effect on the audience. Were the listeners intensely absorbed or were they merely being grimly polite? Possibly they were indulging some private fantasy, like the E. M. Forster character who constructed a story about an elephant while listening to Beethoven's Fifth.

IN ANY EVENT, an admission of such speculation says something about my own reaction, which I suspect wasn't very different from that of a majority of the audience; absorption up to a point, then confusion about the succession of events and, finally, frustration and a little boredom.

"Polla ta din" is a setting for children's choir and orchestra (the latter unusually rich in percussion resources) of the chorus of Sophocles's "Antigone" which begins, "Wonders are many, and none is more wonderful than man. . . ." The words are intoned on a pitch that remains constant throughout, while the orchestra provides an intricate commentary, "as closely approximating electronic music as can be achieved by instruments," as Andrew Raeburn's program notes pointed out.

BY CONFESSING boredom I don't mean to dismiss this work, from which I gained an impression of extraordinarily rich fantasy and inventiveness. The Piece definitely deserves to be heard more than once, but it would be immeasurably helpful to one's understanding of the music if a phonetic text as well as translation were provided.

Pianist Andre Watts was yesterday's soloist. He is nothing if not a pianist who revels in virtuosity, and he had a perfect vehicle for virtuosity in Tchaikovsky's ubiquitous, omnipresent First Concerto. Watts is an artist who seems really to enjoy the act of performance, and he communicates that enjoyment in a way that cannot help but be pleasurable for the listener.

HE PLAYED with a huge but beautifully controlled tone that to this listener suggested a bygone era of pianism. On the other hand, he seemed to have relatively modern notions about tempo and rhythm. The Andante was perhaps a little on the slow side but elsewhere there was nothing eccentric about tempos. Neither was there a great deal of license in the matter of rubato. The pyrotechnics fell short only in the celebrated octave passages, taken at a ferocious speed that he didn't quite carry off.

The remaining work on the program was Beethoven's Fourth Symphony of which Ozawa gave a reading that was poised and cool, though not lacking in underlying tenderness and depth. Particular joys of the performance were the lovely cantablile of the slow movement and the marvelous pacing of the first movement's introduction, that extraordinary bit of writing whose imaginativeness never fails to astonish.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,842 SUN. 566,377

NOV 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Ozawa conducts Symphony

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

An odd mixed grille of the new, the familiar and the warhorse was put together by Seiji Ozawa at Symphony yesterday afternoon. Along with the Beethoven Fourth Symphony and the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto in B-flat minor with Andre Watts as soloist, Ozawa repeated Xenakis' "Polla ta dina" which was given its U.S. premiere at Tanglewood last summer.

Based on a text from Sophocles' "Antigone" dealing with the wonders of man, "Polla ta dina" is scored for orchestra and boy choir. The words are sung on a single A with subtle variatons of rhythm, attack, and dynamics that make for a fascinating vocal line. Against this constant and around it, the orchestra provides sounds that approximate, as nearly as possible, those produced by electronic instruments.

After three listenings, I find the piece quite accessible, even attractive in its surface details, but it doesn't really speak to me. There seems to be little relation between what the orchestra is doing and what the boys are singing, and little relation between the musical setting and the text other than exploitation of the words for their purely sonic value.

The Tchaikovsky, which hasn't been heard on a subscription concert for 21 years, received the kind of performance it doesn't usually get — tasteful and conscientious, for the most part, with the orchestra playing as if this were a new piece not something the musicians could go through blind-folded.

The performance was strange, though, in that Watts could not seem to maintain this serious attitude to the music and kept reverting to something of the pops-concert sort of excesses that have become so associated with this piece. When playing with the orchestra, he was the self-effacing musician immersed in presenting the music. When it came to the cadenzas, it was a look-how - fast - I - can - play-these-octaves posture (the octaves, however, were muddy) that left the music in the background.

I keep forgetting what a fine work the Beethoven Fourth is, and I was glad to hear it again yesterday, although I'm not sure if I would have chosen that particular context for it. Ozawa's performance was clean, logical and, in the fourth movement especially, exciting. The orchestra played beautifully although there were no pianissimos anywhere or many pianos which hurt and rather coarsened the delicate second movement.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 18 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

OZAWA AND WATTS AT BSO

One of the most frequent and welcome of guests, in these years of many guests on the Boston Symphony Orchestra podium, is Seiji Ozawa. Whatever he essays he does with notable elan, even when the program he chooses or is thrust upon him seems arrived at by lottery.

Lottery or no, last weekend's proceedings turned out notably rewarding. Not that the short opening work, a piece by Iannis Xanekis called "Polla ta dina" (Wonders are Many) for boys' choir and orchestra held forth much promise of things to come. It is a moderately far-out exercise in pushing forward the frontiers of orchestral sound combinations, in this instance to make live players emulate electronic music while accompanied by a repeated single note sung by the choir to the text of a chorus from Sophocles' Antigone. On first listening the audience, including this member thereof, rather lost the thread of construction. When the piece suddenly ceased and desisted in medias res, a kind of startled silence was followed by amiable applause when the conductor called upon the young lads of the St. Paul Archdiocesan Choir School and their director to take a bow.

Mr. Ozawa's stamp of unmistakable authority, however, was apparent within a few bars of the next work, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. One had the feeling of the relaxation but strength of a performance that comes with total control, of reservoirs of power that need never be drawn upon, of beautiful instrumental sound coupled with lively and fluid response. The various principals were at the top of their form in the solo parts, rendering whole sections of the Adagio as if it were part of a Boston Symphony Chamber Players performance. Everything was carried off with a neat admixture of restraint, virility and taste—no cheap theatricals, for example, in the pause before the closing rush of the final movement.

After intermission, Andre Watts joined the forces as soloist in Tchaikowsky's B flat minor piano concerto. Popular success was a foregone conclusion, for Watts is black and beautiful and gifted, and the Tchaikowsky, whatever else you may say about it, carries enormous clout. No matter, for Mr. Watts distinguished himself on his own merits as an artist.

If the Tchaikowsky is full of haunting themes and warm onrushes, it is also full of the stickiest Tchaikowsky goo and for the most has long been relegated to the worlds of Mantovani or Liberace or Earl Wild. Mr. Watts may well be overdoing his concentration on pieces of the sweeping romantic school, but here he certainly managed to restore authenticity and no small measure of credibility to this overworked vehicle. In doing so he made it sound like a great and exciting masterwork and not just another opportunity to display some spectacular finger technique and large sounds. The phrases were nicely shaped and the pacing, in collaboration with sympathetic and knowing accompaniment, was expressive.

As one of the most experienced string players in the orchestra remarked after the concert, "I've heard the Tchaikowsky piano concerto raped for twenty-five years, now at last I have heard it played." Mr. Watts will be returning to Boston in recital in February and it should prove of more than passing interest to hear how he plays what.

Mr. Ozawa concludes his two-week stint here this weekend with a program that consists of Haydn's Symphony No. 96 in D, the "Miracle"; Bartok's Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin"; and Takemitsu's "Dorian Horizon" for strings and "Cassiopeia" for percusesion and orchestra, premiere performances here. The percussion soloist will be John Wyre.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

NOV 11 1971 New England Newscl

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

NOV 11 1971 New Englan

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

NOV 11 1971

Boston Symphony

Tomorrow afternoon, Nov. 12 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its sixth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts featuring Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducting Xenakis' "Polla ta dina," Beethoven's "Sixth Symphony" and a performance of Tchaikovsky's "Piano Concerto no. 1."

The concert begins at 2 p.m. Friday afternoon and 8:30 p.m. on Saturday, Nov. 13.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

NOV 11 1971

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

NOV 11 1971 New England

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

NOV 20 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony: 2 Japanese Works at BSO Concert

By HARRY NEVILLE

Conductor Seiji Ozawa introduced two works by one of his fellow countrymen at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony. Forty-one-year-old Toru Takemitsu, a number of whose works are available on recordings, is undoubtedly the best known of Japanese avant-garde composers.

He lives in Tokyo where, in 1951, he founded an advanced composer's group called the Experimental Laboratory, and his works reflect a keen interest in Japanese traditional music and in the techniques of many 20th century Western composers. Among the latter group, Debussy, Varese, Webern, Cage and Xenakis are some of the composers whose influence is acknowledged by Takemitsu himself.

THE WORKS PLAYED YESTERDAY WERE "The Dorian Horizon," a Koussevitzky Music Foundation commission dating from 1966, and "Cassiopeia," written this year and played by the BSO at Tanglewood last summer. The latter work is for solo percussion, and John Wyre, principal timpanist with the Toronto Symphony, was the soloist on both occasions.

"Dorian Horizon" is far and away the more successful of the two works. In three sections—which are marked, respectively, "always calm," "with vibration" and "without vibration"—it is scored for 17 stringed instruments, which are used to produce a variety of delicate, gamelan-like effects reminiscent of Webern.

Harmonically, the writing vaguely suggests Debussy, but there is little sense of what we are accustomed to think of as musical development, which accounted perhaps for a static, almost timeless quality as well as for an impression of slender content.

"CASSIOPEIA" takes its title from the constellation of the same name. Takemitsu apparently intended to represent the idea of a star surrounded by other stars with the musical idea of a solo percussionist surrounded, sonically and physically, by his own battery of instruments and by other groups of instruments. John Wyre, clad in yellow turtleneck and khaki trousers, made his entrance after the piece had begun by sneaking down the aisle and leaping on stage.

From that lamely theatrical beginning everything went downhill. The work made no coherent statement, might have gone on much longer than it did, or stopped sooner with hardly anyone being the wiser. I imagine it was fun for the players, however, and it certainly provided a showcase for Wyre's remarkable virtuosity.

AFTER INTERMISSION, Ozawa conducted Haydn's Symphony No. 96 and the concert suite from Bartok's "The Miraculous Mandarin." It's hard to imagine two more different musical worlds than these, and it's hard to imagine anyone more completely at home in each of them than Ozawa. Both works got stunning performances, the first all grace, elegance and warmth, the second all energy and primeval drive combined with astonishing lucidity. The program will be repeated tonight and my advice, in a word, is "Go!"

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,097

NOV 20 1971 New England Newsclip

Japanese Composer's Works Something to Hear and 'See'!

By ANN M. BEIERFIELD

Two startling and unique works by Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu left some of the audience bewildered, others enchanted, and absolutely no one bored, at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Conducted by Seiji Osawa, the two works are having their Boston premieres.

The opening piece, "Dorian Horizon," is frankly a bit too inscrutably Eastern for this reviewer's taste. But the second, "Cassiopeia" for percussion and orchestra, a veritable feast of percussions, is a marvel to hear and see.

Why to see?

Largely because of the fantastic artistry and rhythmic genius of young percussionist John Wyre, principal tympanist of the Toronto Symphony, and the musical "cage" he performs in.

He makes a surprise entrance from an audience seat, sprints down the aisle clicking wood blocks, mounts the stage and takes his place in an arbor-like device hung with every kind or percussion imaginable — Trinidad steel drum, German cowbells, sizzle cymbals, African karimba, tambourine, boo-bam, roto-tom and foot bass drums, to name a few.

Crouching gracefully, he moves from one instrument to another with catlike agility. The total effect is not one of raucous noise but miraculously, real delicacy and eloquence, shimmering like the constellation the piece was named for.

Western ears will long for a steady rhythm to back up all these percussions. The exotic, esoteric sounds behind Wyre will take some getting used to.

But what is so fine about this piece, and the soloist, is that they are capable of bringing such an elusive, mysterious quality to objects like drums, cymbals, and wooden plate. They make the instruments speak, in intriguing, other-world accents. We may not understand, but how we want to listen!

The Hayda Symphony No. 96 in D was a joy, conducted with the buoyancy, sensitivity and flair that have become Osawa's trademarks. The oboe solo in the third movement, (the Menuetto), was a flawless piece of work, performed with bubbling ease by Ralph Comberg.

Bartok's "Miraculous Mandarin" suite is a dramatic piece of business, rampant with discord, driving hard rhythms and a sordid theme — robbery, seduction and murder in a slum den of thieves.

But it is a feverishly exciting work, far ahead of its time when it was composed in 1918. The orchestra blazed through it with relentless intensity and a pounding magnificence that won a lengthy ovation.

The program will be repeated Saturday and Tuesday evenings.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 11 1971 New England Newsclip

LEADS BSO — Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood Artistic Director, conducts the Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, Nov. 19, at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Nov. 20 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston. Program includes Haydn's Symphony no. 96, Bartok's suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin", and two pieces by the Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu, "Dorian Horizon" for strings and "Cassiopeia" for percussion and orchestra. Percussion soloist is John Wyre, principal tympanist of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ozawa conducts the second concert of the Tuesday "B" series, Nov. 16 at 7:30 p.m. Beethoven's Fourth symphony and Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 6, "Pathetique".

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

NOV 20 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO: an unusual program

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon deviated from its usual subscription sort of programming and presented a concert three-quarters of which was devoted to music of the 20th century including two Boston premieres. The conductor was Seiji Ozawa, and the works included two by Toru Takemitsu, "Dorian Horizon" and "Cassiopeia"; Bartok's Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" and Haydn's Symphony No. 96 (The Miracle).

While this performance of "Cassiopeia" was the Boston premiere, it is really not new to the orchestra nor to some BSO audiences since it was played at Tanglewood last summer. This was the first crack at "Dorian Horizon," however, and the two works make for interesting sonic contrasts.

The latter, scored for strings arranged according to a specified spatial plan, is intimate, calm, static. The strings are deployed in almost every conceivable manner including techniques of non-vibrato; harmonics; bowing on the fingerboard, on the bridge, behind the bridge. Movement is made to seem directionless, timeless by melodic fragments, drone-like glissandi, and non-beaty rhythms.

"Cassiopeia," on the other hand, is overt, showy, immediately accessible. It is scored for orchestra and solo percussionist, and is a tour de force for the featured performer, in his case, John Wyre. All manner of percussion instruments are used, and in this exploitation of color resources, "Cassiopeia" and "Dorian Horizon" are similar.

I must admit to a preference for the percussion piece because it really is such an engaging show on all levels. Visually, there is this bearded percussionist clad in yellow turtleneck and wheat-colored jeans who makes his entrance from the first floor aisle, tapping on a wood block, and hops casually onto the stage. From his first appearance, he is constantly in motion, bending, kneeling, crouching in order to reach all the instruments, and occasionally "conducting" the orchestra.

The sound is really attractive too, with a shimmering quality imparted by the reverberance of bells, cymbals, steel sheet (a saw), and with all the sounds that are produced by a variety of drums.

The second half of the concert provided another sort of contrast ,that of the handn's grace and elegance and the Bartok's vulgarity and brutality. The first was distinguished by a vigorous finale and Ralph Gomberg's oboe solo in the third-movement Trio. The Bartok, whose musical savagery produced a near-physical reaction, was wonderfully played with absolute tight control by Ozawa and a marvellously seductive clarinet solo by Harold Wright.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

NOV 22 1971 New England

Ozawa at BSO—Takemitsu and a caged percussionist

First Symphony Hall performances of two works by Toru Takemitsu, one of Japan's leading composers, provided the opening half of weekend concert fare by the Boston Symphony under Seiji Ozawa. Haydn's Symphony No. 96 in D ("Miracle"), and Bartok's "Miraculous Mandarin" made up the rest of the program, which is being repeated tomorrow evening.

The first Takemitsu piece, "The Dorian Horizon," a Koussevitzky Foundation commission dating from 1966, divides a complement of 17 string players into two groups (9 echoes and 8 harmonic pitches), and specifies that they be "separated as far as possible"—physically, that is. The three sections of the work form a rather extenuated whole in which effects, sometimes Oriental, sometimes electronic, are produced by the manner in which the various instruments are played, some together, some singly. Bowing positions, percussive string-beating, pizzicati imitative of the Japanese biwa are all part of it. Only time and familiarity will tell if this leisurely exercise can solidify into a congenial listening experience.

Percussion hit

On the other hand, "Cassiopeia," a kind of concerto for solo percussionist and orchestra (premiered at Ravinia with the Chicago Symphony last July 8, and played on July 31 by the BSO at Tanglewood, both under Mr. Ozawa) won instant acceptance from Symphony Hall audiences. The work begins with Mr. Ozawa directing the full orchestra, which is divided into four assorted groups, plus extra brass and string players. They are placed around a circular cage-like structure, center stage. Within and on its bars are cymbals, drums, bells, sheets, blocks, plates, boo-bams, roto-toms, and tom toms of all shapes, sizes, and sonorities. But where is John Wyre, the announced soloist?

The orchestral introduction (a zesty start) is well on its way when Mr. Wyre, in yellow jersey and chinos, springs from among the main floor subscribers, beating a wood block, and makes it to the stage in time to give all the percussive stars within Cassiopeia's "constellation" cage a virtuosic going over. The myriad sounds, wonderfully complemented in the orchestral writing, come cascading from the enclosure as Mr. Wyre taps this, tinkles that, and strikes the other in breathtaki titillating succession.

Carefull nit

Aside f the obvious theatrical excitement that all this generates, the piece itself provides its own pleasurable rewards. The percussion sounds are not just chance flailing at anything within reach—they are carefully knit into the fabric of the composition with telling results. A cadenza (if that is the proper name here) for the percussionist alone had a character closely allied to the music that had preceded it, and, while it may have been in part improvised, further confirmed Mr. Wyre's high degree of technical accomplishment and musicianship.

On Friday afternoon, "Cassiopeia," soloist, conductor, and musicians earned a rousing reception. and Cassiopeia's metal "throne" drew a crowd of curious subscribers to inspect its instrumental contents before it was disassembled during the intermission. The piece is named, as program notes remind us, for the mythical Ethiopian queen, who for her misdeeds was whisked up to the heavens and transmogrified into a topsy-turvy circle of stars.

This would have been a hard act to follow if Mr. Ozawa and the orchestra had not been in top form for the Haydn and the Bartok. Their different demands were met with charm and grace for the "Miracle" in D, and stunning bite and power in the "Mandarin." Outstandingly shining sounds came from Ralph Gomberg's oboe in the first, and Harold Wright's clarinet in the second—two dazzlers in superbly fashioned settings.

L. Sn.

TIMES-GAZETTE
WARREN, R. I.
W. 2,825

NOV 18 1971

New England Newsclip

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
W. 4,093

NOV 18 1971

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.
W. 4,600

NOV 19 1971

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
W. 4,093

NOV 11 1971

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.

NOV 12 1971

East Bay Calendar

What's Happening

Thursday, Nov. 18

Symphony Concert by the University of RI Orchestra will feature works by Franck, Grieg, and Sibelius, in the recital hall of the Fine Arts Center, Kingston, at 8 pm.

Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform works by Xenakis, Beethoven, and Tchaikovsky, under the direction of Seiji Ozawa in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence, at 8:30 pm.

MUSIC

TODAY

KINGSTON (University of Rhode Island Fine Arts Center Recital Hall)—Georgette E. Ross, mezzo soprano will give a senior recital at 4 p.m.

PROVIDENCE (SS. Peter and Paul Auditorium) — Marsha Vleck, soprano, accompanied by John Moriarty on piano will give a voice recital at 7:30 p.m.

WESTERLY (Christ Church) — Jack Hennigan, organist, will give a recital at 8 p.m.

Choral-Phantasie on "Wachet auf" ..... Max Reger
Nun komm der Heiden Heiland ..... J. S. Bach
Allein Gott in der Hoh sei Ehr
Ricercare a 6 voci
Shimah B'Koli ..... Vincent Persichetti
Trois Danses ..... Jehan Alain

TUESDAY

PROVIDENCE (Brown University, Alumnae Hall)—The Wheaton Trio — Nancy Cirillo on violin; Jay Humeston on cello and Victor Rosenbaum on piano will perform at 8:30 p.m.

PROVIDENCE (Rhode Island College, Room 138, Roberts Hall) — Demonstration of the music of Henrich Franz Biber presented by music students and faculty of Rhode Island College and narrated by Robert Currier at 1 p.m.

THURSDAY

KINGSTON (University of Rhode Island Fine Arts Center Recital Hall) — The URI Symphony Orchestra Concert will perform a program of late romantic music including selected works of Franck, Grieg and Sibelius at 8 p.m.

PROVIDENCE (Veterans' Memorial Auditorium) —The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Seiji Ozawa as conductor will perform at 8:30 p.m.

Polla ta dina ..... Zenakis
with the St. Paul's Boys Choir
Symphony No. 4 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 6 "Pathetique"
Tchaikovsky

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 149,649

NOV 16 1971

New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday at 8:30 p.m. at Veterans Auditorium.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,211

NOV 14 1971

New England

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

NOV 19 1971

New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Concert Conducted by Seiji Ozawa

By EDWIN SAFFORD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was particularly sensitive to its conductor last night at Veterans Auditorium in the second of its three concerts here. Under Seiji Ozawa, the Manchurian-born Japanese, the ensemble's response to what he wanted and what it played was just about completely attached.

Ozawa's program had interesting contrasts although two of his offerings were well enough known perhaps to tune out more sated tastes. They were the Beethoven Fourth and Tchaikovsky Sixth symphonies. But to tease there also was a piece by the Greek composer Iannis Xenakis.

That was his "Polla ta dina" in which the Boys of the St. Paul Archdiocesan Choir school of Cambridge participated. Xenakis, as if to humanize his brand of contemporary expression, has written the work to orchestrally approximate sounds produced by synthesizer or electronic tape.

The result had much handsome effect, coloration and warmth. Against his texture of by now recognizable devices there was a text from Sophocles' "Antigone" sung by the boys on the constant note of A and this part, given sweet-voiced intonation, confirmed that impression of placing things in a human perspective.

"Only against Death shall (man) call for aid in vain; but from baffling maladies he hath devised escapes." There is more than a little having to do with resilience here. Too bad some of the audience did not arrive in time to read program notes and thus achieve more from this one hearing.

The Beethoven and Tchaikovsky symphonies were nicely pitted against one another, the one in B flat the other in B minor. And in the Beethoven especially you had a performance in which you could hear the unfamiliar from amongst so much that was familier.

The orchestra for Ozawa possessed truly contained energies. While there was a good deal of careful dynamic control the piece would be spirited or obtain palladian balance. It was very well thought out and the conductor allowed a quantity of interior figuration to escape forth to give the music freshness.

That, in fact, was the most grateful part of the evening. For those still in love with the Tchaikovsky, however, undoubtedly feelings, sentiments and affections were endorsed. For those fickle others of us you could still understand, even respect what attracted in the dear old days.

Although old fires may not have been rekindled, although you might say what a terrific ballet or opera the "Pathetique" would have been, respect was far from grudging since the score went so sononously. As mostly happens these days the audience applauded the march movement and then snuggled down to enjoy the tragi-tragic finale, only the opening measures of which this listener could remain to hear.

Anyway Ozawa, the orchestra and the boy choir, whose director is Theodore Marier, gave us an evening full of satisfactions. If one of them was not brand new it satisfied nonetheless.

PUEBLO, COLO.
STAR-JOURNAL AND CHIEFTAIN
SUN: 46,500

NOV 28 1971

Duncan: Boston Symphony Group Can Do Anything

By JAMES DUNCAN
Professor of Music
Southern Colorado State College
Special to The Pueblo Star-Journal and Sunday Chieftain

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in a very real sense a lab orchestra. Aside from being one of the very finest orchestras in the entire world (that is, of course, "gut feeling"—I haven't heard all the orchestras in the entire world), the Boston Orchestra makes an enormous contribution to music education in the United States.

James Duncan

On Tuesday morning I sat quietly through a two-hour rehearsal of the orchestra under the baton of Erich Kunzel. Mr. Kunzel is a young American (California) who has been with the Cincinnati Symphony for several years. His hair in some disarray, wearing brown slacks and a white turtle-neck shirt with the shirt-tail out, he lumbered to the podium with his own scores under his arm; said good morning to the orchestra; picked up his baton; announced the order of rehearsal and began.

Conductor, Orchestra "Meet"

This was a rehearsal for a Nov. 26 concert in Boston and Mr. Kunzel's first time with the Boston Orchestra.

The orchestra is actually so good that it plays itself. Surely it is a greater thing, even with the tolerable background of Erich Kunzel (student of Monteux) for the conductor to be asked to guest conduct the Boston than it is for the orchestra to have any specific conductor — including Erich Kunzel—at the helm!

The result of the situation was a curious thing. Mostly, Kunzel let the orchestra know what he was not going to do ("We won't do it that way, it's too dangerous") — at which point everything fell into place and a musical miracle took place in Symphony Hall.

Erich Kunzel conducts the music he likes — which is, of course, the music he knows. (For a conductor to face the Boston Orchestra without complete and total familiarity with the scores would be the same as commiting professional suicide!) He has a sense of humor — or the good sense to appreciate the orchestra's humor — in a hyper-dramatic moment. Fists clenched, eyes closed, Kinzel stopped the orchestra and emoted to the viola section: "Violas, it is a triple piano." At which Burton Fine responded, "Sorry, Mr. Kunzel, our music says only two!"

Concertmaster Talented

Kunzel relied on Joseph Silverstein a great deal. Which is a wise thing to do, I suspect. Concertmaster Silverstein can sense the "thumbs up" or "thumbs down" feeling about the conductor in Boston Symphony protocol. Whether it should be this way or not, this is how it is. And the only time the orchestra makes a mistake is when the conductor makes a mistake — and then just sometimes!

Kunzel's showpieces for this week are: "Overture to Colas Breugnon" by Kabaleusky, which he spot rehearsed; "Lions" by Ned Rorem, which he went through in fine detail; the Khachaturian Piano Concerto (soloist Alicia DeLarracho was not at this rehearsal, so it was mostly reviewing the orchestral interludes); and the Elgar "Enigma" Variations, Opus 36, which Kunzel rehearsed the daylights out of the opening the the closing.

I felt that Erich Kunzel related most closely to the Rorem piece. "Lions" is a curious composition. It begins with soft strings—a guarantee of stereophonic sound exists in Symphony Hall (it is a musician's dream fulfilled). The quiet strings are interrupted by a super-imposition of frightening dissonant brass. this melts into a jazzy trio — saxophone, trap drums and piano in a most sophisticated attitude and still backed with the nostalgic string sound. The two contrasting elements (soft jazz — screaming brass) continue, sometimes reaching a heated, dissonant wall of sound; then again the subduing the other.

Erich Kunzel knows and apparently admires the piece. He also knows the Elgar Variations, but here his directions had not so much to do with what he wanted as to do with any discrepancies between the conductor's score and the parts. I have no doubt that the Boston Orchestra can do anything. Kunzel becomes a kind of honorary member for two hours and checks to see that the printed page is the same for everyone! The finished product is really rather good.

Ozawa Conducts

As luck would — and did — have it (tickets are really pretty scarce for the subscription series), I got a ticket for Tuesday evening's concert.

The guest conductor was the young Manchurian genius Seiji Ozawa, now music director of the San Francisco Symphony. He is dynamic. The man must be seen on the podium to be believed. He breathes life into every single phrase. Dressed in tails and flared cuffs, he pleads the sound with his hands; walks, dances and bounces the music as he makes it happen; and then shyly gives full credit to the orchestra. I suspect the Boston Symphony could do for any conductor what they did for Ozawa. The point is they did it for Ozawa and at the finish stamped their feet, clapped their hands, and tapped their bows on the music racks as they, along with an audience in a burst of enthusiasm, called Seiji Ozawa again and again to the stage.

The concert opened with two compositions, both first Boston performances, by the Japanese conposer Toru Takemitsu. The first, called "The Dorion Horizon," is scored for 17 stringed instruments in special seating arrangement to follow for nine echoes and eight harmonic pitches to be separated as far as the stage will permit. Directions for performance also include details about beating the strings, bowing over the fingerboard and behind the bridge for indeterminate pitch. The work is based on the Dorian mode and is cast in three short sections.

Mythological Number

The second is called "Cassiopeia" and has a program in mythology. It features a performer on any number of Japanese percussion instruments, all arranged in a cage to the conductor's right. The soloist, John Wyre, principal timpanist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, made his entrance to the stage and cage from the center isle, playing a wood-block and dressed in a costume not unlike the judo aspirants. At one point Mr. Wyre directed the orchestra for a few bars. The mysterious East!

Post-intermission numbers included the Haydn Symphony No. 96 ("Miracle") and Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin."

The program notes said that the story about a falling chandelier was legend only. (Haydn remembered nothing of the incident.) So that still leaves a question about the nickname "Miracle." Be that as it may, the symphony as played by the Boston group with Seiji Ozawa is a miracle of sound. There is (or can be) more drama in the music of Haydn than I knew existed. The third movement (Menuetto) was perfect definition of the dance form. Even in its simplicity it is a bold linear statement. At times Ozawa controlled it with his eyes rather than his hands. (The Boston Symphony can indeed do anything.)

The Bartok was one of the most exciting musical performances in my memorly. Ozawa crowned himself king of the evening — but again deferred to the orchestra — shaking the hand of every performer within his reach.

TIMES-GAZETTE
WARREN, R. I.
W. 2,825
NOV 18 1971
New England Newsclip

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
W. 4,093
NOV 19 1971

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.
W. 4,600
NOV 19 1971

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
W. 4,093
NOV 11 1971

PHOENIX
NOV 12 1971

PUEBLO, COLO.
STAR-JOURNAL AND CHIEFTAIN
SUN. 46,500
NOV 28 1971

East Bay Calendar

What's Happening

Thursday, Nov. 18

Symphony Concert by the University of RI Orchestra will feature works by Franck, Grieg, and Sibelius, in the recital hall of the Fine Arts Center, Kingston, at 8 pm.

Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform works by Xenakis, Beethoven, and Tchaikovsky, under the direction of Seiji Ozawa in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence, at 8:30 pm.

MUSIC

TODAY

KINGSTON (University of Rhode Island Fine Arts Center Recital Hall)—Georgette E. Ross, mezzo soprano will give a senior recital at 4 p.m.

PROVIDENCE (SS. Peter and Paul Auditorium) — Marsha Vleck, soprano, accompanied by John Moriarty on piano will give a voice recital at 7:30 p.m.

WESTERLY (Christ Church) — Jack Hennigan, organist, will give a recital at 8 p.m.

Choral-Phantasie on "Wachet auf" ..... Max Reger
Nun komm der Helden Heiland ..... J. S. Bach
Allein Gott in der Hoh sei Ehr
Ricercare a 6 voci
Shimah B'Koli ..... Vincent Persichetti
Trois Danses ..... Jehan Alain

TUESDAY

PROVIDENCE (Brown University, Alumnae Hall)—The Wheaton Trio — Nancy Cirillo on violin; Jay Humeston on cello and Victor Rosenbaum on piano will perform at 8:30 p.m.

PROVIDENCE (Rhode Island College, Room 138, Roberts Hall) — Demonstration of the music of Henrich Franz Biber presented by music students and faculty of Rhode Island College and narrated by Robert Currier at 1 p.m.

THURSDAY

KINGSTON (University of Rhode Island Fine Arts Center Recital Hall) — The URI Symphony Orchestra Concert will perform a program of late romantic music including selected works of Franck, Grieg and Sibelius at 8 p.m.

PROVIDENCE (Veterans' Memorial Auditorium) —The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Seiji Ozawa as conductor will perform at 8:30 p.m.

Polla ta dina ..... Zenakis
with the St. Paul's Boys Choir
Symphony No. 4 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 6 "Pathetique" Tchaikovsky

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 149,649
NOV 16 1971
New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday at 8:30 p.m. at Veterans Auditorium.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,211
NOV 14 1971
New England

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
NOV 19 1971
New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Concert Conducted by Seiji Ozawa

By EDWIN SAFFORD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was particularly sensitive to its conductor last night at Veterans Auditorium in the second of its three concerts here. Under Seiji Ozawa, the Manchurian-born Japanese, the ensemble's response to what he wanted and what it played was just about completely attached.

Ozawa's program had interesting contrasts although two of his offerings were well enough known perhaps to tune out more sated tastes. They were the Beethoven Fourth and Tchaikovsky Sixth symphonies. But to tease there also was a piece by the Greek composer Iannis Xenakis.

That was his "Polla ta dina" in which the Boys of the St. Paul Archdiocesan Choir School of Cambridge participated. Xenakis, as if to humanize his brand of contemporary expression, has written the work to orchestrally approximate sounds produced by synthesizer or electronic tape.

The result had much handsome effect, coloration and warmth. Against his texture of by now recognizable devices there was a text from Sophocles' "Antigone" sung by the boys on the constant note of A and this part, given sweet-voiced intonation, confirmed that impression of placing things in a human perspective.

"Only against Death shall (man) call for aid in vain; but from baffling maladies he hath devised escapes." There is more than a little having to do with resilience here. Too bad some of the audience did not arrive in time to read program notes and thus achieve more from this one hearing.

The Beethoven and Tchaikovsky symphonies were nicely pitted against one another, the one in B flat the other in B minor. And in the Beethoven especially you had a performance in which you could hear the unfamiliar from amongst so much that was familier.

The orchestra for Ozawa possessed truly contained energies. While there was a good deal of careful dynamic control the piece would be spirited or obtain palladian balance. It was very well thought out and the conductor allowed a quantity of interior figuration to escape forth to give the music freshness.

That, in fact, was the most grateful part of the evening. For those still in love with the Tchaikovsky, however, undoubtedly feelings, sentiments and affections were endorsed. For those fickle others of us you could still understand, even respect what attracted in the dear old days.

Although old fires may not have been rekindled, although you might say what a terrific ballet or opera the "Pathetique" would have been, respect was far from grudging since the score went so sononously. As mostly happens these days the audience applauded the march movement and then snuggled down to enjoy the tragi-tragic finale, only the opening measures of which this listener could remain to hear.

Anyway Ozawa, the orchestra and the boy choir, whose director is Theodore Marier, gave us an evening full of satisfactions. If one of them was not brand new it satisfied nonetheless.

Duncan: Boston Symphony Group Can Do Anything

By JAMES DUNCAN
Professor of Music
Southern Colorado State College
Special to The Pueblo Star-Journal and Sunday Chieftain

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in a very real sense a lab orchestra. Aside from being one of the very finest orchestras in the entire world (that is, of course, "gut feeling"—I haven't heard all the orchestras in the entire world), the Boston Orchestra makes an enormous contribution to music education in the United States.

James Duncan

On Tuesday morning I sat quietly through a two-hour rehearsal of the orchestra under the baton of Erich Kunzel. Mr. Kunzel is a young American (California) who has been with the Cincinnati Symphony for several years. His hair in some disarray, wearing brown slacks and a white turtle-neck shirt with the shirt-tail out, he lumbered to the podium with his own scores under his arm; said good morning to the orchestra; picked up his baton; announced the order of rehearsal and began.

Conductor, Orchestra "Meet"

This was a rehearsal for a Nov. 26 concert in Boston and Mr. Kunzel's first time with the Boston Orchestra.

The orchestra is actually so good that it plays itself. Surely it is a greater thing, even with the tolerable background of Erich Kunzel (student of Monteux) for the conductor to be asked to guest conduct the Boston than it is for the orchestra to have any specific conductor — including Erich Kunzel—at the helm!

The result of the situation was a curious thing. Mostly, Kunzel let the orchestra know what he was not going to do ("We won't do it that way, it's too dangerous") — at which point everything fell into place and a musical miracle took place in Symphony Hall.

Erich Kunzel conducts the music he likes — which is, of course, the music he knows. (For a conductor to face the Boston Orchestra without complete and total familiarity with the scores would be the same as commiting professional suicide!) He has a sense of humor — or the good sense to appreciate the orchestra's humor — in a hyper-dramatic moment. Fists clenched, eyes closed, Kinzel stopped the orchestra and emoted to the viola section: "Violas, it is a triple piano." At which Burton Fine responded, "Sorry, Mr. Kunzel, our music says only two!"

Concertmaster Talented

Kunzel relied on Joseph Silverstein a great deal. Which is a wise thing to do, I suspect. Concertmaster Silverstein can sense the "thumbs up" or "thumbs down" feeling about the conductor in Boston Symphony protocol. Whether it should be this way or not, this is how it is. And the only time the orchestra makes a mistake is when the conductor makes a mistake — and then just sometimes!

Kunzel's showpieces for this week are: "Overture to Colas Breugnon" by Kabaleusky, which he spot rehearsed; "Lions" by Ned Rorem, which he went through in fine detail; the Khachaturian Piano Concerto (soloist Alicia DeLarracho was not at this rehearsal, so it was mostly reviewing the orchestral interludes); and the Elgar "Enigma" Variations, Opus 36, which Kunzel rehearsed the daylights out of the opening the the closing.

I felt that Erich Kunzel related most closely to the Rorem piece. "Lions" is a curious composition. It begins with soft strings—a guarantee of stereophonic sound exists in Symphony Hall (it is a musician's dream fulfilled). The quiet strings are interrupted by a super-imposition of frightening dissonant brass. this melts into a jazzy trio — saxophone, trap drums and piano in a most sophisticated attitude and still backed with the nostalgic string sound. The two contrasting elements (soft jazz — screaming brass) continue, sometimes reaching a heated, dissonant wall of sound; then again the subduing the other.

Erich Kunzel knows and apparently admires the piece. He also knows the Elgar Variations, but here his directions had not so much to do with what he wanted as to do with any discrepancies between the conductor's score and the parts. I have no doubt that the Boston Orchestra can do anything. Kunzel becomes a kind of honorary member for two hours and checks to see that the printed page is the same for everyone! The finished product is really rather good.

Ozawa Conducts

As luck would — and did — have it (tickets are really pretty scarce for the subscription series), I got a ticket for Tuesday evening's concert.

The guest conductor was the young Manchurian genius Seiji Ozawa, now music director of the San Francisco Symphony. He is dynamic. The man must be seen on the podium to be believed. He breathes life into every single phrase. Dressed in tails and flared cuffs, he pleads the sound with his hands; walks, dances and bounces the music as he makes it happen; and then shyly gives full credit to the orchestra. I suspect the Boston Symphony could do for any conductor what they did for Ozawa. The point is they did it for Ozawa and at the finish stamped their feet, clapped their hands, and tapped their bows on the music racks as they, along with an audience in a burst of enthusiasm, called Seiji Ozawa again and again to the stage.

The concert opened with two compositions, both first Boston performances, by the Japanese conposer Toru Takemitsu. The first, called "The Dorion Horizon," is scored for 17 stringed instruments in special seating arrangement to follow for nine echoes and eight harmonic pitches to be separated as far as the stage will permit. Directions for performance also include details about beating the strings, bowing over the fingerboard and behind the bridge for indeterminate pitch. The work is based on the Dorian mode and is cast in three short sections.

Mythological Number

The second is called "Cassiopeia" and has a program in mythology. It features a performer on any number of Japanese percussion instruments, all arranged in a cage to the conductor's right. The soloist, John Wyre, principal timpanist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, made his entrance to the stage and cage from the center isle, playing a wood-block and dressed in a costume not unlike the judo aspirants. At one point Mr. Wyre directed the orchestra for a few bars. The mysterious East!

Post-intermission numbers included the Haydn Symphony No. 96 ("Miracle") and Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin."

The program notes said that the story about a falling chandelier was legend only. (Haydn remembered nothing of the incident.) So that still leaves a question about the nickname "Miracle." Be that as it may, the symphony as played by the Boston group with Seiji Ozawa is a miracle of sound. There is (or can be) more drama in the music of Haydn than I knew existed. The third movement (Menuetto) was perfect definition of the dance form. Even in its simplicity it is a bold linear statement. At times Ozawa controlled it with his eyes rather than his hands. (The Boston Symphony can indeed do anything.)

The Bartok was one of the most exciting musical performances in my memory. Ozawa crowned himself king of the evening — but again deferred to the orchestra — shaking the hand of every performer within his reach.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

DEC 2 1971 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

Guest conductor spirited

The third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series in Symphony Hall featured guest conductor Erich Kunzel, who is resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony. Kunzel, who directed works by Kabalesvky, Ned Rorem, Khatchaturian and Elgar, is a tall, slim man of 36 who wields his baton athletically. He was a protege of the late and great Pierre Monteux.

Kabalevsky's "Overture to 'Colas Breugnon,'" which opened the program, is light, gay, unusually lively music befitting the title character of the opera it introduces — a hero bursting with life and with a natural bent for wine, women and fun. There is nothing particularly substantial about it — but it makes for pleasurable, easily-assimilated listening, and maestro Kunzel and the orchestra were able to convey well its contagious high spirits.

Ned Rorem's "Lions" is an interesting, sometimes noisy piece, with a dreamy, lyric beginning that soon develops into a jazz motif featuring alto saxophone and piano and the shifts to a vociferous but surprisingly tuneful ending that utilizes such percussive factors as castanets, wood blocks, tam-tam, chimes, bongos and tambourine. It is obviously the work of a playful musical mind.

The highlight of the program, of course, was the appearance of the distinguished Spanish pianist Alicia De Elarrocha, as soloist in Khatchaturian's "Piano Concerto," a colorful, but not especially well-integrated work, with the folk rhythms and Oriental flavor characteristic of the composer. Miss De Larrocha is one of the ablest and most sensitive keyboard technicians of our time, and, for so petite a woman, she can play with considerable power. Although I can think off hand of a score of other selections that I would have preferred to hear her perform, her rendition was commendable.

What is bothersome about this concerto is that it suffers, to use a phrase from "Alice in Wonderland," from "too much of a muchness." Its constantly repeated folk harmonies and rhythms become somewhat tedious. But Miss De Larrocha can manage its crashing chords, demanding runs and trills, and intricate changes of pace and mood with the aplomb of the perfectionist.

The program concluded with Elgar's perennially popular "Enigma Variations," with their 14 musical portraits of some of Elgar's friends and of the composer himself. Kunzel and the orchestra were especially effective in the lush melody of the 5th variation, in the beautifully elegiac 9th, and in the final variation, which seems to be a portrayal of the artist himself, his aims, his aspirations, rising to a wealth of resonance and sonority. It was, on the whole, a perceptively led and admirably executed performance of a rewarding and always welcome work.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the fourth program of the series on January 18, with pianist Misha Dichter as guest soloist.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

NOV 29 1971 New England Newsclip

DeLarrocha, Kunzel, BSO

By Louis Snyder

Boston Symphony's holiday concerts, which began Thanksgiving night, presented the Spanish pianist Alicia De Larrocha in her debut with the orchestra, and as conductor, Erich Kunzel, who previously had appeared at Symphony Hall only with Boston Pops. There was also a first Boston performance of Ned Rorem's "Lions (A Dream)," with Kabalevsky's "Colas Breugnon" Overture and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations as the program's other orchestral items.

Miss De Larrocha, who has of course been heard to great effect in solo recitals around about Boston, is a superb artist, long overdue in her collaboration with the BSO. Therefore it is regrettable that, at this first opportunity, it should have been the musically threadbare Khatchaturian Piano Concerto which was chosen as her vehicle.

Display piece

Despite its demands for virtuoso display and intricate fingering, met with dazzling ease by the soloist, the work relies more on built-in exotic instrumental effects than on substantial musical ideas for exchange between pianist and orchestra. Treated with an agile heavy hand, the concerto has been known to make its impression through sheer percussive weight, but Miss De Larrocha is fortunately no thunderer, and perhaps for this reason it was revealed in all its elaborate scrawniness. On Friday afternoon, justifiably, the audience took Miss De Larrocha to its heart with loud applause and numerous recalls for her heroic services in its behalf.

After an energetic performance of Kabalevsky's zesty overture, Mr. Kunzel and the orchestra launched into the Rorem "Lions." The composer, in a program note, declares that "it is not my belief that music means anything in a literal way . . . I nevertheless don't practice what I preach." Thus "Lions" is a well remembered childhood dream, punctuated with blues-disc fragments (there's a combo of three upstage right within the orchestra).

Dream music

Like all dreams told in retrospect by the dreamer, Mr. Rorem's is fanciful, mysterious, alternately boring and amusing, and excessively long for the captive listener. Musically it is appropriately footloose and subject to sudden shifts in rhythm and color (Does a dream come in colors? Mr. Rorem's printed description contains "furry-gold" lion cubs and their King-father's sunburst halo of "yellow light" . . .) Little matter. It goes on, quite specifically if you like, and one is quite ready when the topic of conversation changes.

Elgar's very different form of recall — about 13 of his friends and about himself—make the "Enigma" Variations a treasurable glimpse at British mores and the composer's keen perception of his own place in them. The variations, again "literal," are wonderfully wrought. Mr. Kunzel and the BSO had their closest meeting of the minds in this lush performance.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

NOV 24 1971 New England Newsclip

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

NOV 24 1971 New England

Kunzel to conduct Boston symphony

BOSTON — Erich Kunzel, resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third concert of the Thursday "A" series 8:30 p.m. Thursday evening, Nov. 25.

Also he will debut at the eighth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Orchestra Friday afternoon, Nov. 26 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Nov. 27 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is pianist Alicia De Larrocha who also makes her debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts. The program opens with Kabalevsky's Overture to Colas Breugnon, followed by the first Boston performance of Ned Rorem's Lions. Khachaturian's Piano concerto is next with soloist Alicia De Larrocha. The concert concludes with Elgar's Enigma variations.

Erich Kunzel in recent years has conducted at the Cincinnati Summer Opera Festival and at the Long Island Festival. In 1968 he directed the premiere of Borodin's Prince Igor in an English translation. Now in his sixth year with the Cincinnati Symphony, he took part in the Orchestra's world tour in 1966, conducting concerts in Kuala Lampur, Singapore, Manila, Okinawa, Taipei, Japan, Korea and Hong Kong. After directing the premiere of Brubeck's "The light in the wilderness." which he also recorded, he conducted the Cincinnati Symphony in Europe. Kunzel has appeared on several occasions as guest conductor with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Alicia De Larrocha, a native of Barcelona, showed her talent as a very young child, and made her first public appearance at the age of five. She made her debut in the United States in 1955 when she played with the Los Angeles Philharmonic. In the same year she was soloist with the San Francisco Symphony, and made her New York debut in a recital at Town Hall. In recent seasons she has appeared with the New York Philharmonic, and the Cleveland and Philadelphia Orchestras. She has received many honors and awards, among them the Paderewski Memorial medal, and a Grand Prix du Disque for her recording of Iberia by Albeniz.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

NOV 27 1971 New England Newsclip

Kunzel Conducts BSO in Elgar's 'Enigma Variations'

By WESLEY FULLER

There was one strong, meaningful work on the Boston Symphony's program last Thursday evening, and it was given an effective, personal, carefully thought out, well played performance. The work was Elgar's "Enigma Variations," and the guest conductor was Erich Kunzel, resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The Elgar comprised the last half of the concert, and after the empty, seemingly endless decibel barrage of the Khatchaturian Piano Concerto, which wasted the fine temperament and talent of pianist Alicia de Larrocha, after the weak posturing of Ned Rorem's "Lions", after the very pushed, occasionally ragged rendition of Kabalevsky's sometimes loud, sometimes tuneful, always harmonically and rhythmically dull Overture to "Colas Breugnon"—Elgar emerged very strong indeed.

UNSTRICTURED by the freedom of the variations process, Elgar unfolds a series of orchestral characterizations—knowing the people associated with the movements is helpful but not mandatory—ranging from grace and charm to parodied pomposity, from rippling wit to gentle satire, from quiet devotion to affirmative conviction. It was a tribute to Kunzel and Elgar that this reasonably lengthy work did what interesting music can so mysteriously do, stop clock-time.

But the temporal experience of the piece is no accident. Elgar carefully balances the rapid, short sections with the slightly longer ones, until that with Adagio begins, broadens and deepens the emotional and temporal dimensions. Kunzel and Elgar never let the players sit back. The "allegro di molto" and "presto" sections were that and then some. But when this Adagio was reached, all the rapid-fire moments which preceded made it all the more telling. It was adagio in this performance and deserved its literary allusion to slow movements in Beethoven.

AS ANTICIPATED, there were some beautiful solo moments: Jules Eskin in the cello passages of the twelfth variation, Burton Fine warm, controlled viola work in the sixth, but the whole evening was indelibly enriched when Harold Wright played the clarinet solo in number thirteen. Borrowed by Elgar from Mendelssohn (very successfully), Wright played this calm, stretched out melody with a beauty of tone, precision of pitch and dynamic subtlety that would make a Mevlevi Sufi give up his mystic flute in favor of the clarinet.

Kunzel's approach to the Elgar was passionate and broadly scaled, more so than is always the case. But this music, though clearly from the land of Dickens, has many honest affinities with elements of Wagner (especially old Nuremburg) and other romantics, and for this listener it was highly successful. It was a pleasure to see a conductor, from memory, concentrate mainly on phrasing, although at a point such as the second variation, some of the smaller note values might have lined up a bit neater with a few more beats of the baton.

ALL OF WHICH leaves little time for the first half of the program. Just two things: Alicia de Larrocha is a fine pianist whose recent recordings are a joy. She even made Khatchaturian sound poetic several times. But why oh why couldn't she have made her debut with the symphony in a better work? This Concerto is a world of tonal materials which are exploited in dreary, cute dissonances, simplistic syncopations and reams of parallelisms.

Finally, Ned Rorem's program notes have a certain, if arty, interest. His programmatic music has little. He is playing in the area of justaposed, allusion-filled musical memories. He hasn't the textural imagination for it. Bach, Berg and Bartok bring it off. Rorem doesn't.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

NOV 27 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Yesterday

Kunzel Conducts 'Enigma' In Boston Symphony Debut

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Erich Kunzel, once active in Brown University's music department and as assistant conductor of the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, made his debut Thursday evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program repeated yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. He now holds the title of resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Although Kunzel had led concerts earlier with the Boston Pops, this was his first appearance with the parent group. On the program, too, was that stunning little Spanish bundle of articulate energy, pianist Alicia De Larrocha, to perform the Khatchaturian concerto. Other works heard were the overture to Kabalevsky's "Colas Breugnon," Ned Rorem's "Lions (a dream)" and the Elgar "Enigma' Variations.

This was a rather conservative choice of programming. But it did serve to show off Kunzel's capacities with color orchestration extremely to his advantage. His years at Cincinnati have produced the expected increase in authority and podium ease. Whether his style had meticulous tempo indications or was more expansive, he captured the Bostonians' full cooperation.

And that was so apparent in the Elgar. Here Kunzel delivered the real goods. It is a noble work from a time when life and empire were secure. As if to complement the piece's epoch the conductor wore a frock coat to add to a total result which entirely deserved that most Edwardian of adjectives, splendid.

Kunzel's separation of orchestral detail while holding the piece unified, his feeling for its breadth as well as its grace, was conducting of a most controlled nature. The strings, especially violas, simply sang and there was vitality to burn. In a phrase, this was exceptionally memorable playing.

Conductor and pianist did what they could to make the Khatchaturian work. Miss De Larrocha's steely octave runs had brilliant force. And she caressed phrases beautifully.

The question is whether the concerto deserved her attentive care and respect. Any flagging interest was due to the score which seemed an overlong "Nights in the Gardens of Armenia."

Ned Rorem's piece, a companion score to his "Eagles" and "Whales," is based on a memory of one of his own youthful poems. "Lions" might make good movie background music. It has enough Ives inspiration, in counter tunes and rhythms, and dissonance to be useful in training pops audiences to the avant-garde.

Kunzel treated the work for all its rhapsodic values and a few crashing statements. A blues section for "combo" had gorgeous expression from Felix Visculgia's alto sax.

If the music, along with Kabalevsky's brazen showpiece and the Khatchaturian, did not produce impressions beyond the soundly handled performance, there was the Elgar. And that certainly was elegant from every point of view.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

NOV 27 1971 New England Newsclip

Kunzel conducts Boston Symphony

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

Yesterday afternoon's BSO concert was conducted by Erich Kunzel, resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, and the program he chose was generally pops-like.

Kabalevsky's Overture to Colas Breugnon opened the show and was dry, but it was the most cohesively written of the pieces on the first half. The other two were the Khatchaturian Piano Concerto and a piece by Ned Rorem called "Lions (a dream)." The Concerto is full of syncopation, mild dissonance, and lots of scales, and soloist Alicia de Larrocha was able to cope with these things. What seemed beyond her was making rubato passages sound like anything more than arbitrarily distorted rhythm.

Rorem's "Lions" is built unsuccessfully around that idea Ives used successfully of things overlapping in one's conscious (or unconscious—since this is a dream) and has other Ivesian things like a little combo on the side which occasionally plays saxophone tunes over, under, around and through whatever else is happening, and strings often sustaining high notes quietly over all the turmoil. Its main problem is that it keeps building up to climaxes and then starting over again, with not much in it to keep all that from getting downright tiresome. There was, though, one enormous crescendo that, when everyone else stopped abruptly and there should have been silence, instead left us suspended somewhere up in the ice and snow — hanging there by our upper strings. This worked well, felt good; I liked that.

The Enigma Variations of Elgar was the only really serious piece on the program (on any other it would have been comic relief), and its performance was difficult to come to terms with. There were few beautiful moments, so few as to make them startling when they happened. Much of what was bad was due to Kunzel's "beaty" manner of conducting, which resulted in amazingly short phrases, many times one or two notes — a situation where anything lyric was out of the question. He is also apparently a hard man for an orchestra to follow, as rhythmic imprecision (most painfully obvious at the start of the second variation) abounded. Tempi often felt wrong because of draggy and overdrawn handling, and sometimes sank under the weight of the lower strings and brass. There were also frequent problems in balance, resulting in occasional dark and sludge-like textures.

Perhaps Kunzel's most serious mistake (besides his choice of pieces) was the quality and articulation of sound he allowed (requested?) particularly in the brasses—unrefined and unlovely playing that is nowhere called for in this music.

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445

DEC 3 1971 Enquirer

CSO resident conductor Erich Kunzel collected accolades during his recent guest-conducting visit to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Elgar (Enigma Variations) was given an effective, personal, carefully thought-out performance. It was a tribute to Kunzel and Elgar that this reasonably lengthy work did what interesting music can so mysteriously do, stop clock-time," said the Boston Herald Traveler. "Mr. Kunzel and the BSO had their closest meeting of minds in this lush performance," said the Christian Science Monitor, and the Record American praised the zest and dramatic color of the performance.

Symphony Review

Record American
Nov. 27, 1971

Kunzel Conducts Lively Works

By ANN M. BEIERFIELD

A program of lively works, drawn mainly from the rich 20th century repertoire, was performed with zest and dramatic color by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, under the baton of guest conductor Erich Kunzel.

This maestro, resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is a tall and robust athletic type, whose authority and precision and fire on the podium are rivaled only by his considerable good looks.

His vigorous musical style did ample justice to this adventurous program, which opened with Kabalevsky's overture to "Colas Breugnon," a piece as spirited and frisky as a colt.

Composed to precede an opera about a lusty hero who adores food, wine, women and life in general, it fairly bursts with vitality, capturing the soul of the protagonist with festive gusto.

It was followed by another highly imaginative piece, "Lions (A Dream)" by Ned Rorem. Opening in a mood of mystic reverie, with just enough dissonance, it swings into an intriguing lazy jazz motif for piano and alto saxophone, the latter instrument handled with superb artistry by Felix Viscuglia.

The entire work is set off by an interesting assortment of percussive effects: castanets, wood blocks, bongos, tambourine and tam-tam among others. The total creation is a rapturous blend of modern cool jazz and jungle primitivism; an irresistible combination in this case.

The Khatchaturian Piano Concerto was somewhat disappointing.

The work contains some good strong folk harmonies and rhythms of the people of the trans-Caucasus, but as a whole it rambles and never quite gets its gears meshed.

Also the soloist, pianist Alicia De Larrocha, seemed strangely lacking in power and passion. She is undeniably a technical perfectionist; this was demonstrated in the second movement when she tossed off some difficult scales and runs with expert clarity.

But she was methodical when one longed for brilliance and dash, and most of all for strength, since the basically earthy quality of the piece calls for this in large quantities.

Edward Elgar's Variations on an original theme, "Enigma," was the high point. It consists of 14 brief variations, designed as musical cameo portraits of the composer's friends. These picturesque vignettes are as different and fascinating as human nature itself.

They are alternately romantic, saucy bold, majestic, brooding and delicate, and they close with a grand triumphant theme, complete with assertive brass and clashing cymbal; the life-cry of the artist himself.

The program will be repeated Saturday and Tuesday evenings.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,061
NOV 27 1971
New England Newsclip

Kunzel Conducts BSO in Elgar's 'Enigma Variations'

By WESLEY FULLER

There was one strong, meaningful work on the Boston Symphony's program last Thursday evening, and it was given an effective, personal, carefully thought out, well played performance. The work was Elgar's "Enigma Variations," and the guest conductor was Erich Kunzel, resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The Elgar comprised the last half of the concert, and after the empty, seemingly endless decibel barrage of the Khatchaturian Piano Concerto, which wasted the fine temperament and talent of pianist Alicia de Larrocha, after the weak posturing of Ned Rorem's "Lions", after the very pushed, occasionally ragged rendition of Kabalevsky's sometimes loud, sometimes tuneful, always harmonically and rhythmically dull Overture to "Colas Breugnon"—Elgar emerged very strong indeed.

UNSTRICTURED by the freedom of the variations process, Elgar unfolds a series of orchestral characterizations—knowing the people associated with the movements is helpful but not mandatory—ranging from grace and charm to parodied pomposity, from rippling wit to gentle satire, from quiet devotion to affirmative conviction. It was a tribute to Kunzel and Elgar that this reasonably lengthy work did what interesting music can so mysteriously do, stop clock-time.

But the temporal experience of the piece is no accident. Elgar carefully balances the rapid, short sections with the slightly longer ones, until that with Adagio begins, broadens and deepens the emotional and temporal dimensions. Kunzel and Elgar never let the players sit back. The "allegro di molto" and "presto" sections were that and then some. But when this Adagio was reached, all the rapid-fire moments which preceded made it all the more telling. It was adagio in this performance and deserved its literary allusion to slow movements in Beethoven.

AS ANTICIPATED, there were some beautiful solo moments: Jules Eskin in the cello passages of the twelfth variation, Burton Fine; warm, controlled viola work in the sixth, but the whole evening was indelibly enriched when Harold Wright played the clarinet solo in number thirteen, Borrowed by Elgar from Mendelssohn (very successfully), Wright played this calm, stretched out melody with a beauty of tone, precision of pitch and dynamic subtlety that would make a Mevlevi Sufi give up his mystic flute in favor of the clarinet.

Kunzel's approach to the Elgar was passionate and broadly scaled, more so than is always the case. But this music, though clearly from the land of Dickens, has many honest affinities with elements of Wagner (especially old Nuremburg) and other romantics, and for this listener it was highly successful. It was a pleasure to see a conductor, from memory, concentrate mainly on phrasing, although at a point such as the second variation, some of the smaller note values might have lined up a bit neater with a few more beats of the baton.

ALL OF WHICH leaves little time for the first half of the program. Just two things: Alicia de Larrocha is a fine pianist whose recent recordings are a joy. She even made Khatchaturian sound poetic several times. But why oh why couldn't she have made her debut with the symphony in a better work? This Concerto is a world of tonal materials which are exploited in dreary, cute dissonances, simplistic syncopations and reams of parallelisms.

Finally, Ned Rorem's program notes have a certain, if arty, interest. His programmatic music has little. He is playing in the area of justaposed, allusion-filled musical memories. He hasn't the textural imagination for it. Bach, Berg and Bartok bring it off. Rorem doesn't.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
NOV 27 1971
New England Newsclip

Music Yesterday

Kunzel Conducts 'Enigma' In Boston Symphony Debut

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Erich Kunzel, once active in Brown University's music department and as assistant conductor of the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, made his debut Thursday evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program repeated yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. He now holds the title of resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Although Kunzel had led concerts earlier with the Boston Pops, this was his first appearance with the parent group. On the program, too, was that stunning little Spanish bundle of articulate energy, pianist Alicia De Larrocha, to perform the Khatchaturian concerto. Other works heard were the overture to Kabalevsky's "Colas Breugnon," Ned Rorem's "Lions (a dream)" and the Elgar "Enigma' Variations.

This was a rather conservative choice of programming. But it did serve to show off Kunzel's capacities with color orchestration extremely to his advantage. His years at Cincinnati have produced the expected increase in authority and podium ease. Whether his style had meticulous tempo indications or was more expansive, he captured the Bostonians' full cooperation.

And that was so apparent in the Elgar. Here Kunzel delivered the real goods. It is a noble work from a time when life and empire were secure. As if to complement the piece's epoch the conductor wore a frock coat to add to a total result which entirely deserved that most Edwardian of adjectives, splendid.

Kunzel's separation of orchestral detail while holding the piece unified, his feeling for its breadth as well as its grace, was conducting of a most controlled nature. The strings, especially violas, simply sang and there was vitality to burn. In a phrase, this was exceptionally memorable playing.

Conductor and pianist did what they could to make the Khatchaturian work. Miss De Larrocha's steely octave runs had brilliant force. And she caressed phrases beautifully.

The question is whether the concerto deserved her attentive care and respect. Any flagging interest was due to the score which seemed an overlong "Nights in the Gardens of Armenia."

Ned Rorem's piece, a companion score to his "Eagles" and "Whales," is based on a memory of one of his own youthful poems. "Lions" might make good movie background music. It has enough Ives inspiration, in counter tunes and rhythms, and dissonance to be useful in training pops audiences to the avant-garde.

Kunzel treated the work for all its rhapsodic values and a few crashing statements. A blues section for "combo" had gorgeous expression from Felix Viscuglia's alto sax.

If the music, along with Kabalevsky's brazen showpiece and the Khatchaturian, did not produce impressions beyond the soundly handled performance, there was the Elgar. And that certainly was elegant from every point of view.

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445
DEC 3 1971
Enquirer

CSO resident conductor Erich Kunzel collected accolades during his recent guest-conducting visit to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Elgar (Enigma Variations) was given an effective, personal, carefully thought-out performance. It was a tribute to Kunzel and Elgar that this reasonably lengthy work did what interesting music can so mysteriously do, stop clock-time," said the Boston Herald Traveler. "Mr. Kunzel and the BSO had their closest meeting of minds in this lush performance," said the Christian Science Monitor, and the Record American praised the zest and dramatic color of the performance.

Record American
Nov. 27, 1971

Symphony Review

Kunzel Conducts Lively Works

By ANN M. BEIERFIELD

A program of lively works, drawn mainly from the rich 20th century repertoire, was performed with zest and dramatic color by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, under the baton of guest conductor Erich Kunzel.

This maestro, resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is a tall and robust athletic type, whose authority and precision and fire on the podium are rivaled only by his considerable good looks.

His vigorous musical style did ample justice to this adventurous program, which opened with Kabalevsky's overture to "Colas Breugnon," a piece as spirited and frisky as a colt.

Composed to precede an opera about a lusty hero who adores food, wine, women and life in general, it fairly bursts with vitality, capturing the soul of the protagonist with festive gusto.

It was followed by another highly imaginative piece, "Lions (A Dream)" by Ned Rorem. Opening in a mood of mystic reverie, with just enough dissonance, it swings into an intriguing lazy jazz motif for piano and alto saxophone, the latter instrument handled with superb artistry by Felix Viscuglia.

The entire work is set off by an interesting assortment of percussive effects: castanets, wood blocks, bongos, tambourine and tam-tam among others. The total creation is a rapturous blend of modern, cool jazz and jungle primitivism; an irresistible combination in this case.

The Khatchaturian Piano Concerto was somewhat disappointing.

The work contains some good strong folk harmonies and rhythms of the people of the trans-Caucasus, but as a whole it rambles and never quite gets its gears meshed.

Also the soloist, pianist Alicia De Larrocha, seemed strangely lacking in power and passion. She is undeniably a technical perfectionist; this was demonstrated in the second movement when she tossed off some difficult scales and runs with expert clarity.

But she was unmusical when one longed for brilliance and dash, and most of all for strength, since the basically earthy quality of the piece calls for this in large quantities.

Edward Elgar's Variations on an original theme, "Enigma," was the high point. It consists of 14 brief variations, designed as musical cameo portraits of the composer's friends. These picturesque vignettes are as different and fascinating as human nature itself.

They are alternately romantic, saucy bold, majestic, brooding and delicate, and they close with a grand triumphant theme, complete with assertive brass and clashing cymbal; the life-cry of the artist himself.

The program will be repeated Saturday and Tuesday evenings.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 560,377
NOV 27 1971
New England Newsclip

Kunzel conducts Boston Symphony

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

Yesterday afternoon's BSO concert was conducted by Erich Kunzel, resident conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, and the program he chose was generally pops-like.

Kabalevsky's Overture to Colas Breugnon opened the show and was dry, but it was the most cohesively written of the pieces on the first half. The other two were the Khatchaturian Piano Concerto and a piece by Ned Rorem called "Lions (a dream)." The Concerto is full of syncopation, mild dissonance, and lots of scales, and soloist Alicia de Larrocha was able to cope with these things. What seemed beyond her was making rubato passages sound like anything more than arbitrarily distorted rhythm.

Rorem's "Lions" is built unsuccessfully around that idea Ives used successfully of things overlapping in one's conscious (or unconscious, since this is a dream) and has other Ivesian things like a little combo on the side which occasionally plays saxophone tunes over, under, around and through whatever else is happening, and strings often sustaining high notes quietly over all the turmoil. Its main problem is that it keeps building up to climaxes and then starting over again, with not much in it to keep all that from getting downright tiresome. There was, though, one enormous crescendo that, when everyone else stopped abruptly and there should have been silence, instead left us suspended somewhere up in the ice and snow — hanging there by our upper strings. This worked well, felt good; I liked that.

The Enigma Variations of Elgar was the only really serious piece on the program (on any other it would have been comic relief), and its performance was difficult to come to terms with. There were few beautiful moments, so few as to make them startling when they happened. Much of what was bad was due to Kunzel's "beaty" manner of conducting, which resulted in amazingly short phrases, many times one or two notes — a situation where anything lyric was out of the question. He is also apparently a hard man for an orchestra to follow, as rhythmic imprecision (most painfully obvious at the start of the second variation) abounded. Tempi often felt wrong because of draggy and overdrawn handling, and sometimes sank under the weight of the lower strings and brass. There were also frequent problems in balance, resulting in occasional dark and sludge-like textures.

Perhaps Kunzel's most serious mistake (besides his choice of pieces) was the quality and articulation of sound he allowed (requested?) particularly in the brasses—unrefined and unlovely playing that is nowhere called for in this music.

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
D. 8,500

NOV 27 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony sets appearance

STORRS — A former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will rejoin the ensemble as guest conductor here Nov. 29, when it performs at the University of Connecticut's Jorgensen Auditorium.

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium for the 8 15 p.m. concert of works by Schumann and Prokofiev.

The Orchestra will open the program with "Symphony No. 2 in C" Opus 61 by Schumann.

After intermission, it will return to play "Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet'" Opus 64 by Prokofiev.

Maestro Leinsdorf became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962. Under his leadership, the BSO widened its repertoire, giving world and American premieres of many new works

He also led the orchestra in recordings of all the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies. It also began a major recorded cycle of Prokofiev, as well.

During Leinsdorf's tenure, the Orchestra increased its television appearances and a full-tuition fellowship program at the Berkshire Music Festival was initiated.

He retired as music director in 1969, succeeded by William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Ticket information may be obtained from the Box Office at 429-3311, Ext. 1807.

STAFFORD PRESS
STAFFORD SPRINGS, CONN.
W. 2,000

NOV 24 1971 New England Newsclip

Dates to remember

Nov. 24 (Opera): "Tristan und Isolde" by Wagner (Ingrid Bjoner as Isolde); Bushnell Box Office, 166 Capitol Ave., Hartford.

Thurs. Nov. 25 - (Concert) - Carpenters 8:30 p.m.; Tickets $4.50-6.50; Order from Bushnell Memorial Hall, Box O, Station A., Hartford, Conn. 06106.

Nov. 26 & 27, Fri. & Sat. - (Barbershop Concert) Twenty-sixth Grand Annual Festival of Harmony, presented by Hartford Chpater, SPEBSQSA; Bushnell Memorial Hall, 8:00 p.m.; Tickets $2.00-3.75; Send mail orders to Festival of Harmony, PO Box 4, Hartford, Conn. 06106.

Sun., Nov. 28 - (Concert) Budapest Symphony Orchestra - 8:15 p.m. - Tickets $3.25-7.50; order from Bushnell Memorial Hall, PO Box O, Station A, Hartford, Conn. 06106.

Mon., Nov. 29 (Music): The Boston Symphony Orchestra; Jorgensen Auditorium, University of Conn. 8:15 P.M. Tickets $2.25-3.75. For information call 429-3311, ext. 1807.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 199,160

NOV 28 1971 New England Newsc

Erich Leinsdorf To Conduct for UConn Concert

STORRS — A former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will rejoin the ensemble as guest conductor here Monday at 8:15 p.m., when it performs at the University of Connecticut's Jorgensen Auditorium.

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium for the concert of works by Schumann and Prokofiev. On the program will be "Symphony No. 2 in C' Opus 61 by Schumann and "Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet'" Opus 64 by Prokofiev.

Maestro Leinsdorf became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962. Under his leadership, the BSO widened its repertoire, giving world and American premieres of many new works.

He also led the orchestra in recordings of all the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies. It also began a major recorded cycle of Prokofiev, as well.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 26,679

NOV 25 1971 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf To Perform At Storrs

STORRS — A former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will rejoin the ensemble as guest conductor here Monday when it performs at the University of Connecticut's Jorgensen Auditorium.

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium for the 8:15 p.m. concert of works by Schumann and Prokofiev.

The Orchestra will open the program with "Symphony No. 2 in C" Opus 61 by Schumann.

After intermission, it will return to play "Scenes from 'Rome and Juliet'" Opus 64 by Prokofiev.

Maestro Leinsdorf became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962. Under his leadership, the BSO widened its repertoire, giving world and American premieres of many new works.

He also led the orchestra in recordings of all the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies. It also began a major recorded cycle of Prokofiev, as well.

During Leinsdorf's tenure, the Orchestra increased its television appearances and a full-tuition fellowship program at the Berkshire Music Festival was initiated.

He retired as music director in 1969, succeeded by William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

DEC 1 1971 Buffalo

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Carmen," with Viorica Cortez, Adriana Maliponte, James King, Mario Sereni; Gabor Otvos, conductor; 8.

New York City Ballet: "Episodes," "Allegro Brillante," "The Cage," "Symphony in C"; N. Y. State Theater, 8.

Bejart Ballet of the 20th Century: "Bhakti," "Symphonie pour un Homme Seul," "Firebird"; City Center Theater, 2 and 8.

KING LEINSDORF

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Schumann's No. 2 in C," Prokofiev's Music from "Romeo and Juliet"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

DEC 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Leads a Concert Of Schumann and Prokofiev

By RAYMOND ERICSON

Erich Leinsdorf is largely occupied these days conducting "Tristan und Isolde" at the Metropolitan Opera. Perhaps that is why the program in which he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night was relatively brief and unchallenging. It included Schumann's Symphony No. 2 and excerpts from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet music.

The latter has its eloquent moments, particularly at the end, and its craftsmanship is worthy of attention at any time. But, like some superior ballet scores, much of it loses its potency in the concert hall and seems trivial. It is gratifying, of course, to hear it played with the expertise the Boston Symphony can supply and a ballet orchestra seldom has. And Mr. Leinsdorf's reading, with tempos and nuances that might not always suit a danced performance, gave the music unusual color.

Schumann's Second Symphony, which seems to be played less often than the composer's other works in this form, has its choice passages. These include the beautiful introduction to the first movement and the deservedly popular adagio. Neither the scherzo nor the final movement, fine though they are, represents Schumann at his best.

The performance, too, was uneven. It started out with a superbly controlled spaciousness. Thereafter, it often seemed tight and matter-of-fact. And Mr. Leinsdorf's rubatos in the scherzo did not always find his players responding with unanimity.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

DEC 3 1971 Buffalo

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Rigoletto," with Roberta Peters, Loretta di Franco, Alfredo Kraus, Cornell MacNeil, Ezio Flagello; Michelangelo Veltri, conductor, 8.

New York City Ballet: "Divertimento No. 15" Hayden, Pilarre, Leland, Hendl, Ashley; "Episodes" Verdy, Blum, Morris, Ludlow, Yourth, Magallanes, Gov-

PETERS VILLELLA

rin, Moncion; "Afternoon of a Faun" McBride, Villella; "La Valse" Mazzo, Bonnefous, Moncion, Roberge, Weslow, Hicks, Bennett, Morris, Ohman; N. Y. State Theater, 8.

Bejart's Ballet of the 20th Century: "Renard," "Firebird," "Le Sacre du Printemps"; City Center Theater, 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Schumann's "Symphony No. 2," Excerpts from "Romeo and Juliet" by Prokofiev; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
D. 8,500

DEC 4 1971 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf leads the way

By The Chronicle's Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, as guest conductor presented the third program of this year's major concert series at the University of Connecticut Monday evening.

The program opened with the Symphony No. 2 in C. Major, Opus 61 (1846), by Schumann. First performed in Leipzig under the baton of Felix Mendelssohn, the symphony was to undergo extensive revision by Schumann before it reached its present form. In contrast to the first symphony, which was composed during one of the happiest periods of the composer's life, the second symphony reflects a more somber mood. Schumann had not been well and there are sections in the symphony which have been interpreted as a struggle within the composer of body and mind.

There is a unity in the texture of the symphony resulting from a conscious effort to intergrate the four movements by a thematic and structu al relationship. The opening movement begins with a solemn introduction that contains a motto theme of the entire work. The Scherzo is light-hearted and playful, but even here there is a more serious interlude in the center section. In the Adagio, Schumann, the dreamer, speaks beautifully and expressively, while in the finale he sets forth a strong, positive mood which culminates in a final triumphant musical statement.

The orchestra performed in a most competent fashion, and yet there were times when the music seemed overly episodic and compartmentalized in character. Each choir in the orchestra performed its task, and yet, curiously, the performance of the whole composition did not seem completely integrated.

The second half of the program consisted of Scenes from Romeo and Juliet, Opus 64, by Prokofiev. Although originally written for ballet, the composition was not immediatelv accepted for that medium and the composer arranged three suites based upon the music which he had originally written for performance as a ballet. Of these, the second suite appears to have been the most popular, but, as performed Monday evening, Leinsdorf included movements from the original score, some not appearing in the orchestral suites. Prokofiev sought to portray in music the personalities of each of the characters in this Shakesperian drama.

The drama calls for a series of episodes, contrasting sharply in musical character, which were clearly presented in the performance. Included was the third movement, Gavotte, from the composer's own Classical Symphony, written sometime earlier, and presented in a slightly altered form. Prokofiev's mastery of moods and orchestration was apparent throughout. The orchestra portrayed these moods in a very good fashion, and the end result of Leinsdorf's selection was a most interesting musical presentation.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

DEC 11 1971

THE symphony concerts last week were not very interesting, either. The Boston Symphony came to Philharmonic Hall with a program consisting of Schumann's Second Symphony and excerpts from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet," under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. Having nothing new to say about either of these works, I did not attend. Thursday night's New York Philharmonic concert, under Leonard Bernstein, in Philharmonic Hall, was more attractive, being made up partly of chestnuts of a slightly less familiar kind. It started out with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and ended with Shostakovich's First, the lean and hungry little item that he composed at the end of his conservatory days and that to me is the finest of all his symphonies. Between them, Itzhak Perlman appeared as soloist in the Berg Violin Concerto, a work in which the violin is merely one voice amid the numerous orchestral ones, and in which Perlman's greatest gift—that amazing rich tone—had no opportunity to manifest itself. Nevertheless, it was an absorbing experience to hear this concerto again. It is a twelve-tone work, with a few tonal passages, and Berg has used the system with a flavor of his own, making it express real feeling here and there. Mr. Bernstein conducted everything ably and without theatrics.

—WINTHROP SARGEANT

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
D. 8,500

NOV 27 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony sets appearance

STORRS — A former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will rejoin the ensemble as guest conductor here Nov. 29, when it performs at the University of Connecticut's Jorgensen Auditorium.

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium for the 8 15 p.m. concert of works by Schumann and Prokofiev.

The Orchestra will open the program with "Symphony No. 2 in C" Opus 61 by Schumann.

After intermission, it will return to play "Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet'" Opus 64 by Prokofiev.

Maestro Leinsdorf became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962. Under his leadership, the BSO widened its repertoire, giving world and American premieres of many new works

He also led the orchestra in recordings of all the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies. It also began a major recorded cycle of Prokofiev, as well.

During Leinsdorf's tenure, the Orchestra increased its television appearances and a full-tuition fellowship program at the Berkshire Music Festival was initiated.

He retired as music director in 1969, succeeded by William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Ticket information may be obtained from the Box Office at 429-3311, Ext. 1807.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 199,160

NOV 28 1971 New England Newsc

STAFFORD PRESS
STAFFORD SPRINGS, CONN.
W. 2,000

NOV 24 1971 New England Newsclip

Dates to remember

Nov. 24 (Opera): "Tristan und Isolde" by Wagner (Ingrid Bjoner as Isolde); Bushnell Box Office, 166 Capitol Ave., Hartford.

Thurs. Nov. 25 - (Concert) - Carpenters 8:30 p.m.; Tickets $4.50-6.50; Order from Bushnell Memorial Hall, Box O, Station A., Hartford, Conn. 06106.

Nov. 26 & 27, Fri. & Sat. - (Barbershop Concert) Twenty-sixth Grand Annual Festival of Harmony, presented by Hartford Chpater, SPEBSQSA; Bushnell Memorial Hall; 8:00 p.m.; Tickets $2.00-3.75; Send mail orders to Festival of Harmony, PO Box 4, Hartford, Conn. 06106.

Sun., Nov. 28 - (Concert) Budapest Symphony Orchestra - 8:15 p.m. - Tickets $3.25-7.50; order from Bushnell Memorial Hall, PO Box O, Station A, Hartford, Conn. 06106.

Mon., Nov. 29 (Music): The Boston Symphony Orchestra; Jorgensen Auditorium, University of Conn. 8:15 P.M. Tickets $2.25-3.75. For information call 429-3311, ext. 1807.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 26,679

NOV 25 1971 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf To Perform At Storrs

STORRS — A former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will rejoin the ensemble as guest conductor here Monday when it performs at the University of Connecticut's Jorgensen Auditorium.

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium for the 8:15 p.m. concert of works by Schumann and Prokofiev.

The Orchestra will open the program with "Symphony No. 2 in C" Opus 61 by Schumann.

After intermission, it will return to play "Scenes from 'Rome and Juliet'" Opus 64 by Prokofiev.

Maestro Leinsdorf became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962. Under his leadership, the BSO widened its repertoire, giving world and American premieres of many new works.

He also led the orchestra in recordings of all the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies. It also began a major recorded cycle of Prokofiev, as well.

During Leinsdorf's tenure, the Orchestra increased its television appearances and a full-tuition fellowship program at the Berkshire Music Festival was initiated.

He retired as music director in 1969, succeeded by William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Erich Leinsdorf To Conduct for UConn Concert

STORRS — A former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will rejoin the ensemble as guest conductor here Monday at 8:15 p.m., when it performs at the University of Connecticut's Jorgensen Auditorium.

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium for the concert of works by Schumann and Prokofiev. On the program will be "Symphony No. 2 in C' Opus 61 by Schumann and "Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet'" Opus 64 by Prokofiev.

Maestro Leinsdorf became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962. Under his leadership, the BSO widened its repertoire, giving world and American premieres of many new works.

He also led the orchestra in recordings of all the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies. It also began a major recorded cycle of Prokofiev, as well.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

DEC 1 1971 Buffalo

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Carmen," with Viorica Cortez, Adriana Maliponte, James King, Mario Sereni; Gabor Otvos, conductor; 8.

New York City Ballet: "Episodes," "Allegro Brillante," "The Cage," "Symphony in C"; N. Y. State Theater, 8.

Bejart Ballet of the 20th Century: "Bhakti," "Symphonie pour un Homme Seul," "Firebird"; City Center Theater, 2 and 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Schumann's No. 2 in C," Prokofiev's Music from "Romeo and Juliet"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

KING

LEINSDORF

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

DEC 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Leads a Concert Of Schumann and Prokofiev

By RAYMOND ERICSON

Erich Leinsdorf is largely occupied these days conducting "Tristan und Isolde" at the Metropolitan Opera. Perhaps that is why the program in which he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night was relatively brief and unchallenging. It included Schumann's Symphony No. 2 and excerpts from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet music.

The latter has its eloquent moments, particularly at the end, and its craftsmanship is worthy of attention at any time. But, like some superior ballet scores, much of it loses its potency in the concert hall and seems trivial. It is gratifying, of course, to hear it played with the expertise the Boston Symphony can supply and a ballet orchestra seldom has. And Mr. Leinsdorf's reading, with tempos and nuances that might not always suit a danced performance, gave the music unusual color.

Schumann's Second Symphony, which seems to be played less often than the composer's other works in this form, has its choice passages. These include the beautiful introduction to the first movement and the deservedly popular adagio. Neither the scherzo nor the final movement, fine though they are, represents Schumann at his best.

The performance, too, was uneven. It started out with a superbly controlled spaciousness. Thereafter, it often seemed tight and matter-of-fact. And Mr. Leinsdorf's rubatos in the scherzo did not always find his players responding with unanimity.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

DEC 3 1971 Buffalo

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Rigoletto," with Roberta Peters, Loretta di Franco, Alfredo Kraus, Cornell MacNeil, Ezio Flagello; Michelangelo Veltri, conductor, 8.

New York City Ballet: "Divertimento No. 15" Hayden, Pilarre, Leland, Hendl, Ashley; "Episodes" Verdy, Blum, Morris, Ludlow, Yourth, Magallanes, Govrin, Moncion; "Afternoon of a Faun" McBride, Villella; "La Valse" Mazzo, Bonnefous, Moncion, Roberge, Weslow, Hicks, Bennett, Morris, Ohman; N. Y. State Theater, 8.

Bejart's Ballet of the 20th Century: "Renard," "Firebird," "Le Sacre du Printemps"; City Center Theater, 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Schumann's "Symphony No. 2," Excerpts from "Romeo and Juliet" by Prokofiev; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

PETERS

VILLELLA

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
D. 8,500

DEC 4 1971 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf leads the way

By The Chronicle's Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, as guest conductor presented the third program of this year's major concert series at the University of Connecticut Monday evening.

The program opened with the Symphony No. 2 in C. Major, Opus 61 (1846), by Schumann. First performed in Leipzig under the baton of Felix Mendelssohn, the symphony was to undergo extensive revision by Schumann before it reached its present form. In contrast to the first symphony, which was composed during one of the happiest periods of the composer's life, the second symphony reflects a more somber mood. Schumann had not been well and there are sections in the symphony which have been interpreted as a struggle within the composer of body and mind.

There is a unity in the texture of the symphony resulting from a conscious effort to intergrate the four movements by a thematic and structu al relationship. The opening movement begins with a solemn introduction that contains a motto theme of the entire work. The Scherzo is light-hearted and playful, but even here there is a more serious interlude in the center section. In the Adagio, Schumann, the dreamer, speaks beautifully and expressively, while in the finale he sets forth a strong, positive mood which culminates in a final triumphant musical statement.

The orchestra performed in a most competent fashion, and yet there were times when the music seemed overly episodic and compartmentalized in character. Each choir in the orchestra performed its task, and yet, curiously, the performance of the whole composition did not seem completely integrated.

The second half of the program consisted of Scenes from Romeo and Juliet, Opus 64, by Prokofiev. Although originally written for ballet, the composition was not immediately accepted for that medium and the composer arranged three suites based upon the music which he had originally written for performance as a ballet. Of these, the second suite appears to have been the most popular, but, as performed Monday evening, Leinsdorf included movements from the original score, some not appearing in the orchestral suites. Prokofiev sought to portray in music the personalities of each of the characters in this Shakesperian drama.

The drama calls for a series of episodes, contrasting sharply in musical character, which were clearly presented in the performance. Included was the third movement, Gavotte, from the composer's own Classical Symphony, written sometime earlier, and presented in a slightly altered form. Prokofiev's mastery of moods and orchestration was apparent throughout. The orchestra portrayed these moods in a very good fashion, and the end result of Leinsdorf's selection was a most interesting musical presentation.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

DEC 11 1971

THE symphony concerts last week were not very interesting, either. The Boston Symphony came to Philharmonic Hall with a program consisting of Schumann's Second Symphony and excerpts from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet," under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. Having nothing new to say about either of these works, I did not attend. Thursday night's New York Philharmonic concert, under Leonard Bernstein, in Philharmonic Hall, was more attractive, being made up partly of chestnuts of a slightly less familiar kind. It started out with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and ended with Shostakovich's First, the lean and hungry little item that he composed at the end of his conservatory days and that to me is the finest of all his symphonies. Between them, Itzhak Perlman appeared as soloist in the Berg Violin Concerto, a work in which the violin is merely one voice amid the numerous orchestral ones, and in which Perlman's greatest gift—that amazing rich tone—had no opportunity to manifest itself. Nevertheless, it was an absorbing experience to hear this concerto again. It is a twelve-tone work, with a few tonal passages, and Berg has used the system with a flavor of his own, making it express real feeling here and there. Mr. Bernstein conducted everything ably and without theatrics.

—WINTHROP SARGEANT

LINDENHURST, N. Y.
SOUTH BAY'S OFFICIAL
SHOPPING NEWSPAPER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 29,500

DEC 1 1971

Boston Symphony Concerts

Erich Leinsdorf, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Max Rudolf, Conductor Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will conduct concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the Orchestra's second series of concerts in New York City during the week of November 29.

The second pair of Wednesday/Friday concerts by the Orchestra at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall takes place Wednesday evening, December 1, and Friday evening, December 3, 1971. Both concerts begin at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts Schumann's Symphony no. 2, and music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet."

The second of three concerts by the Orchestra at Brooklyn's Academy of Music takes place Thursday evening, December 2, at 8:30 p.m. Max Rudolf conducts Webern's "Passacaglia" op. 1, Rachmaninov'e Piano concerto no. 3 with soloist Horacio Gutierrez, and Schubert's Symphony no. 9, "The Great." This same program will be given Saturday night, December 4 at 8:40 p.m. at C.W. Post College, in Brookville.

LONG ISLAND
ENTERTAINER
CEDARHURST N. Y.
W. [illegible]

NOV 1 1 1971

County Concerts

On the heels of the highly successful opening concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, Nassau residents are urged to act fast to obtain tickets for the remaining concert programs sponsored by the County Office of Cultural Development and Island Concert Hall, Inc.

A limited number of tickets is available for the November 13 performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg. The program will include Holst's 'The Planets' and Bruckner's Symphony No.4, 'The Romantic'. Tickets also are available for the December 19 performance by Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

The December 4 concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra is completely sold out.

All concerts begin at 8:40PM in the C.W. Post College auditorium, Old Brookville. Reserved seat tickets are $2 and must be purchased in advance either in person or by mail from the Office of Cultural Development, Firehouse Lane, Mitchel Field, 11530.

FARMINGDALE, N. Y.
OBSERVER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 6,500

SEP 3 0 1971

Major Concerts At C.W. Post

County Executive, Ralph G. Caso announced today that the Office of Cultural Development will present four major concerts in the Fall of 1971. Co-sponsored by the Island Concert Hall, Inc., all performances will begin at 8:40 PM in the C.W. Post College Auditorium.

They list as follows:

October 15: AMERICAN SYMPHONY, Leopold Stokowski, Conductor; Jorge Bolet, Piano Soloist.

November 13: PITTSBURGH SYMPHONY, William Steinberg, Conductor.

December 4: BOSTON SYMPHONY, Max Rudolf, Conductor; Horacio Gutierrez, Piano Soloist.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 427,270

NOV 27 1971

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Conducted by William Steinberg, 8:40 PM next Saturday, C. W. Post Center auditorium, Northern Boulevard, Brookville. Sold out.

HICKSVILLE, N.Y.
MID-ISLAND HICKSVILLE
HERALD
W 5.600

NOV 4 1971

Opening Concert A Success

On the heels of the highly successful opening concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, Nassau County Executive Ralph G. Caso today urged residents to act fast to obtain tickets for the remaining concert programs sponsored by the County Office of Cultural Development and Island Concert Hall, Inc.

A limited number of tickets is available for the Nov. 13 performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg. The program will include Holst's The Planets and Bruckner's Symphony No. 4: The Romantic. Tickets also are available for the Dec. 19 performance by Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

The Dec. 4 concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra is completely sold out.

All concerts begin at 8:40 p.m. in the C.W. Post College Auditorium, Old Brookville. Reserved seat tickets are $2 and must be purchased in advance either in person or by mail from the Office of Cultural Development, Firehouse Lane, Mitchel Field, 11530.

LI COMMERCIAL REVIEW
SYOSSET, N. Y.
D. 8,500

NOV 2 4 1971

LI COMMERCIAL REVIEW
SYOSSET, N. Y.
D. 8,500

NOV 1 8 1971

LI COMMERCIAL REVIEW
SYOSSET, N. Y.
D. 8,500

NOV 1 1 1971

Major Upcoming Events IN THE NEXT 3 MONTHS

SUFFOLK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 473-1168. Violinist Henryk Szeryng Dec 2, 8:30 PM, Hauppauge HD Concert Hall.

SOUTH SHORE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 581-8349. Violinist Hiroko Yajima, Dec 4, 8:30 PM, Bay Shore HS.

LI YOUTH ORCHESTRA (883-2242) Eleanor Steber, Metropolitan opera soloist, Dec 5, 8 PM, Mineola HS.

ISLAND CONCERT HALL-ADELPHI UNIV SERIES, Roslyn Hts (MA 1-4444); all concerts at 8:40 PM; The World's Greates Jazz Band, Nov 27, Half Hollow Hills HS; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec 4 C W Post; Anthony Newman, pedal-harpsichordist, Dec 13, Garden City HS; Mstislav Rostropovich, cellist, Dec 19, C W Post.

GREAT NECK, N. Y.
NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5.000

NOV 3 1971

Fast Action Urged To Obtain Tickets Remaining Concerts

On the heels of the highly successful opening concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, Nassau County Executive Ralph G. Caso today urged residents to act fast to obtain tickets for the remaining concert programs sponsored by the County Office of Cultural Development and Island Concert Hall, Inc.

A limited number of tickets is available for the Nov. 13 performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg. The program will include Holst's The Planets and Bruckner's Symphony No. 4: The Romantic. Tickets also are available for the Dec. 19 performance by Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

The Dec. 4 concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra is completely sold out.

All concerts begin at 8:40 p.m. in the C. W. Post College Auditorium, Old Brookville.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

NOV 28 1971

STARR

Boston Symphony

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

First LI Appearance on Saturday

By MARJORIE STARR

Making its first appearance ever on Long Island, the Boston Symphony is coming to C. W. Post auditorium on Saturday evening in the eighth of the 29-event Island Concert Hall series.

Two major works, to be conducted by Max Rudolf, make up the program . . . the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, and Schubert's Symphony No. 9. Ninth in order of composition, but seventh in publication, the symphony is known as the Great, a much overused word, but it aptly describes the composer's most monumental creation.

The piano soloist is Horacio Gutierrez, a young winner of the Tchaikowsky Piano Competition. Concert Hall audiences will have another chance to hear him when he appears in a solo recital in May.

But don't rush to buy tickets for Saturday . . . the house is completely sold out.

BELLMORE, N.Y.
MERRICK HOME NEWS &
OBSERVER
W. 800

NOV 4 1971

PLAINVIEW, N. Y.
HERALD
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000

NOV 4 1971

MASSAPEQUA PARK, N. Y.
OBSERVER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5.500

SEAFORD, N.Y.
SOUTHEAST NASSAU
ENTERPRISE & OBSERVER
W. 0.00P

NOV 4 1971

FARMINGDALE, N. Y.
POST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000

NOV 4 1971

Big Interest in Symphony Concerts

On the heels of the highly successful opening concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, residents are advised to act fast to obtain tickets for the remaining concert programs sponsored by the County Office of Cultural Development and Island Concert Hall, Inc.

A limited number of tickets is available for the November 13 performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg. The program will include Holst's The Planets and Bruckner's Symphony No. 4: The Romantic. Tickets also are available for the December 19 performance by Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

The December 4 concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra is completely sold out.

LINDENHURST, N. Y.
SOUTH BAY'S OFFICIAL
SHOPPING NEWSPAPER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 29,500

DEC 1 1971

Boston Symphony Concerts

Erich Leinsdorf, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Max Rudolf, Conductor Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will conduct concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the Orchestra's second series of concerts in New York City during the week of November 29.

The second pair of Wednesday/Friday concerts by the Orchestra at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall takes place Wednesday evening, December 1, and Friday evening, December 3, 1971. Both concerts begin at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts Schumann's Symphony no. 2, and music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet."

The second of three concerts by the Orchestra at Brooklyn's Academy of Music takes place Thursday evening, December 2, at 8:30 p.m. Max Rudolf conducts Webern's "Passacaglia" op. 1, Rachmaninov'e Piano concerto no. 3 with soloist Horacio Gutierrez, and Schubert's Symphony no. 9, "The Great." This same program will be given Saturday night, December 4 at 8:40 p.m. at C.W. Post College, in Brookville.

LONG ISLAND
ENTERTAINER
CEDARHURST, N. Y.

NOV 1 1971

FARMINGDALE, N. Y.
OBSERVER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 6,500

SEP 30 1971

Major Concerts At C.W. Post

County Executive, Ralph G. Caso announced today that the Office of Cultural Development will present four major concerts in the Fall of 1971. Co-sponsored by the Island Concert Hall, Inc., all performances will begin at 8:40 PM in the C.W. Post College Auditorium.

They list as follows:

October 15: AMERICAN SYMPHONY, Leopold Stokowski, Conductor; Jorge Bolet, Piano Soloist.

November 13: PITTSBURGH SYMPHONY, William Steinberg, Conductor.

December 4: BOSTON SYMPHONY, Max Rudolf, Conductor; Horacio Gutierrez, Piano Soloist.

County Concerts

On the heels of the highly successful opening concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, Nassau residents are urged to act fast to obtain tickets for the remaining concert programs sponsored by the County Office of Cultural Development and Island Concert Hall, Inc.

A limited number of tickets is available for the November 13 performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg. The program will include Holst's 'The Planets' and Bruckner's Symphony No.4, 'The Romantic'. Tickets also are available for the December 19 performance by Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

The December 4 concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra is completely sold out.

All concerts begin at 8:40PM in the C.W. Post College auditorium, Old Brookville. Reserved seat tickets are $2 and must be purchased in advance either in person or by mail from the Office of Cultural Development, Firehouse Lane, Mitchel Field, 11530.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 427,270

NOV 27 1971

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Conducted by William Steinberg, 8:40 PM next Saturday, C. W. Post Center auditorium, Northern Boulevard, Brookville. Sold out.

HICKSVILLE, N.Y.
MID-ISLAND HICKSVILLE
HERALD
W 5,600

NOV 4 1971

Opening Concert A Success

On the heels of the highly successful opening concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, Nassau County Executive Ralph G. Caso today urged residents to act fast to obtain tickets for the remaining concert programs sponsored by the County Office of Cultural Development and Island Concert Hall, Inc.

A limited number of tickets is available for the Nov. 13 performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg. The program will include Holst's The Planets and Bruckner's Symphony No. 4: The Romantic. Tickets also are available for the Dec. 19 performance by Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

The Dec. 4 concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra is completely sold out.

All concerts begin at 8:40 p.m. in the C.W. Post College Auditorium, Old Brookville. Reserved seat tickets are $2 and must be purchased in advance either in person or by mail from the Office of Cultural Development, Firehouse Lane, Mitchel Field, 11530.

LI COMMERCIAL REVIEW
SYOSSET, N. Y.
D. 8,500

NOV 24 1971

LI COMMERCIAL REVIEW
SYOSSET, N. Y.
D. 8,500

NOV 18 1971

LI COMMERCIAL REVIEW
SYOSSET, N. Y.
D. 8,500

NOV 11 1971

Major Upcoming Events
IN THE NEXT 3 MONTHS

SUFFOLK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 473-1168. Violinist Henryk Szeryng Dec 2, 8:30 PM, Hauppauge HD Concert Hall.

SOUTH SHORE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 581-8349. Violinist Hiroko Yajima, Dec 4, 8:30 PM, Bay Shore HS.

LI YOUTH ORCHESTRA (883-2242) Eleanor Steber, Metropolitan opera soloist, Dec 5, 8 PM, Mineola HS.

ISLAND CONCERT HALL-ADELPHI UNIV SERIES, Roslyn Hts (MA 1-4444); all concerts at 8:40 PM; The World's Greates Jazz Band, Nov 27, Half Hollow Hills HS; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec 4 C W Post; Anthony Newman, pedal-harpsichordist, Dec 13, Garden City HS; Mstislav Rostropovich, cellist, Dec 19, C W Post.

GREAT NECK, N. Y.
NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000

NOV 3 1971

Fast Action Urged To Obtain Tickets Remaining Concerts

On the heels of the highly successful opening concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, Nassau County Executive Ralph G. Caso today urged residents to act fast to obtain tickets for the remaining concert programs sponsored by the County Office of Cultural Development and Island Concert Hall, Inc.

A limited number of tickets is available for the Nov. 13 performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg. The program will include Holst's The Planets and Bruckner's Symphony No. 4: The Romantic. Tickets also are available for the Dec. 19 performance by Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

The Dec. 4 concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra is completely sold out.

All concerts begin at 8:40 p.m. in the C. W. Post College Auditorium, Old Brookville.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

NOV 28 1971

STARR

Boston Symphony

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

First LI Appearance on Saturday

By MARJORIE STARR

Making its first appearance ever on Long Island, the Boston Symphony is coming to C. W. Post auditorium on Saturday evening in the eighth of the 29-event Island Concert Hall series.

Two major works, to be conducted by Max Rudolf, make up the program . . . the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, and Schubert's Symphony No. 9. Ninth in order of composition, but seventh in publication, the symphony is known as the Great, a much overused word, but it aptly describes the composer's most monumental creation.

The piano soloist is Horacio Gutierrez, a young winner of the Tchaikowsky Piano Competition. Concert Hall audiences will have another chance to hear him when he appears in a solo recital in May.

But don't rush to buy tickets for Saturday . . . the house is completely sold out.

MASSAPEQUA PARK, N. Y.
OBSERVER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,500

SEAFORD, N.Y.
SOUTHEAST NASSAU
ENTERPRISE & OBSERVER
W. 0,00P

NOV 4 1971

FARMINGDALE, N. Y.
POST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000

NOV 4 1971

BELLMORE, N.Y.
MERRICK HOME NEWS &
OBSERVER
W. 800

NOV 4 1971

PLAINVIEW, N. Y.
HERALD
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000

NOV 4 1971

Big Interest in Symphony Concerts

On the heels of the highly successful opening concert by the American Symphony Orchestra, residents are advised to act fast to obtain tickets for the remaining concert programs sponsored by the County Office of Cultural Development and Island Concert Hall, Inc.

A limited number of tickets is available for the November 13 performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg. The program will include Holst's The Planets and Bruckner's Symphony No. 4: The Romantic. Tickets also are available for the December 19 performance by Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

The December 4 concert featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra is completely sold out.

Long Island Press
• JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

DEC 6 1971

Music on LI

Those Acoustics Again!

By GABRIEL FONTRIER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's beautiful Island Concert Hall concert last Saturday night served again to illustrate that over 3,000 Long Islanders must make do with the gross cultrual inadequacies orphans of Manhattan must suffer with infinite patience. With Max Rudolf as the splendid conductor this magnificent orchestra made golden wonders of sound that were sadly mistreated by the C.W. Post Center Auditorium.

Horacio Gutierrez — remember that name — gave a stunning performance of Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto (D Minor, Opus 30). He not only has complete control of both the keyboard and the music but he is possessed of that fire and compelling stage presence that is the mark of the true virtuoso pianist. At 22 he was runner-up in the 1970 Tchaikowsky Competition in Moscow and his American debut with the Los Angeles Philharmonic launched a spectacularly successful career.

He flew through rapid passages with an agility that never permitted violence to the forward thrust and direction of phrases. His legatos in lyrical passages (never helped by a cold and unresponsive piano) nevertheless managed to sing out and shape the graceful curves of melody Rachmaninoff is so famous for. He can control what seems to be an infinite range of dynamics. And in all this Max Rudolf, a master conductor, gave his young pianist a marvel of an orchestral dialogue.

It is too bad that the plastic cumulus mammatus "clouds" only help to shatter forte passages for a percussion instrument like the piano. And orchestral balances between sections sometimes sound like ersatz stereo recordings played on a home fi-fi set with poor speakers. The silly pillars behind the stage diffuse sounds of instruments nearby in strange ways . . . lotsa Lot's wives on the open salt market spicing badly.

Webern's Opus 1, a Passaglia, opened the program — the work of a very talented young man and the rare opportunity to hear a muted tuba, but no major work and with little in it to presage the later Webern. The great delight of the evening was Schubert's "Great" Symphony in C Major that occupied the second part of the program. This is surely one of the greatest works of art — any art — that any human being has ever created and it was given a beautiful performance.

That Schubert in the last months of his life could produce both this symphony of "heavenly length" as Robert Schumann called it and that matchless C Major Quintet (for two cellos) gives us all cause to weep the more that this genius was given but 31 years on this earth. Not only is the symphony filled to the brim with the incredible melodic invention of a man who left us over 600 lieder, but his brilliant orchestration was to influence the entire 19th Century.

When an orchestra such as the Boston Symphony under the inspired baton of a Max Rudolf perform this masterpiece one simply sits back to learn again from Schubert, from Rudolf and from the artists who play with such perfection and sensitivity. For a beautiful concert and especially for the virtuoso performance of the last movement I thank them all.

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

DEC 9 1971

New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

DEC 9 1971

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

DEC 9 1971

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

DEC 9 1971

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

DEC 9 1971

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

DEC 9 1971

Concerts This Week

Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston to conduct the ninth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Dec. 10 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Dec. 11 at 8:30 p.m.

Mr. Steinberg opens the concert with the first performance in Boston of Robert Starer's Symphony no. 3 (1969), followed by the first performance by the Boston Symphony of Benjamin Lee's Concerto for string quartet and orchestra.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,900

DEC 10 1971

New England Newsclip

Near the Waterfront

A Potpourri of people, places and things . . .

By LILLIAN BONO

Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston to conduct the ninth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, this afternoon and tomorrow evening. Mr. Steinberg will open the concert with the first performance in Boston of Rober Starer's Symphony No. 3 followed by a Boston first of Benjamin Lee's Concerto for string quarter and orchestra. Soloists are the members of the Boston Symphony String Quartet, Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins; Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Brahms Fourth Symphony.

MERRIMACK VALLEY
ADVERTISER
TEWKSBURY, MASS
W. 24,000

DEC 8 1971

New England Newsclip

Steinberg Will Conduct The Boston Symphony

Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director William Stein berg returns to Boston to conduct the ninth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the orchestra, Friday afternoon, December 10, at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, December 11 at 8:30 p.m.

Steinberg opens the concert with the first performance in Boston of Robert Starer's Symphony no. 3(1969), followed by the first performance by the Boston Symphony of Benjamin Lee's concerto for string quartet and orchestra.

Soloists are the members of the Boston Symphony string quartet; Joseph Silverstein, and Max Hobart, violins; Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Brahm's fourth symphony.

Robert Starers' third symphony was completed in 1969, and its first performance was given by the Pittsburgh Symphony orchestra in October of 1970. William Steinberg was the donductor.

Robert Starer is one of the many musicians who left Germany or Austria in the period after the Nazis came into power. After early musical training at the State Academy of music, he left Vienna in 1938 and continued his studies at the Jerusalem conservatory of Music.

In 1947 he came to the United States on a post graduate scholarship at the Juilliard school of Music. He has received two Guggenheim Fellowships and a Fulbright post doctoral research grant.

Benjamin Lees was born in Harbin, Manchuria. He wrote the Concerto for string quartet and orchestra on a commission from the Sosland family of Kansas City, and completed the score at Great Neck N.Y. in 1964.

The first performance was given by the Kansas City Philharmonic in1965; soloists were the Paganini Quartet with Hans Schewiger conducting.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

DEC 9 1971

New England Newsclip

Steinburg back for two concerts

BOSTON — Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director William Steinberg returns to Boston to conduct the ninth pair of Friday - Saturday concerts by the orchestra, Friday afternoon, Dec. 10 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Dec. 11 at 8:30 p.m.

Steinberg opens the concert with the first performance in Boston of Robert Starer's Symphony no. 3 (1969), followed by the first performance of the Boston Symphony of Benjamin Lee's Concerto for string quartet and orchestra. Soloists are the members of the Boston Symphony String Quartet: Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins; Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello. After intermission, the concert concludes with Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

Robert Starer's Third symphony was completed in 1969, and its first performance was given by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra in October of 1970. Steinberg was the conductor. Starer is one of the many musicians who left Germany or Austria in the period after the Nazis came into power. After early musical training at the State Academy of Music, he left Vienna in 1938 and continued his studies at the Jerusalem Conservatory of Music. In 1947 he came to the United States on a post - graduate scholarship at the Juilliard School of Music. He has received two Guggenheim Fellowships and a Fulbright post - doctoral research grant.

Benjamin Lees was born in Harbin, Manchuria. He wrote the Concerto for string quartet and orchestra on a commission from the Sosland family of Kansas City, and completed the score at Great Neck, N. Y. in 1964. The first performance was given by the Kansas City Philharmonic in 1965; soloists were the Paganini Quartet with Hans Schewiger conducting.

Eric Leinsdorf, former Music Director of the Orchestra conducts the third concert of the Tuesday "Cambridge" series, Tuesday evening, December 7 at 8:30 p.m. The concert includes Schumann's Second Symphony, and music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet.

The third Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season takes place Thursday, Dec. 9, at 7:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts the Orchestra in music for the following weekend's concerts. All seats are unreserved at $3 each. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JUN 15 1972 New England Newsclip

Symphony Players—1

Cellist Feldman: five-year vet at 24

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

Cellist Ronald Feldman who, at 24, is a five-year veteran with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lives in an almost-empty five-room apartment in the Fenway with a closetful of baseball trophies and two cellos.

He used to own a BMW motorcycle but sold it after discovering one day that he was doing 110 mph and "started getting a little worried."

During the summer when the BSO performs at Tanglewood, Feldman rents a house in the Berkshire woods complete with private trout pond and last year fed his 11 cats with the fish he caught.

He thinks Pops season "is a drag" except for the last three weeks when the musicians have a bar backstage. And he doesn't like working with Arthur Fiedler because "he doesn't treat the musicians with respect" and because "he can't conduct anything except 4/4 or ¾."

"I asked Tod Perry (BSO manager) to let me conduct the Pops, but he wouldn't," Feldman said during an interview the other afternoon. We were sitting in what I guess would be the dining room of his apartment. Feldman had just moved from an apartment across the hall and so far there was only a small couch and a chair, a music stand, a mammoth stereo system shiny dark-brown woodwork, and a vase of peacock tails.

Janis Joplin was rasping over the FM and Feldman said he rarely listens to classical music when he comes home from rehearsals. "Have you been to hear Buddy Rich at Lenny's? I've been twice. That is so similar to chamber music. The musicians play so together and are so sensitive to each other. And the audience is really nice and they scream when they like something. That really turns me on."

RONALD FELDMAN
. . . like to conduct

Feldman, after offering me a glass of fresh spring water, had slumped into a chair with his sandled foot propped up and smokes one cigarette after another. He has longish dark hair and wore a turtleneck and jeans with a strand of red worry beads tied to his belt. "They're supposed to keep me from smoking."

What conductors does he like to work with? With the Pops, he really enjoys Erich Kunzel. "Fiedler takes advantage of people who don't know him and are afraid of him. And he gets completely mixed up when he has to conduct say ⅞. We were recording a Hayman arrangement of the Bernstein Mass the other day and spent far more time than was necessary for that reason.

"I like Michael (Tilson Thomas) more and more. He's really learning to handle an established orchestra. His best is very clear and he enjoys himself. He's fresh, not stale. When he jumps up in the air during a performance you know it's probably the first time."

After playing for five years in an orchestra job that many musicians might consider the pinnacle of a career, Feldman thinks he would like to quit eventually.

"Right now I'm sitting in the back of the section playing the same part as all the others. And you always feel you could play the solos as well as the first chair player. There is a great temptation there to sit back and never practice another note — to play very softly and at the same level as the others."

What he says is saving him now is Collage, a new contemporary chamber group composed of several BSO players. "I'm the only cellist," Feldman says.

In the meantime, the BSO is a still "good orchestra job" and he will stay until he finds something "more artistically rewarding.

"I've learned a lot from some of the fellows in the orchestra. Particularly my friend Jerry Patterson who is a natural on the cello. He plays as if he had an individual brain in each finger."

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,693

JUN 2 1972 New Engla News

Vernon R. Alden, former Ohio University president, is the new chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BAY STATE BANNER
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 17,000

JUN 8 1972 New England Newsclip

roving camera by Bob Hale

Have you ever been to the symphony? BOS.

No, I've never been there. All I ever see is Cadillacs and Mark IVs. It seems to be a rich white man's thing.

Lawrence Hoffman
Dorchester

Yes, I started going in 1961. I like the symphony but I can't afford to go regularly—about twice a year.

Elva Potter
Roxbury

No, there's been just no reason. I went when I was in the sixth grade, but I haven't been back since. I just don't particularly care for that kind of music.

Joseph Moore
Roxbury

No. The major reason is that the music just isn't to my liking. It's not soulful enough.

Carolyn Dungee
Roanoke, Virginia

No, I just don't like that kind of music so I don't see any reason to go.

Anthony Holman
Roxbury

Yes, I have. I went with my husband once and really enjoyed it. But I probably wouldn't have gone on my own first.

Louise Gupton
Roxbury

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

NOV 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Music

BSO cellist to give premiere

by Harry Neville

For a person who has been described as the "finest technician in the Boston Symphony cello section," Luis Leguia is remarkably free of prime donnaish traits. He was surprised, in fact, to learn of the accolade. Pleased, too, but also quick to wonder what people thought about other aspects of his performing abilities. Was his tone warm, he wanted to know, and was there much depth to his playing? Clearly, these were more important matters for him, as they would be for most musicians. Most musicians, however, wouldn't have asked such questions. To do so might have betrayed a little self-doubt, and self-doubt is a thing few professional musicians admit. It doesn't go well with the artistic image.

Such thoughts didn't bother Leguia—possibly because he's abundantly self-confident. A simpler and more likely explanation is that he's honest and unassuming, unconcerned with images. In other words, there is an engaging touch of naivete about Leguia. But it would be a mistake for one to assume from this that he lacks ambition, drive and assertiveness. That would be an inaccurate description of a musician who has more than a dozen major works for cello and orchestra in his repertory, who is scheduled for performances this season with several orchestras here and in Canada, and who will undertake a European recital tour next fall with M.I.T. pianist Robert Freeman—a tour on which they will introduce a major new work of Walter Piston at the Berlin Festival.

Leguia's background is not spectacular, though he does seem a little proud of the fact that one of his great uncles, Augusto Leguia, was president of Peru during the 1930's. (The only thing in his appearance that would suggest Peruvian descent is a vaguely Latin-style mustache.) The impressive thing about his childhood is that he appears to have decided on a cellist's career at a relatively late age. It was during junior high school that he switched from double-bass to his present instrument, but once the switch was made there followed a period of intensive study with some of the greatest names in the field. At age 17 he went to Prades where he spent a year with Casals, whom he remembers as a man who loved to discuss philosophical and esthetic aspects of music. His technical foundation, he says, came from Andre Navarra, with whom he studied at the Ecole Normale in Paris. Other teachers have included Gaspar Cassaco at the Chigi Institute in Sienna, Arthur Van den Bogaerde and Kurt Reher in Los Angeles, as well as coaching with Gabor Rejto and Leonard Rose.

Leguia played a season each with the Houston Symphony and the National Symphony before becoming a member of the Boston Symphony in 1963. It wasn't until about three years ago that he began again to play solo engagements, a thing he'd not done extensively since 1962, when he gave a number of recitals and concerto performances in Brazil and Argentina. Highlights of his activities last year were recitals at Town Hall and at the National Gallery and Pan American Union in Washington, D.C. Also the world premiere of the Robert Evett concerto at the National Gallery's 30th anniversary celebration.

This season he begins his solo activities tomorrow at the Boston Conservatory with a performance of Tchaikovsky's Rococo Variations with the Conservatory Orchestra. Six days later he will give the first Boston performance of one of the most extraordinary works ever written for the cello, Schoenberg's Concerto in D Major "after the Concerto for Clavicembalo composed in 1746 by Georg Matthias Monn." This performance will take place at a concert of the Newton Symphony, Michel Sasson conducting, next Sunday at 8 p.m. in Meadowbrook Jr. High School, Newton. To put it as mildly as possibly, it is an event that should not be missed.

The Schoenberg scholar and disciple Rene Leibowitz describes the concert as an "extremely curious and significant" work. He brackets it with Schoenberg's Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra (after a concerto gross of Handel), and states that the two works, both dating from the early 1930's, mark the return of the composer's tonal consciousness. "They are in the form of extremely free transcriptions which respect the thematic material and the original structure of the works on which they are based. However, this structure is considerably amplified by the typically Schoenbergian contrapuntal workmanship and technique of variation. Furthermore, the melodic and harmonic structure is enriched with chromaticism unknown to the period of the original works, and with obvious applications of certain principles of the twelve-tone row." Leibowitz goes on to draw an analogy between what Schoenberg has done with what a great painter does when he executes a picture modeled on a work by an earlier artist.

Here is how Michel Sasson compares the two works: "Monn's original is like seeing a movie in black and white. Schoenberg has written a technicolor, four-channel stereo, cinemascope version of the same piece." Sasson, incidentally, has prepared a program that will enable the listener to hear both works side by side. Harpsichordist Robert Levin will perform the original version with a chamber orchestra of nine players. The Schoenberg will be accompanied by an orchestra of 93 players, with a percussion section that includes glockenspiel, xylophone and celesta. For Sasson, the concerto is full of wit, "much the same kind of wit that you find in Stravinsky's 'Pulcinella,'" he says. For the soloist, the concerto is full of murderous difficulties, especially the first movement, reputedly the most difficult thing ever written for cello. Leguia won't take that movement at Schoenberg's indicated tempo—for the simple reason that it's not humanly possible to do so.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

NOV 9 1971 New Englar Newsc

Framingham Symphony in 7th Season

FRAMINGHAM — The Framingham Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Alfred Schneider, will present the first concert of its seventh season, Sunday, Nov. 21 at 3 p.m. at South High School auditorium.

Guest soloist will be Sherman Walt, first bassoonist with the Boston Symphony. Admission will be free.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

NOV 17 1971 New England Newsclip

ALFRED SCHNEIDER (left), conductor of the Framingham Symphony Orchestra, rehearses with bassoonist Sherman Walt, guest soloist from the Boston Symphony.
(News Photo by Brian Fullington)

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

OCT 29 1971 New England Newsclip

Framingham Symphony Prepares for Season

FRAMINGHAM — Rehearsals are already in progress for the Framingham Symphony Orchestra as it prepares for the opening concert of its seventh season, Nov. 21, at the South High School Auditorium.

Sherman Walt, principal bassoonist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest soloist playing the Mozart "Bassoon Concerto."

The orchestra, directed by Alfred Schneider, is composed of members not only from Framingham but also from Holliston, Natick, Hopkinton, Sherborn, Sudbury, and other surrounding towns.

At present the orchestra associationis recruiting additional string players as well as interested individuals to help with administrative responsibilities.

Persons are also needed to work in the public relations media, to transport musical equipment to and from concerts, to assist the music librarian, and to help with fund-raising.

If there are those within the South Middlesex area who would like to assist the orchestra in any of these capacities, they are invited to call Robert Yeaton, or Mrs. Verne Peloquin, for more information.

Virtuoso Bassoonist Plays in Framingham

FRAMINGHAM — Sherman Walt, first bassoonist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest soloist with the Framingham Symphony Orchestra in its first concert of the season, Sunday at 3 p.m. at Framingham South High School auditorium.

Walt has been associated with the Boston Sumphony as principal bassoonist since 1952 and is a colleague of the Framingham Symphony conductor, Alfred Schneider, who plays violin with the BSO.

Nationally known for his virtuoso performances on the bassoon, Walt made his first appearance with the Framingham Symphony in 1968, when he was a resident of Natick.

A music student since the age of five, he has played the instrument for 33 years. Now residing with his family in Brookline, he is a faculty member at the New England Conservatory of Music and at the Berkshire Music Center.

Walt is one of the 13 first players of the BSO who comprise the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The group gives between six and eight concerts during the winter and has toured Russia, the Virgin Islands and Europe. Most recently, Walt was soloist with the BSO on their spring concert tour in Rome, Barcelona, Hanover and Wuppertal. Following the tour, he performed with the Chamber Players in their European tour.

The music for this performance will be provided by a grant obtained with the cooperation of Local 393, American Federation of Musicians.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

NOV 19 1971 New Englar Newsc

Grant Gives Framingham Concert

FRAMINGHAM — The free concert which the Framingham Symphony Orchestra is presenting at Framingham South High School, Flagg Drive, Sunday at 3 p.m., will feature music provided by a grant from the Music Performance Trust Funds (Kenneth E. Raine, trustee). This is a public service organization created and financed by the Recording Industries under agreements with the American Federation of Musicians. The grant was obtained with the cooperation of A.F.M. Local 393.

Alfred Schneider of Framingham, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct and another BSO member, Sherman Walt, will be guest soloist.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

MAY 13 1972

New England Newsclip

Close-up

In Tune with the Times

By Lance Carden
The Christian Science Monitor News Service

Less than two years ago she came to Boston from a Los Angeles college campus to study violin with Joseph Silverstein. For a year she "free lanced" with various orchestras in the Boston area. Today, at 23, she is the youngest member of the Boston Symphony and one of only eight women in the orchestra.

One is quickly aware, however, that Darlene Gray has all the confidence and poise of a veteran performer — and a lot of natural charm as well.

Taking what would have been excellent concert seats we sat in an otherwise deserted Symphony Hall. My prepared questions were quickly disposed of; we just chatted for much of our half hour together.

Miss Gray defies conventional labeling. She is busy, but not businesslike; modern, but un-"hip"; feminine, but not frivolous.

First Year Recalled

Very relaxed in a midi-length, stylishly old-fashioned dress with billowy sleeves, Miss Gray spoke about her first year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO).

She can't recall any particularly "thrilling" moments or concerts during her time with the Symphony. In fact, she claims it is more difficult to get mentally "up" for a concert as a regular member than it was as a free-lancer with other orchestras because the BSO performs more frequently and repeats its concert programs.

"Besides," she said, "I've been playing in orchestras since I was six years old."

In the past, she explained, she would have been expected to start with a lesser orchestra and work her way up to the BSO. That was the tradition. But now, "your ability to play is the important thing."

Miss Gray has had little trouble adjusting to the Boston Symphony, in spite of her age and sex. She did concede that "in a group whose average age is probably over 45, one problem has been getting used to people from a different era."

On the other hand, she added, "women just didn't audition for orchestras five years ago, so they're having to get used to us, too."

Parents Made Decision

How did she come to be a violinist?

"My parents decided for me. My father plays violin, and I started when I was five.

"I'm against forcing children into things," Miss Gray continued, "but I'm afraid that's how it has to be with the violin. You can't wait 'til you get to college to make up your mind. By then it's too late."

An obviously successful musician unusually early in her career, Miss Gray gives no impression of slowing her pace. On the contrary, she talks about forming new goals. "I'm glad I'm here," she says, "but I'm not sure I want to spend 40 years with the Boston Symphony."

The young violinist is tremendously preoccupied with her musical career ("My parents didn't want me to have other interests"), but despite this, and despite her flawless appearance and gentle courtesy, she is very much a part of her own generation.

"I'm into women's lib quite a bit, and that bothers some of the people in the orchestra — including some exceptionally sensitive and intelligent ones."

Miss Gray says she decided on a professional career "a long time ago." She is aware that her career will make certain demands on her personal life, but she is confident that marriage and children can be accommodated along with it — if and when she chooses. Should a conflict arise, however, between her career and that of a prospective husband, Miss Gray is not so sure that her career must inevitably be sacrificed.

"I'm making $19,000 a year. I'm obviously not dependent on anyone for support,' she says.

Darlene Gray, the Boston Symphony's youngest member, and one of eight women in the orchestra.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

NOV 4 1971

New England Newsclip

Philharmonic Opens 24th Season With String Duo

Violinist Marylou Speaker and double bass player Lawrence Wolfe will be soloists in the opening concert of the North Shore Philharmonic's 24th season Sunday, Nov. 14, at 7:30 p.m. in City Hall Memorial Auditorium. The duo will play Botticini's Grand Duo Concertante under the baton of Rolland Tapley.

Both soloists are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert is co-sponsored by the Friends of St. Mary's School under the chairmanship of Mrs. John W. Hingston.

Also on the program will be the Triumphal March from Verdi's "Aida"; "Carnival" Overture, Op. 92 by Dvorak; Johann Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods" and "Thunder and Lightning." Also on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, selections from "No, No, Nanette" by Youmans, and a Pops "Hoedown" by Hayman.

Both Miss Speaker and Mr. Wolfe are graduates of the New England Conservatory of Music. Miss Speaker has studied at Tanglewood in the Berkshire's, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer festival; has been soloist with the Boston Pops, and has toured with the American National Opera Company. She has been concertmaster of the Boston Ballet Orchestra.

Wolfe, the winner of the 1969 Albert Spaulding Prize, gave a recital at New York's Carnegie Hall and has appeared in chamber ensembles at the Berkshire Music Center. He is a member of "Collage" a chamber ensemble of ten which plays works by modern day composers.

Edward W. Rhodes is orchestra president and Frank L. Jones is vice president. Tickets are available from orchestra members or from Mary Brennan's Card Shop.

MISS MARYLOU SPEAKER

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 20 1972

New England Newsc

VIOLINIST—Marylou Speaker of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be soloist in "Sonata for Violin and Piano" by Minnetta Kessler at the concert of the New England Jewish Music Forum Sunday evening, Jan. 23, in Wheelock College Auditorium, Boston. At the piano will be Miss Kessler. Songs by Chloe Owen, soprano will also be heard. A reception under the direction of Jean Gorin Bloom will follow the program.

Marylou Speaker of Bostonians Shows Artistry in Violin Debut

NT 2-14

Early Saturday afternoon, less than seven hours before she was due on stage at Carnegie Hall to play in the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Marylou Speaker went next door to the Recital Hall and made her New York solo debut.

The young artist, a native of Oregon, studied with Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster of the Boston, and has appeared several times in Boston as soloist with Arthur Fiedler and the Pops.

Although Miss Speaker is a dependable rather than an exciting talent, she made a generally good impression in Bach's unaccompanied Sonata No. 1 in G Minor, Stravinsky's Duo Concertant, the Grand Duo Concertant of Bottesini, and smaller works by Novacek, Rachmaninoff and Wieniawski.

Her performances were unmannered and consistently musical, she showed a real sense of artistic give-and-take in the Duos and she had the secure professionalism to dig herself unobtrusively out of trouble when mishaps occurred.

Some of the forcefulness that Miss Speaker lacked was provided by the excellent pianist, Elizabeth Wright, and the combination worked especially well in the Stravinsky Duo. The violinist was less comfortable with the acrobatics of Wieniawski's "Polonaise Brilliante," but the flowing, sweet-toned Rachmaninoff "Vocalise" was a happy choice.

The novelty of the day was the Bottesini, for which Miss Speaker enlisted the admirable services of a colleague from the Boston Symphony, Lawrence Wolfe, double-bassist. The piece is a trashy, cornball delight—a 16½-minute compendium of 19th-century virtuoso clichés—and the players, Miss Wright included, seemed to enjoy it every bit as much as the audience.

ROBERT SHERMAN.

MARYLOU SPEAKER

Violinist to appear

Marylou Speaker, former Portland violinist, now a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be one of the participants in the concert featuring former Junior Symphony players at the First Unitarian Church, Sunday, March 26, at 8 p.m.

Miss Speaker will be heard in Sebastian Bach's Sonata No. 1 for unaccompanied violin. Other onetime JS players involved in the program will be Catherine Paladino, clarinet; Margaret Moore, piano; and Patrick Fay, horn.

The concert will include performances of the Milhaud Clarinet Trio; the Avshalomov "Evocations;" the Brahms Horn Trio, and Wieniawski's Second Polonaise Brilliante.

The Oregonian
PORTLAND, OREGON
D. 245,132 SUN. 407,186

MAR 12 1972

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

MAY 13 1972

New England Newsclip

Close-up

In Tune with the Times

By Lance Carden
The Christian Science Monitor News Service

Less than two years ago she came to Boston from a Los Angeles college campus to study violin with Joseph Silverstein. For a year she "free lanced" with various orchestras in the Boston area. Today, at 23, she is the youngest member of the Boston Symphony and one of only eight women in the orchestra.

One is quickly aware, however, that Darlene Gray has all the confidence and poise of a veteran performer — and a lot of natural charm as well.

Taking what would have been excellent concert seats we sat in an otherwise deserted Symphony Hall. My prepared questions were quickly disposed of; we just chatted for much of our half hour together.

Miss Gray defies conventional labeling. She is busy, but not businesslike; modern, but un-"hip"; feminine, but not frivolous.

First Year Recalled

Very relaxed in a midi-length, stylishly old-fashioned dress with billowy sleeves, Miss Gray spoke about her first year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO).

She can't recall any particularly "thrilling" moments or concerts during her time with the Symphony. In fact, she claims it is more difficult to get mentally "up" for a concert as a regular member than it was as a free-lancer with other orchestras because the BSO performs more frequently and repeats its concert programs.

"Besides," she said, "I've been playing in orchestras since I was six years old."

In the past, she explained, she would have been expected to start with a lesser orchestra and work her way up to the BSO. That was the tradition. But now, "your ability to play is the important thing."

Miss Gray has had little trouble adjusting to the Boston Symphony, in spite of her age and sex. She did concede that "in a group whose average age is probably over 45, one problem has been getting used to people from a different era."

On the other hand, she added, "women just didn't audition for orchestras five years ago, so they're having to get used to us, too."

Parents Made Decision

How did she come to be a violinist?

"My parents decided for me. My father plays violin, and I started when I was five.

"I'm against forcing children into things," Miss Gray continued, "but I'm afraid that's how it has to be with the violin. You can't wait 'til you get to college to make up your mind. By then it's too late."

An obviously successful musician unusually early in her career, Miss Gray gives no impression of slowing her pace. On the contrary, she talks about forming new goals. "I'm glad I'm here," she says, "but I'm not sure I want to spend 40 years with the Boston Symphony."

The young violinist is tremendously preoccupied with her musical career ("My parents didn't want me to have other interests"), but despite this, and despite her flawless appearance and gentle courtesy, she is very much a part of her own generation.

"I'm into women's lib quite a bit, and that bothers some of the people in the orchestra — including some exceptionally sensitive and intelligent ones."

Miss Gray says she decided on a professional career "a long time ago." She is aware that her career will make certain demands on her personal life, but she is confident that marriage and children can be accommodated along with it — if and when she chooses. Should a conflict arise, however, between her career and that of a prospective husband, Miss Gray is not so sure that her career must inevitably be sacrificed.

"I'm making $19,000 a year. I'm obviously not dependent on anyone for support,' she says.

Darlene Gray, the Boston Symphony's youngest member, and one of eight women in the orchestra.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

NOV 4 1971

New England Newsclip

Philharmonic Opens 24th Season With String Duo

Violinist Marylou Speaker and double bass player Lawrence Wolfe will be soloists in the opening concert of the North Shore Philharmonic's 24th season Sunday, Nov. 14, at 7:30 p.m. in City Hall Memorial Auditorium. The duo will play Botticini's Grand Duo Concertante under the baton of Rolland Tapley.

Both soloists are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert is co-sponsored by the Friends of St. Mary's School under the chairmanship of Mrs. John W. Hingston.

Also on the program will be the Triumphal March from Verdi's "Aida"; "Carnival" Overture, Op. 92 by Dvorak; Johann Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods" and "Thunder and Lightning." Also on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, selections from "No, No, Nanette" by Youmans, and a Pops "Hoedown" by Hayman.

Both Miss Speaker and Mr. Wolfe are graduates of the New England Conservatory of Music. Miss Speaker has studied at Tanglewood in the Berkshire's, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer festival; has been soloist with the Boston Pops, and has toured with the American National Opera Company. She has been concertmaster of the Boston Ballet Orchestra.

Wolfe, the winner of the 1969 Albert Spaulding Prize, gave a recital at New York's Carnegie Hall and has appeared in chamber ensembles at the Berkshire Music Center. He is a member of "Collage" a chamber ensemble of ten which plays works by modern day composers.

Edward W. Rhodes is orchestra president and Frank L. Jones is vice president. Tickets are available from orchestra members or from Mary Brennan's Card Shop.

MISS MARYLOU SPEAKER

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 20 1972

New England Newsclip

VIOLINIST—Marylou Speaker of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be soloist in "Sonata for Violin and Piano" by Minnetta Kessler at the concert of the New England Jewish Music Forum Sunday evening, Jan. 23, in Wheelock College Auditorium, Boston. At the piano will be Miss Kessler. Songs by Chloe Owen, soprano will also be heard. A reception under the direction of Jean Gorin Bloom will follow the program.

Marylou Speaker of Bostonians Shows Artistry in Violin Debut

NAT 2-14

Early Saturday afternoon, less than seven hours before she was due on stage at Carnegie Hall to play in the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Marylou Speaker went next door to the Recital Hall and made her New York solo debut.

The young artist, a native of Oregon, studied with Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster of the Boston, and has appeared several times in Boston as soloist with Arthur Fiedler and the Pops.

Although Miss Speaker is a dependable rather than an exciting talent, she made a generally good impression in Bach's unaccompanied Sonata No. 1 in G Minor, Stravinsky's Duo Concertant, the Grand Duo Concertant of Bottesini, and smaller works by Novacek, Rachmaninoff and Wieniawski.

Her performances were unmannered and consistently musical, she showed a real sense of artistic give-and-take in the Duos and she had the secure professionalism to dig herself unobtrusively out of trouble when mishaps occurred.

Some of the forcefulness that Miss Speaker lacked was provided by the excellent pianist, Elizabeth Wright, and the combination worked especially well in the Stravinsky Duo. The violinist was less comfortable with the acrobatics of Wieniawski's "Polonaise Brilliante," but the flowing, sweet-toned Rachmaninoff "Vocalise" was a happy choice.

The novelty of the day was the Bottesini, for which Miss Speaker enlisted the admirable services of a colleague from the Boston Symphony, Lawrence Wolfe, double-bassist. The piece is a trashy, cornball delight—a 16½-minute compendium of 19th-century virtuoso clichés—and the players, Miss Wright included, seemed to enjoy it every bit as much as the audience.

ROBERT SHERMAN.

MARYLOU SPEAKER

Violinist to appear

Marylou Speaker, former Portland violinist, now a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be one of the participants in the concert featuring former Junior Symphony players at the First Unitarian Church, Sunday, March 26, at 8 p.m.

Miss Speaker will be heard in Sebastian Bach's Sonata No. 1 for unaccompanied violin. Other onetime JS players involved in the program will be Catherine Paladino, clarinet; Margaret Moore, piano; and Patrick Fay, horn.

The concert will include performances of the Milhaud Clarinet Trio; the Avshalomov "Evocations;" the Brahms Horn Trio, and Wieniawski's Second Polonaise Brilliante.

The Oregonian
PORTLAND, OREGON
D. 245,132 SUN. 407,186

MAR 12 1972

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,503 SUN. 867,810

NOV 21 1971

Music About Town

Boston Concertmaster Has Best of All Possible Worlds

By SAMUEL L. SINGER
Of The Inquirer Staff

Although no one has asked him officially, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thinks it would be asking Michael Tilson Thomas "to do too much, to take over the conductorship of the Boston Symphony" at this time.

Thomas, who is associate conductor of the Boston and music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic, "is a hot property" as a guest conductor, said Silverstein.

But he needs more time to mature and to find himself, the concertmaster added. "He's still in his twenties. When the time comes for him to take over the post of a major symphony, he'll know it is the right thing to do."

PODIUM FIREMAN

"I've had no mercurial podium career yet," he said on the telephone from Boston the othed day, "but conducting is a nice thing to do from time to time. I'm ready whenever called upon to conduct a concert or take over a rehearsal.

"I'm the trouble-shooter here. I'm always waiting for somebody to fall ill. My assistant concertmaster hopes it won't happen when Strauss's "Heldenleben" (with a major violin solo part) is on the program."

RECITAL HERE TODAY

The reason for the telephone call was that Silverstein is giving a recital at the Philadelphia Museum of Art today at 3:30 P. M. He will play only music for violin alone—a sonata by Pisendel, a Bach contemporary; Ysaye's Sonata No. 4, Bach's Partita No. 1 and four Paganini Caprices.

"Actually I have the best of all concert worlds," Silverstein continued. "I have not only the excitement of playing with a great orchestra but have the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (first-desk men) that are very active, and I do lots of solo playing, and teaching as well.

HE LIKES VARIETY

"I have the opportunity to do about everything a violinist would want to do. There's enough variety so the level of stimulation is pretty high. It would be hard to choose, if I had my druthers, that I'd want to do any one specific thing at the expense of the others."

Silverstein was the only American to place in the top 10 of the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium contest in 1959, and the next year won the Naumburg Award, at that time believed to be worth $25,000 in orchestral and recital contracts.

"The Naumburg worked out very handsomely for me," the violinist recalled. "Had I wanted to continue on a full-time basis as a soloist, the start I got would have sustained me nicely. But I had my heart set on being a concertmaster, for greater variety and for the opportunity to teach with the job."

IN PHILA. ORCHESTRA

A native of Detroit, whose first teacher was his father, Silverstein studied at the Curtis Institute with Efrem Zimbalist, then later with Mischa Mischakoff and Josef Gingold. After playing in the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1953-54, he went to the Denver Symphony for a season.

"I felt kind of isolated in Denver," he said. "and wanted to return East. So I joined the Boston Symphony — at age 23 their youngest member — at the traditional last stand of the second violins."

In seven years Silverstein became concertmaster.

He is unworried about an entire program just for violin, and is giving such conerts in New York and Boston.

27 VIOLIN CONCERTOS

"There's quite a sizable repertoire for violin alone," he said. "As to the number of recitals I give, it depends on how many concertos I'm playing with the Boston and four or five other orchestras. In 16 years I've played 27 different concertos and larger pieces that are not quite concertos."

Last season Silverstein and his first-cellist colleague, Jules Eskin, played the Brahms Double Concerto with the Philharmonia Orchestra here.

Returning to the subject of the Boston Symphony, Silverstein noted that "this is the first year we're really trying to reach the big college audience in the area. We put rush seats on sale at 8:15; the kids are willing to gamble on it. Friday afternoons any leftover seat in the house goes for $1. It's very exciting."

ST. CECILIA CONCERT

The Pennsylvania Pro Musical gives two concerts honoring St. Cecilia, patron saint of music, today at 5:15 in St. Michael's Lutheran Church chapel, 6671 Germantown ave., and tomorrow (St. Cecilia's Day) at 7:45 in St. Mary's Church. 3916 Locust st. Franklin B. Zimmerman conducts chorus, instrumental ensemble and soloists.

The Prague String Quartet from Czechoslovakia opens the 21st series of Coffee Concerts, tonight at 8 in the Civic Center's Plaza Ballroom: Quartets by Haydn (in C, Op. 54, No. 2), Janacek ("Kreutzersonate") and Dvorak (No. 7 in A flat).

Joseph Silverstein, Boston Symphony concertmaster who plays here today, says Michael Tilson Thomas "is a hot property but should wait awhile before taking the conducting post of a major orchestra."

The Philadelphia Musical Academy symphonic wind ensemble and jazz festival band give a free concert tonight at 8 at the Walnut Street Theater. Richard Castiglione conducts the winds in Hartley's Concerto, Castaldo's "Theoria" and Hindemith's Concerto Music. Evan Solot leads the jazz band.

The Old York Road Symphony, Joseph Primavera, conductor, opens its season Saturday at 8:30 in Abington High School, south campus. The program features the Mozart Clarinet Concerto, with Paula Goldin, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

DEC 2 1971

New England Newsclip

VIOLIN RECITAL to benefit the Music Scholarship Fund at Boston University will be given by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 6, 8 p.m., at Boston University's Morse Auditorium, 602 Commonwealth Ave. Admission to the concert is $3 with tickets available at the door 30 minutes prior to the recital. Mr. Silverstein, a member of the music faculty at Boston University, will perform "Sonata in A minor" by Jorann Georg Pisendel; "Concertpiece" by Seymour Shifrin; "Six Caprici" from Op. 1 of Niccolo Paganini (Nos. 2, 4, 5, 6, 9 and 21); "Sonata No. 4" by Eugene Yasye; and "Partita No. 1 in B minor" by J. S. Bach.

NYT
Dec. 15

Silverstein, Alone, in Program Of Unusual Violinistic Interest

Every other person entering Alice Tully Hall Monday night, it seemed, carried a fiddle case, a hint that something of more than passing violinistic interest might be about to take place inside. The hint was correct: Joseph Silverstein, who has been the Boston Symphony's concertmaster for nine years, walked onstage alone and proceeded to play with extraordinary skill an entire program of unaccompanied works.

Violinists don't often get the chance to hear anyone, let alone anyone of Mr. Silverstein's caliber, perform Johann Georg Pisendel's Sonata in A minor or Ysaye's solo sonatas. True, the Pisendel sounded rather tame tand pseudo-Bachish, especially in light of the authentic Bach that closed the program (the Partita in B minor), and the Ysaye Sonata No. 4 cut a somewhat narrow, though distinct, swath musically.

But Mr. Silverstein went at each piece with the same high seriousness and technical command that made the Bach, with all its tiring repeats honored, impressive. Six Paganini Caprices received technically superb but also unusually thoughtful performances. In No. 2, where the labored left-hand stretches and across-the-strings bowing forced a moderate pace, the violinist still kept the music moving and concentrated on delivering a rich, velvety tone.

The buzzing scales and staccato of No. 5 were breathtaking, and in No. 6 the somber melody sang gorgeously through the steady tremolando. Mr. Silverstein summed up his Paganini expertise in No. 21, giving out the Kreislerish tune sweetly and letting go in the Presto section with a brilliant display of genuine staccato fiddling.

Violinists who can play the Caprices well are not common, but those who can keep them from sounding sleazy are even rarer. Mr. Silverstein, who seemed to be sacrificing applause-seeking bravura in order to maintatin accuracy and objectivity, proved one of the rare ones. Similarly, Seymour Shifrin's "Concert Piece" benefited mightily from the violinist's cool but musicianly approach to its problems. The cool style of the artist, in fact, extended even to his welcome decision to perform without formal coat, in a blue, ruffled shirt.

DONAL HENAHAN.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

DEC 8 1971

New England Newsclip

Silverstein alone with his violin

By Louis Snyder

It is the lot of concertmasters to play the showy violin passages composers write into overtures, symphonies, and tone poems. They usually fill at least one concerto engagement with their orchestra each season, and it is their continuing duty to be the "leader" among their colleagues in all sections, as well as to be prepared to take over the baton and conduct a performance in case of emergency.

Since 1962, Joseph Silverstein has been fulfilling all these obligations with distinction for the Boston Symphony, which means that others have been added — assistant conductorship of the BSO, faculty chairmanship at Berkshire Music Center, etc. etc.

On Monday, however, Mr. Silverstein did what one suspects he really likes best. He appeared on the stage of Boston University's Morse Auditorium accompanied only by his violin, and in an atmosphere of warm and intimate informality, the two made an evening of challenging and beautiful music together.

The program ranged from works by virtuoso-performers—Johann Georg Pisendel (a pupil of Corelli and Vivaldi and himself an 18th-century violinist of note), Niccolò Paganini, and Eugène Ysaye, to a crisp, spare Concert Piece by Seymour Shifrin (who was present), and a partita (No. 1 in B minor) by Johann Sebastian Bach.

While one may have been turned off in the past by the one obligatory "for violin alone" selection which recitalists have included on their programs—usually an inordinately grueling demonstration of technique—Mr. Silverstein's selection of pieces for artist and instrument only belied the suspicion that all of these are tests of strength and endurance by participants and audience.

The singing Pisendel Sonata, Mr. Shifrin's gratefully considered use of the violin in modern terms, and six of Paganini's 24 stunning and taxing "Capricci" showed many facets of Mr. Silverstein's artistry fron both technical and interpretive standpoints. His results were achieved, not by digging in, but by the balanced use of an instrumental tone that is naturally large, round, and rich.

Ysaye's highly satisfying romantic Sonata No. 4, with a tremendous virtuoso passage in its Finale, and the classic strength and order of the Bach Partita reaffirmed in the program's second half what had been apparent in the first, if not before—that Mr. Silverstein and his violin are as pleasurable, impressive companions alone as in larger, more turbulent contexts of sound.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

DEC 20 1971 New England Newsclip

Ceccato in BSO debut

By Louis Snyder

As a going-away-for-the-holidays treat, the Boston Symphony gave its listeners and itself one of the season's best possible presents—a pair of superlatively played weekend concerts. There to inspire and tie it up was Aldo Ceccato, a young Italian conductor, making an auspicious debut with the orchestra.

The program, perhaps deceptively simple on paper, proved very substantial in performance: Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto Grosso in G minor, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1 in C minor (its first known hearin Boston), and Dvorak's Ninth Symphony ("From the New World"). And Mr. Ceccato, who has already directed the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, and the Cleveland Orchestra on his way through an impressive list of guest appearances, gave rather solid evidence of what the excitement has been about.

The Corelli was played with great grace and style by 11 strings, of which violinists Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, and cellist Jules Eskin, formed the concertino, with harpsichordist Robert Levin supplying the continuo. The conductor kept a delicate balance between the trio and the tutti players throughout this engagingly melodic Christmastime evocation which has a lovely concluding Pastorale to place the gleaming star atop the tree.

Vigorous and airy

Mendelssohn's C minor Symphony is arguably called No. 1 (on Thursday in Cambridge, the Orchestra Michelangelo di Firenze played an earlier C minor Symphony for strings, one of at least nine composed before he was 14). However, numbers have little to do with the fresh, vigorous impression this work of 1824 makes. It is already strongly structured, with numerous hints of Mendelssohnian devices and trademarks to be developed later on. And a fund of airborne melody that admits it to the company of the "Scotch" and "Italian" Symphonies, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.

Here were demonstrable signs of Mr. Ceccato's way with the orchestra, since this symphony was a first-ever performance by the BSO. While his beat ranged from miniscule to flamboyant, there seemed to be no question of its incisiveness or Mr. Ceccato's intentions. And the response of the players represented the orchestra at its most keenly alert, which means right on top of the music.

Probably the greatest revelation of the partnership between musicians and guest conductor was the reading of the Dvorak Symphony. Generally familiar, almost to a fault, principally through maudlin performances of its Largo ("Goin' Home"), the "New World" in uninspired circumstances can be a trial. Not on this occasion, however.

Artful blend

Mr. Ceccato, sensitive to the caliber of the musicians before him, blended the choirs with a deftness that not only put a fresh face on the score but individualized the rich qualities of the BSO's fine soloists and sections. Each of the four movements was artfully sculptured — the Largo especially, with its English horn solo wonderfully played by Laurence Thorstenberg, took on new meaning. And Dvorak's symphonic framework, illumined as it was by sounds of superior timbre, was revealed free of traditional encrustations.

All this was accomplished with subtlety and refinement by Mr. Ceccato, and by the musicians who, individually and ensemble, did some of their finest playing this season. At each pause between movements, there was an electric sense of tension in the hall which burst out in cheers and applause at the end of the concert. Mr. Ceccato bowed to and "embraced" the orchestra, which in turn clapped for him, and the listeners gave them all an excited, noisy ovation.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,140 S. 290,961

DEC 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Aldo Ceccato Conducts Boston Symphony for First Time Here

By HARRY NEVILLE

Generally speaking, the elegance of the playing a conductor draws from an orchestra has an inverse relationship to the elegance of the conducting. The probable reason for this is that super-elegant gestures are more often the result of practice before mirrors than of experience with orchestras.

Yesterday afternoon Aldo Ceccato conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time locally. He's about as elegant-looking a conductor as one could imagine: luxuriant and carefully coiffed hair, a black velvet jacket and molto espressivo gestures. I was prepared for the worst but I'm glad to report there was a fairly good correlation between what one saw and what one heard.

CECCATO BRINGS a great deal of ebullience to the music, but at the same time he doesn't let this quality get out of hand. He seems to have a good ear for balances (only once, in the finale of the "New World" Symphony, did I feel that he sacrificed the strings to an immediately impressive effect from the brass), and he is meticulous with his cues. Unfortunately, his own precision wasn't always matched by the players, particularly in the Dvorak where the brass made a number of clumsy entrances.

Ceccato had no revelations to make about the "New World" Symphony, but it's difficult to imagine that any conductor would at this point. His was a straightforward approach and one of its most enjoyable features was the sensible way he varied tempo in the first movement. Vary it he did, but not to excess, and the performance gained in freshness as a result. A major fault of the reading was his failure ever to get really soft playing from the strings, which meant a loss of expressiveness at several crucial points.

Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto Grosso — Op. 6, No. 8, in G minor — served as the orchestra's annual gesture to the holiday season. Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, and Jules Eskin, cello, formed the excellent concertino. Tempos were well chosen and the performance had quite a bit more weight and individuality than the average Baroque ensemble brings to such music.

The unusual work on the program was Mendelssohn's First Symphony, which received its first BSO performance ever under Ceccato. The piece was written when the composer was 15 years old and despite its numerical designation it was preceded by a dozen other symphonies. Small wonder then that it sounds like a thoroughly professional and mature work. Its core is an intensely songful slow movement. There is, too, a sturdy, rather Mozartean minuet with an appealing trio, and the outer movements brim with vitality and good spirits. Or so they did under Ceccato's brisk, clean direction.

Dunnock Sick, Play Canceled

The scheduled performance last night at the Loeb Drama Center of Marguerite Duras' play, "A Place Without Doors," was canceled due to the illness of Mildred Dunnock, who was to have played the lead role. There has been no decision on rescheduling the play.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.

DEC 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Conductor to Make Boston Debut

Aldo Ceccato makes his debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the orchestra's 10th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, today at 2 p. m. and tomorrow at 8:30, in Symphony Hall.

The concert begins with Carelli's Concerto Grosso in G minor, the "Christmas" concerto, followed by Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 "New World."

★

A native of Milan, Aldo Ceccato began conducting in his early twenties after a promising career as a pianist. In 1969 he won first prize in the third international competition of Italian radio-television for young conductors.

In the fall of 1970 he conducted the New York Philharmonic and Chicago Symphony for the first time.

There will be no concerts by the orchestra during the week of Dec. 26.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

DEC 6 1971 New England Newsc

$200,000 for BSO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will receive $200,000 (one half in private funds) as one of 93 organizations receiving $5,199,756 under the 1972 orchestra program of the National Endowment for the Arts — the largest single program in its six-year history. The BSO funds are earmarked for the Berkshire Music Center "to help aspiring artists become accomplished musicians."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 281,042 SUN. 676,377
DEC 18 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony plays well for young, lively Italian

Ceccato conducts Dvorak

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Aldo Ceccato is a young Italian conductor without a permanent position, who admits that he is shopping, and I am curious to know more about him than he let on at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The afternoon was very pleasant indeed, and the orchestra played well for him, but the program — Corelli's Christmas Concerto, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, and the Dvorvak "New World" Symphony — was not terribly informative. It showed that he is lively, has taste, and can engage the attention of players and listeners, but nothing called on interpretive powers of great depth nor on particularly sophisticated orchestral skills.

ALDO CECCATO . . . claims attention of his players.

To be offered the Mendelssohn, by actual count his 13th symphony and composed at age 15, was a pleasure. The boy was full of beans and outrageous self-possession; moreover, he was well on the way to finding his own distinctively clean-edged, glowing orchestral sound. Later — which is to say, very soon — he came to write less insistently and with subtler transitions from one event to the next, but this C minor Symphony, while letting us know how much he liked Mozart's No. 40 and some Schubert, is full of invention and really engaging. He plays at tempests in the first and last movements, produces a lovely Andante of a certain genteel sentimentality, and thinks of a most original trio — very slow woodwind chords with accompaniment of strings and pretend-ominous drumbeats — for his rambunctious minuet.

The performance of the Mendelssohn was full of verve. So was that of the Dvorak, only that the famous English Horn solo in the Largo was rhythmically slovenly (a demonstration of how to play it correctly being provided near the end of the movement by the solo strings). The Corelli performance was a funny mixture of, on the one hand, few strings and harpsichord, good tempi, reasonably believable ornaments, and, on the other, the harpsichord's inaudibility, vibrato so intense that it suggested a parody of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and juicy slides. With all its stylistic wrongnesses, though, it was very musical.

Between the Corelli and the Mendelssohn, three uniformed policemen appeared to throw out two rather scruffy young men who had, without being suitably ticketed, occupied two empty seats downstairs. I want to say two things. One: I hope the two young men will have the opportunity to learn that if you want to crash a party you should always go black tie. The other: there was an impeccably dressed young man with a center aisle seat, who conducted with gestures large enough to lead an actual performance (but always behind the music), and to throw him out would have been a greater social and esthetic service.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,284
DEC 17 1971
New England Newsclip

Aldo Ceccato fights typecasting

By Louis Snyder

If the name of Aldo Ceccato isn't yet familiar as guest conductor of your leading local symphony orchestra, it should be by the spring of 1974. After his debut in the United States directing Bellini's "I Puritani" with the Lyric Opera of Chicago in 1969, the tall, dark, handsome young Italian began filling his engagement book with dates which now run three years into the future. This afternoon and tomorrow evening, he appears with the Boston Symphony for the first time at Symphony Hall.

Conducting didn't just become Mr. Ceccato's profession by chance. After 10 years of piano and composition studies in Milan, he enrolled at the Hochschule für Musik where his conducting lessons were given by the Straussian maestro, Clemens Krauss. Summers were spent at the Accademia Chigiana in Siena. There he drank in musical wisdom and conducting technique from Sergiu Celibidache ("He could be one of the great conductors of the world if he would only — conduct!") The Romanian is a living legend among musicians, even more for his directing skills than his eccentricities about where and when he performs.

Much to learn

"There was so much to learn from a man like Celibidache," Mr. Ceccato said. "From him I gained standards of conducting—the way to do music. He instilled a taste for orchestral sounds, and pointed out how to get results. And he gave me a scientific beating technique which a conductor must have to avoid trouble with the orchestra—no improvisation—beating that is mathematically sure, resulting from elements in the music itself."

Boston baton debut

Aldo Ceccato conducts the Boston Symphony this afternoon and tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall for the first time after making his debut with the orchestra last night in its Providence series.

At school in Berlin, student Ceccato progressed over a four-year period from pianist in the orchestra, to chorus director, to coach for the singers, to conductor of "Otello" (his final "exam" as a pupil)—an overall experience he has found valuable. From there he went to Milan's Teatro Sperimentale to work with young singers in "Don Giovanni" and "Le Nozze di Figaro," after which the doors of successively more important theaters opened, in Italy and abroad.

Last year he conducted "Otello" at Covent Garden, and a "wonderful new production" of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" at Glyndebourne's summer festival. In October and November he was in London again for "Falstaff," which he will repeat at Covent Garden along with a revival of Verdi's "Simon Boccanegra" in February. And he'll be back at Glyndebourne this summer for three weeks of "Ariadne" performances.

'Something marvelous'

A question about preference between operatic and symphonic music brought a predictable reply—"I like to do good music, of whatever age and kind. And of course, knowledge of one field is useful to the other, even though the problems of the conductor differ in a stage and a concert performance. I am trying now to keep it divided half and half, where scheduling will permit."

One thing Mr. Ceccato is sure of—he doesn't intend to be typed—compartmentalized.

"This limitation by nationality and geography is so foolish," he exclaims. "The tendency in Italy, for instance — other places, too — that the Italian repertory must be conducted by Italians, the German by Germans, the Russian by people from the East . . . After all, it's music, and shouldn't be bound by closed traditions of the country where it was born. In opera, I know and love the Italian repertory, but I was delighted when Glyndebourne asked me, an Italian, to conduct "Ariadne" there. In the cast were singers from Britain, Hungary, America, Sweden — the language was the original — an ideal collaboration, without boundaries, of musicians making music. And," he added, "we had at least 40 days of rehearsals to put it together — build it step by step into something marvelous."

Time has become a tenuous commodity for Mr. Ceccato and his wife, the former Eliana de Sabata (daughter of the late conductor-composer, Victor de Sabata, whom he reveres). Having crossed and recrossed the Atlantic seven times within the last year to fulfill concert, opera, and concert commitments, he finds the life of a jet-age commuter exciting but wearing.

On the move

"Changing food, language, time, living arrangements, money, is difficult, but then there is the compensation of meeting warm, responsive people, and these great American orchestras—I am not only pleased, I am overwhelmed by them."

American orchestras and Mr. Ceccato will be seeing quite a lot of one another over the next few seasons. He has already appeared with the New York Philharmonic and Chicago Symphony (to which he will be returning in both instances), the Minnesota and Cleveland Orchestras, and Washington's National Symphony. And—after Boston—Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Detroit, and San Francisco are in prospect.

The summer circuit includes the Blossom, Tanglewood, Robin Hood Dell, and Hollywood Bowl festivals, as well as commitments abroad. Last year, between Covent Garden and Glyndebourne, he conducted recordings of Donizetti's "Maria Stuarda" with Beverly Sills and Eileen Farrell, and of "La Traviata" with Miss Sills, one current, one about to be released. This year there may be more.

As for the future—the far off, unbooked future? Perhaps an orchestra of "his own"? Mr. Ceccato smiled guardedly. "We are thinking of that," he sighed. "Just think, a chance to settle down, and become involved humanly and psychologically and artistically in a sincere, enthusiastic musical community. . . ."

Steinberg Conducts Boston Symphony in Works of Starer and Lees

By HARRY NEVILLE

When a composer or a program annotator feels obliged to issue a disclaimer in connection with a piece of music, more often than not the disclaimer arouses rather than allays suspicion. Thus, when Robert Starer announced in the program booklet of yesterday's Boston Symphony concert that in the second movement of his 1969 Symphony he had "deliberately sought out the rhythmic simplicity and directness which the young look for," one wondered if his statement was an apology for rhythmic monotony.

And when Winthrop Sargeant was quoted as having said of Benjamin Lees' Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra that it was not old-fashioned or academic but "right in the mainstream of valid contemporary music," one immediately suspected that the Concerto would turn out to be rather anemic and inconsequential.

ONE'S SUSPCIONS were justified in both cases. A composer's wish to write music accessible to a broad range of people is admirable. But if the attempt results in something that everyone understands but hardly anyone cares about, then it doesn't matter what his intentions were. This listener's applause-meter isn't infallible, but I couldn't detect any difference at all yesterday between the way the audience reacted to these works and the way the audience reacted last year to one of Stockhausen's scores.

Starer is a 47-year-old Viennese-born composer who has lived in this country since 1947. He is the winner of an impressive number of prizes and awards, and several of his works have been performed by William Steinberg, the dedicatee of the Third Symphony and the person who conducted its performance yesterday.

The work is in four movements, each of which roughly corresponds in mood to its counterpart in traditional notions of statement, development and recapitulation, and the result is a work that coheres easily and nicely — perhaps a bit too much so.

There is an effective use of cluster harmonies, there are pleasant melodies, and the orchestration is highly professional. I only wish that at some point the work rose above the level of good craftsmanship and presented something gripping and absorbing.

MUCH THE SAME KIND OF comment could be of the Lees Concerto. Again the writing is highly competent, the musical ideas are moderately attractive, but the work doesn't really seem to go anywhere. The soloists were the Boston Symphony String Quartet — Jsoeph Silverstein, Max Hobart, Burton Fine, Jules Eskin — and I thought they made as much as possible out of what was essentially a thankless task.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony concluded the concert. The performance could have used lots of tidying-up of details, but it gave pleasure nevertheless. The clarinet and flute solos were especially well played, and there was a great deal of warmth in the string tone. Steinberg chose what seemed to this listener a dangerously slow pace for the Andante, but for the most part he brought it off.

THE BOSTON HERALD Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961
DEC 11 1971
New England Newsclip

'Last Picture Show' Holds for 5th Week

"The Last Picture Show," the new film by Peter Bogdanovich, holds over for a fifth week at Loew's Abbey Cinema I, in Boston with special midnight shows every Friday and Saturday evenings. "The Last Picture Show," stars Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, Ellen Burstyn, Ben Johnson, Cloris Leachman, and Clu Gulager and introduces top fashion model Cybill Shepherd.

The film is about a time and place just 20 years gone but seemingly light-years away. It's about growing up in a town running down, where being free means getting out.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
DEC 13 1971
New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: STARER AND LEES

Mr. Steinberg put in his bi-monthly appearance at Symphony Hall and gave us Robert Starer's Symphony No. 3, Benjamin Lees' Concerto for string quartet and orchestra and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

The Starer and Lees pieces superficially contained a certain number of things in common: Each was having its first performance here. Both were highly propulsive and had sufficient textural similarity to make a listener attend with some care if he were adequately to sort them out from each other on a back-to-back playing. Both were skilful and pleasantly assimilated exercises in eclecticism. The composers were both born on January 8, 1924.

There the easy comparison ends. Starer's Symphony is classic in its four movement construction. As the composer himself puts it, it retains the principle of statement of ideas, development, transformed restatement and conclusion, but not in its key relations. After a nod, or rather a hand-shake, to Bartok in the opening movement, the symphony settles down in the manner, as someone later reminded me, of Honegger in its complex employment of the impressionists's vocabulary to essentially rhythmic and linear ends. The work was dedicated to Mr. Steinberg, who introduced it in Pittsburgh, and the composer was on hand to take a bow.

Lees is a resourceful fellow who writes in the direct line of Bartok and mid-Stravinsky. A concerto for string quartet and orchestra is not a garden variety combination, but Lees often works with an unusual assemblage. This last year, for example, saw the premiere in London of his "Medea of Corinth", for four voices, wind quintet and tympani, based on the play of Robinson Jeffers, and he is presently collaborating with E. B. White on the "Trumpet of the Swan", for narrator and orchestra for presentation at Philadelphia Youth Concerts very shortly.

It would be interesting to hear how these other combinations work out, for the instant one did not quite wash. Various commentators have said of the Concerto for Quartet and Orchestra that it is not a concerto grosso with contrasting of the instrumentalists in the concert group with the orchestra, but rather an employment of the quartet as the soloist per se. To this listener, however, the results came out strictly in the familiar concerto grosso mode; but the quartet was handicapped by not very noticeable contrasts in the harmonic texture and in any case was out-gunned by the large and full orchestra. Mayhap a chamber orchestra would have made for a more effective combination. The capable performers were the Boston Symphony String Quartet, Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, 'cello.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony is one of those masterpieces that either you approach reverentially or else you stay home. It is played much too often to expect that every performance will provide an experience, but a reasonably solid rendition, even though done at less than white heat, still can leave most hearers much moved. This is the kind of performance Mr. Steinberg provided. One might have wished for more motion in the Andante and less motion in the Scherzo, or stronger underlinings of the moments of poignancy and nobility, but such things are highly arguable questions of preference. Register one, then, who did leave the hall much moved.

The young Italian conductor, Aldo Ceccato is this week's guest. His program includes Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto, the first Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Mendelssohn's First Symphony and Dvorak's Symphony "from the New World".

BSO's Starer, Lees

By Louis Snyder

Two composers, both born in different parts of the world on Jan. 8, 1924, had their works performed by the Boston Symphony under William Steinberg in weekend concerts at Symphony Hall. There were Boston premieres of Robert Starer's Symphony No. 3 (1969)—dedicated to Mr. Steinberg—and of the Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra by Benjamin Lees. Brahms's Fourth Symphony (E minor) filled the second half of the program.

Works by both Mr. Starer and Mr. Lees have been played before by the orchestra, but never consecutively on the same occasion, and one might question the wisdom of this programming decision. Mr. Starer's "Symphony" (so called, according to the composer's program note, in its original sense of "concord of sound," rather than in its compositional form) is rather diffuse in purpose and appeal to the ear. One is intrigued, but not held by Mr. Starer's facile writing for congenial combinations of instruments, and focus seems lacking.

The Lees Concerto, on the other hand, has its form to keep it warm. An orchestral quartet (Joseph Silvertein, Max Hobart, Burton Fine, and Jules Eskin) in dialogue with the main body of musicians provides a point of departure for the first-time listener, and the subsequent thematic material is distinguishable and interesting. It generates a feeling of native energy and drive.

Placed side by side with a familiar work more vivid in contrast, the Starer and the Lees pieces would have made stronger individual impressions, but as program-mates each detracted markedly from the full impact of the other.

Both composers were present to hear their own and one another's performances, and to share with Mr. Steinberg, the orchestra, and the BSO Quartet the kind of cordial applause that is hardly the gauge of any composition's staying power.

On Friday at least, the Brahms gathered momentum as it went along, after a slip here or there. But there were no slips in the soaring flute passage in the concluding Allegro, conveyed with silvery sound by Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500
DEC 16 1971
New England

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
DEC 11 1971
New England Newscli

BSO performs Brahms's 4th

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

"Vast frescoes dashed off with loathing," a phrase spoken by one of Samuel Beckett's characters, describes better than anything I can find in my head the tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's playing of the fourth Brahms Symphony yesterday afternoon. They've all played the piece countless times before and at this point are probably bored silly with it, but one shouldn't have to excuse bad musicianship on that account.

It all sounded so angry and uncaring, some of the most beautiful phrases in all of musice passed by with no inflection at all, in the most perfunctory manner imaginable. In the Andante (so slow every eighth-note sat in a heavily accented little world all its own) pizzicato accompaniment in the strings came out as a cluster of grace notes followed by a thud, while wind players practiced vibrato. And there was a funny thing about the Scherzo — it sounded like Tchaikowsky, which for me it never had before. I was made to see some very slight resemblances in the writing, but not enough to justify playing Brahms in a way that brings him down to that level.

Robert Starer's Symphony No. 3 was written in 1969, but is composed of elements not many of which I associate with music quite that recent, but of a slightly older vintage. The form of the piece and the instrumentation are standard, except for a slightly enlarged percussion section and two extra piccolos, and Starer asks nothing unusual from his players. The music isn't anything earthshaking, all sounds a bit familiar, but still manages easily to hold one's attention. A couple of spots I found particularly appealing: a few bars of something that sounded vaguely like a sort of crippled Latin dance numbers; and then the end of the Presto, which piles up and repeats figures forever. The conductor is actually allowed to keep this going as long as his sanity will allow, and William Steinberg happily had good sense about it.

The Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra by Benjamin Lees is an interesting piece mostly for its odd combination of sounds. The listener is constantly required to make quick and drastic transitions, to "reprogram" his ears from fatly scored orchestral passages to solo quartet (a strain to hear sometimes) and back, etc. And it strikes me as not having been done too well if listening is so difficult that way. Also, the material used is not always terribly exciting, and occasionally gets to be irritatingly repetitious.

However, mediocre pieces unheard before, even such pieces played sloppily, are infinitely more enjoyable than great music played badly, and for this reason I was happy enough to hear the Starer and the Lees. But certain old standard pieces of great music should be banned from the repertoire until conductors and orchestras have learned to have feelings about them again.

Steinberg Conducts Boston Symphony in Works of Starer and Lees

By HARRY NEVILLE

When a composer or a program annotator feels obliged to issue a disclaimer in connection with a piece of music, more often than not the disclaimer arouses rather than allays suspicion. Thus, when Robert Starer announced in the program booklet of yesterday's Boston Symphony concert that in the second movement of his 1969 Symphony he had "deliberately sought out the rhythmic simplicity and directness which the young look for," one wondered if his statement was an apology for rhythmic monotony.

And when Winthrop Sargeant was quoted as having said of Benjamin Lees' Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra that it was not old-fashioned or academic but "right in the mainstream of valid contemporary music," one immediately suspected that the Concerto would turn out to be rather anemic and inconsequential.

ONE'S SUSPCIONS were justified in both cases. A composer's wish to write music accessible to a broad range of people is admirable. But if the attempt results in something that everyone understands but hardly anyone cares about, then it doesn't matter what his intentions were. This listener's applause-meter isn't infallible, but I couldn't detect any difference at all yesterday between the way the audience reacted to these works and the way the audience reacted last year to one of Stockhausen's scores.

Starer is a 47-year-old Viennese-born composer who has lived in this country since 1947. He is the winner of an impressive number of prizes and awards, and several of his works have been performed by William Steinberg, the dedicatee of the Third Symphony and the person who conducted its performance yesterday.

The work is in four movements, each of which roughly corresponds in mood to its counterpart in traditional notions of statement, development and recapitulation, and the result is a work that coheres easily and nicely — perhaps a bit too much so.

There is an effective use of cluster harmonies, there are pleasant melodies, and the orchestration is highly professional. I only wish that at some point the work rose above the level of good craftsmanship and presented something gripping and absorbing.

MUCH THE SAME KIND OF comment could be of the Lees Concerto. Again the writing is highly competent, the musical ideas are moderately attractive, but the work doesn't really seem to go anywhere. The soloists were the Boston Symphony String Quartet — Jsoeph Silverstein, Max Hobart, Burton Fine, Jules Eskin — and I thought they made as much as possible out of what was essentially a thankless task.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony concluded the concert. The performance could have used lots of tidying-up of details, but it gave pleasure nevertheless. The clarinet and flute solos were especially well played, and there was a great deal of warmth in the string tone. Steinberg chose what seemed to this listener a dangerously slow pace for the Andante, but for the most part he brought it off.

THE BOSTON HERALD Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 360,961
DEC 11 1971
New England Newsclip

'Last Picture Show' Holds for 5th Week

"The Last Picture Show," the new film by Peter Bogdanovich, holds over for a fifth week at Loew's Abbey Cinema I, in Boston with special midnight shows every Friday and Saturday evenings. "The Last Picture Show," stars Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, Ellen Burstyn, Ben Johnson, Cloris Leachman, and Clu Gulager and introduces top fashion model Cybill Shepherd.

The film is about a time and place just 20 years gone but seemingly light-years away. It's about growing up in a town running down, where being free means getting out.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
DEC 13 1971
New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: STARER AND LEES

Mr. Steinberg put in his bi-monthly appearance at Symphony Hall and gave us Robert Starer's Symphony No. 3, Benjamin Lees' Concerto for string quartet and orchestra and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

The Starer and Lees pieces superficially contained a certain number of things in common: Each was having its first performance here. Both were highly propulsive and had sufficient textural similarity to make a listener attend with some care if he were adequately to sort them out from each other on a back-to-back playing. Both were skilful and pleasantly assimilated exercises in eclecticism. The composers were both born on January 8, 1924.

There the easy comparison ends. Starer's Symphony is classic in its four movement construction. As the composer himself puts it, it retains the principle of statement of ideas, development, transformed restatement and conclusion, but not in its key relations. After a nod, or rather a hand-shake, to Bartok in the opening movement, the symphony settles down in the manner, as someone later reminded me, of Honegger in its complex employment of the impressionists's vocabulary to essentially rhythmic and linear ends. The work was dedicated to Mr. Steinberg, who introduced it in Pittsburgh, and the composer was on hand to take a bow.

Lees is a resourceful fellow who writes in the direct line of Bartok and mid-Stravinsky. A concerto for string quartet and orchestra is not a garden variety combination, but Lees often works with an unusual assemblage. This last year, for example, saw the premiere in London of his "Medea of Corinth", for four voices, wind quintet and tympani, based on the play of Robinson Jeffers, and he is presently collaborating with E. B. White on the "Trumpet of the Swan", for narrator and orchestra for presentation at Philadelphia Youth Concerts very shortly.

It would be interesting to hear how these other combinations work out, for the instant one did not quite wash. Various commentators have said of the Concerto for Quartet and Orchestra that it is not a concerto grosso with contrasting of the instrumentalists in the concert group with the orchestra, but rather an employment of the quartet as the soloist per se. To this listener, however, the results came out strictly in the familiar concerto grosso mode; but the quartet was handicapped by not very noticeable contrasts in the harmonic texture and in any case was out-gunned by the large and full orchestra. Mayhap a chamber orchestra would have made for a more effective combination. The capable performers were the Boston Symphony String Quartet, Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, 'cello.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony is one of those masterpieces that either you approach reverentially or else you stay home. It is played much too often to expect that every performance will provide an experience, but a reasonably solid rendition, even though done at less than white heat, still can leave most hearers much moved. This is the kind of performance Mr. Steinberg provided. One might have wished for more motion in the Andante and less motion in the Scherzo, or stronger underlinings of the moments of poignancy and nobility, but such things are highly arguable questions of preference. Register one, then, who did leave the hall much moved.

The young Italian conductor, Aldo Ceccato is this week's guest. His program includes Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto, the first Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Mendelssohn's First Symphony and Dvorak's Symphony "from the New World".

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500
DEC 16 1971
New England

BSO's Starer, Lees

By Louis Snyder

Two composers, both born in different parts of the world on Jan. 8, 1924, had their works performed by the Boston Symphony under William Steinberg in weekend concerts at Symphony Hall. There were Boston premieres of Robert Starer's Symphony No. 3 (1969)—dedicated to Mr. Steinberg—and of the Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra by Benjamin Lees. Brahms's Fourth Symphony (E minor) filled the second half of the program.

Works by both Mr. Starer and Mr. Lees have been played before by the orchestra, but never consecutively on the same occasion, and one might question the wisdom of this programming decision. Mr. Starer's "Symphony" (so called, according to the composer's program note, in its original sense of "concord of sound," rather than in its compositional form) is rather diffuse in purpose and appeal to the ear. One is intrigued, but not held by Mr. Starer's facile writing for congenial combinations of instruments, and focus seems lacking.

The Lees Concerto, on the other hand, has its form to keep it warm. An orchestral quartet (Joseph Silvertein, Max Hobart, Burton Fine, and Jules Eskin) in dialogue with the main body of musicians provides a point of departure for the first-time listener, and the subsequent thematic material is distinguishable and interesting. It generates a feeling of native energy and drive.

Placed side by side with a familiar work more vivid in contrast, the Starer and the Lees pieces would have made stronger individual impressions, but as program-mates each detracted markedly from the full impact of the other.

Both composers were present to hear their own and one another's performances, and to share with Mr. Steinberg, the orchestra, and the BSO Quartet the kind of cordial applause that is hardly the gauge of any composition's staying power.

On Friday at least, the Brahms gathered momentum as it went along, after a slip here or there. But there were no slips in the soaring flute passage in the concluding Allegro, conveyed with silvery sound by Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
DEC 11 1971
New England Newscli

BSO performs Brahms's 4th

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

"Vast frescoes dashed off with loathing," a phrase spoken by one of Samuel Beckett's characters, describes better than anything I can find in my head the tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's playing of the fourth Brahms Symphony yesterday afternoon. They've all played the piece countless times before and at this point are probably bored silly with it, but one shouldn't have to excuse bad musicianship on that account.

It all sounded so angry and uncaring, some of the most beautiful phrases in all of musice passed by with no inflection at all, in the most perfunctory manner imaginable. In the Andante (so slow every eighth-note sat in a heavily accented little world all its own) pizzicato accompaniment in the strings came out as a cluster of grace notes followed by a thud, while wind players practiced vibrato. And there was a funny thing about the Scherzo — it sounded like Tchaikowsky, which for me it never had before. I was made to see some very slight resemblances in the writing, but not enough to justify playing Brahms in a way that brings him down to that level.

Robert Starer's Symphony No. 3 was written in 1969, but is composed of elements not many of which I associate with music quite that recent, but of a slightly older vintage. The form of the piece and the instrumentation are standard, except for a slightly enlarged percussion section and two extra piccolos, and Starer asks nothing unusual from his players. The music isn't anything earthshaking, all sounds a bit familiar, but still manages easily to hold one's attention. A couple of spots I found particularly appealing: a few bars of something that sounded vaguely like a sort of crippled Latin dance numbers; and then the end of the Presto, which piles up and repeats figures forever. The conductor is actually allowed to keep this going as long as his sanity will allow, and William Steinberg happily had good sense about it.

The Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra by Benjamin Lees is an interesting piece mostly for its odd combination of sounds. The listener is constantly required to make quick and drastic transitions, to "reprogram" his ears from fatly scored orchestral passages to solo quartet (a strain to hear sometimes) and back, etc. And it strikes me as not having been done too well if listening is so difficult that way. Also, the material used is not always terribly exciting, and occasionally gets to be irritatingly repetitious.

However, mediocre pieces unheard before, even such pieces played sloppily, are infinitely more enjoyable than great music played badly, and for this reason I was happy enough to hear the Starer and the Lees. But certain old standard pieces of great music should be banned from the repertoire until conductors and orchestras have learned to have feelings about them again.

TIMES-GAZETTE
WARREN, R. I.
W. 2,825

DEC 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Holiday Goings-On

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 31)

Concerts and Caroling

Sunday, Dec. 12

"The Messiah" performed by the University of RI Chorus and Orchestra is under the direction of War Abusamra. The performance begins at 4 pm in the Keeney Gymnasium, with a repeat Monday in Edwards Hall at 7:30 pm.

Even Song is the name of a concert of organ and choral music at Emmanuel Methodist Church, Newport, at 5:30 pm. Refreshments will be served.

A Festival of Carols and Lessons, at St Mary's Church, Newport, will start at 7:30 pm.

Salve Regina College Glee Club Christmas Concert will be in the Great Hall at Ochre Court, Newport, at 8 pm.

Monday, Dec. 13

Choral Concert with string accompaniment, especially suitable for children, begins at Vernon Court auditorium, Ledge Road, Newport, at 7 pm.

Tuesday, Dec. 14

The Newport Harbor Bells, a local hand bell performing group, will give a concert of bells and voices at the Newport Performing Arts Center, Freebody Street, Newport, at 8 pm. Familiar and lesser known carols are scheduled.

Choral concert by the Middletown High School chorus is sponsored by the Ellery DAR in Emmanuel Church at 2 pm.

Thursday, Dec. 16

Corelli's Christmas Concerto Grosso in G Minor is on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence, which begins at 8:30 pm. Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's New World Symphony will also be performed.

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
W. 4,093

DEC 9 1971 New England Newsclip

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.
W. 4,600

DEC 10 1971 New England Newsclip

SAKONNET TIMES
PORTSMOUTH, R. I.
W. 3,737

DEC 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Concerts and Caroling

Thursday, Dec. 16

Corelli's Christmas Concerto Grosso in G Minor is on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence, which begins at 8:30 pm. Mendelssohn's Symphony. No. 1 and Dvorak's New World Symphony will also be performed.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117

DEC 17 1971 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,211

DEC 12 1971 New England Newsclip

ITALIAN conductor Aldo Ceccato makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night in Veterans Auditorium.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127

DEC 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony 'Spellbinds'

Young Italian Maestro Given Standing Ovation

Aldo Ceccato, young Italian conductor, was the chief enchanter with a magic wand who led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the capacity audience, into a fairyland of musical spellbinding Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

Opening with Corelli's "Concerto Grosso in G-Minor, (Christmas)" played by Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, and Jules Eskin, cello, in trio with Robert Levin, harpsichordist, playing a continuo with a ripieno (small group) of strings, the concerto set the Christmas mood. It was a work that enchanted with contrasts of moods, now somber, now bright, in tunes that were hymns, prayers, carols and chorales that added up to an oratorio that seemed as though a celestial choir were singing.

Then Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 1 in C-Minor" deepend the enchantment with beguiling touches of misty moonlight, stardust flashes of arpeggios, trills and grupettos as though painted with a rainbow brush with indescribable coloring. The scherzo movement with its woodwind eloquence in flute, oboe and clarinet, sparkled, glowed and flared like the merry lights of Christmas.

The closing work, Dvorak's New World "Symphony No. 9 in E-Minor" carried Maestro Ceccato and the orchestra to the heart of esoteric communication. The adagio opening statement brought images of vast plains and craggy mountains, deserts and cascading torrents, field of golden grain and whispering corn, lazy rivers and moss-draped bayous. It changed to a happy allegro remindful of the songs of work in the fields and forests, the river boats and rails.

Then the beautiful largo movement on that beloved "Going home" theme with the full orchestra echoing and enlarging the shimmering, haunting solo on the English horn, played by Laurence Thorstenberg, changed that ebony instrument into a wand of gold.

The scherzo movement brought visions and sounds of the mocking bird and the whistle of a farm boy herding home the cows for milking at sunset, the merriment of the state fair, the barn dance and the husking bee. And the finale, allegro con fuoco, gathered all these moods, added the sleigh ride, the fish fry, the rain dance and the camp meeting and combined these evocative tonal descriptions in a paeon of praise to the Land of the Free.

Maestro Ceccato and the orchestra were given a standing ovation.

C.H.L.

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Orchestra Performs at Auditorium

By EDWIN SAFFORD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came in three different sizes last night at Veterans auditorium, each correct for the choices of music played. And for conductor there was Aldo Ceccato, making his debut appearance with the orchestra, whose podium manner also showed variety according to the works he programmed.

To begin there was the Corelli "Christmas Concerto," followed by Mendelssohn's first symphony. At the close the Dvorak "New World" symphony was performed.

For the Corelli a chamber orchestra of 12 was used, with a concertino comprised of violinists Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart and cellist Jules Eskin, the harpsichord continuo played by Robert Levin.

For several years the Bostonians have had a chamber ensemble drawn from various of its sections and it has been a worthy group in whatever makeup. This was a plus factor toward bringing elegance to Corelli's concerto grosso. Moreover Ceccato exacted a bite in animated passages and a lovely warmth in those of a songful nature.

From the unfussy style with which he approached that opening piece he began to expand in the Mendelssohn. The work of a 15-year-old, not actually his first effort in the form and composed even before his overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," it presented revealing facets of his development.

The kid had a sharp ear for music of his own time. He was a modernist, no less, although roots in the past were strong enough. But the symphony could be identified with the early romantic period and nothing else, even with its third, minuetto movement.

Too, it was refreshing to hear instead of the usual "Scotch," "Italian" or "Reformation" symphonies, for its genius and its individuality. The orchestra did not have it entirely under its fingers at every point, violins showing roughness particularly, and Ceccato was unable to keep it from sounding piecework at all times.

Since this was his first concert there may not have been sufficient rehearsal. And when it came to the Dvorak, where the orchestra was filled out to late 19th century size, that lack was still more apparent.

In the late romantic score the conductor's temperament was more visible, more furioso in climaxes, more swooping in indicating feeling. Yet this surface detail did not prevent late wind entrance during the first movement and a general raggedness of strings throughout three of the four movements heard.

The concert was the final one in the orchestra's Providence series of the season.

THE RICHMOND NEWS LEADER
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 120,054

SEP 25 1971

1971-72 Season Announced By Virginia Music Society

Boston and Philadelphia, Tokyo and Cadiz, these are the origins of the performers included in the 1971-72 season of the Virginia Music Society.

The Society sponsors four concerts annually which are held in the Virginia Museum Theater. As a change from past years, all of the events this year will be held on Sunday afternoons at 4:00.

The season wll open Oct. 31 with the appearance of the Woodwind Quintet of the Boston Symphony Playes. Consisting of the principal woodwind soloists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Quintet has won strong acclaim for its performances both in this country and on European tours.

The second group of the season is a young ensemble, only two years old, but one that has already won International plaudits. The Tokyo String Quartet, composed of recent graduates of Japan's esteemed Toho School, captured the coveted first prize at the 1970 Munich International Competition. The Quartet has also received top prize at the Coleman Chamber Music Competition in Los Angeles and the Young Concert Artists Competition in New York.

The Philadephia Composers' Forum moves into Richmond for a week-long residency program co-sponsored by the Music Society and the Music Department of Virginia Commonwealth University, the highlight of which will be their performance at the Museum Theatre on Jan. 16. The ensemble will perform a specially-commissioned work by resident composer George Crumb.

For the final event of the season, the Museum Theatre stage will come alive the fiery rhythms of the Flamenco as played by one of Spain's most honored guitarists, Francisco Espinosa. A master of both classiical and Falmenco guitars, Espinosa's concert should prove one of the most popular of the season.

Tickets for the Music Society series are available through the Museum Theatre box office. For reservations, or additional information, call 770-6331.

SUNDAY POST
LYNN, MASS.
S. 15,000

NOV 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Two Members of Boston Symphony Will Be Soloists at Lynn Concert

Marylou Speaker, violin, and Lawrence Wolfe, double bass, will be the soloists at the Fall Concert of the North Shore Philharmonic Orchestra in its 24th season at the Lynn City Hall Memorial Auditorium next Sunday at 7:30 p.m. Rolland Tapley is the conductor.

The soloists, both members of the Boston Symphony, will play the Grand Duo Concertante for solo violin and double bass by Bottecini. The program includes music by Verdi, Wagner, Dvorak, Strauss, and the Selection from "No, No Nanette" by Youmans.

Miss Speaker, a native of Oregon, began the study of the violin at seven and when ten was the youngest member of the Portland, Ore., Junior Symphony. She took her degree at the New England Conservatory of Music and has concertized extensively throughout the country. Lawrence Wolfe who comes from Hingham was a principal in the Greater Boston Youth Symphony and graduated from the New England Conservatory of Music. He gave a concert in Carnegie Hall last winter.

Tickets may be obtained from members of the orchestra, at Mary Brennan's Card Shop, Lynn, from E. W. Rhodes, president, Lynn, or from members of the co-sponsor of the concert, Friends of St. Mary's School, Lynn, for which Mrs. John W. Hingston is president.

REFORMER
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
D. 8,000

DEC 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Chamber Music Concert Offered

A chamber music concert will be presented by the Brattleboro Music Center on Sunday at 3:30 p.m., at All Souls Church in West Brattleboro. The artists will be Mary Burgess, mezzo-soprano; David Golub, piano, and Harold Wright, clarinet.

The concert will include songs by Schubert, Brahms and Mahler; Six German songs for voice, clarinet and piano by Ludwig Spohr; and Robert Schumann's Frauenliebe und Leben, Op. 42.

Mary Burgess is familiar to Brattleboro audiences for her frequent participation in Music Center Festivals, and as soloist on the BMC recording of Bach's Cantata 30. Miss Burgess has sung with the New York City Opera, the Santa Fe Opera and at the Lincoln Center summer Mozart festivals, and has attended the Aspen, Grand Teton and Marlboro Music Festivals.

David Golub has appeared as soloist with the Dallas Symphony and has participated in chamber music performances at Saratoga Springs and Marlboro Music Festivals. A student of Beveridge Webster at the Juilliard School, Mr. Golub has also performed with the Juilliard Orchestra in New York and has conducted a chamber orchestra at Carnegie Recital Hall. Currently teaching at Marlboro College, he will participate in a filmed recital for National Educational Television this winter, and in the spring will be part of a "Music from Marlboro" tour to the West Coast.

Harold Wright is the first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. For many years the first clarinet of the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington, Mr. Wright has attended the Casals Festival in Puerto Rico and the Marlboro Music Festival and has played with such ensembles as the Budapest String Quartet, the Juilliard Quartet and the Guarneri Quartet.

Tickets for Sunday's concert may be reserved by calling the Brattleboro Music Center at 254-8122, or purchased at the door.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032

OCT 15 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO members to perform at services for Prof. Smith

Musicians of Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Sunday at 3 p.m. in Brown Hall of New England Conservatory of Music during memorial services for Warren Storey Smith, 86, teacher, composer, author and music critic who died Wednesday.

A potent force in the musical life of Boston for over 60 years, he was music critic for the Boston Post for three decades. At the time of his death, Mr. Smith was professor emeritus at New England Conservatory of Music.

As a critic he regarded himself as a member of the audience rather than as a hanging judge. He was at home in a news room but equally at home at the piano or in the conductor's green room of a symphony hall.

On radio's Metropolitan Opera Quiz where he often appeared with Owen Downs, Boris Goldovsky, Nicholas Slonimsky and other musical celebrities, his erudition was astonishing.

In recent years he was a fixture at concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra where the management had given him an honorary seat in recognition of his service to music.

He leaves his wife, Rhodora (Buckle), a singer and also a teacher with whom he often gave Conservatory recitals.

OLD COLONY MEMORIAL
PLYMOUTH, MASS.
W. 9,500

APR 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Installation next Sunday

REV. HORACE L. BACHELDER

At 7 p.m. in the First Parish Church, Town Square, prior to the installation service of Horace L. Bachelder, the Spooner Fund will provide special music by a trio composed of Mary Lou Speaker, violinist, Joel Moerschell, cellist, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Margaret Bachelder, pianist, playing "Trio in D Major, Opus 49" by Mendelssohn.

The installation service will start at 7:30 with the following program:

Processional Hymn No. 369. Invocation and Lord's Prayer by Rev. Edwin T. Anthony of the Church of the Pilgrimage, Plymouth. First Lesson by Dr. George J. Spencer, Department of the Ministry, U.U.A. Boston. Installation Sermon by Rev. Peter J. Gomes, Assistant Minister, Memorial Church, Harvard University. Anthem, "The Heavens are Telling" from "The Creator" by Hayden.

The Act of Installation by Spencer H. Brewster, Chairman of the Parish Committee. Acceptance of Minister. Prayer of Installation, Rev. Charles C. Forman, Department of Religion, Wheaton College. Charge To the Minister, Rev. Donald D. Marcy, Minister First Parish, Kingston. Anthem, "How Lovely Is Thy Dwelling Place" by Brahms.

Greeting from Ballou-Channing District, Rev. Wallace Bush, Executive Secretary. Welcome to The Community, Rev. Edwin T. Anthony. Greetings from American Unitarian Association, Dr. George J. Spencer. Benediction, Rev. Horace L. Bachelder. Recessional Hymn, "We Come Together on Our Way" written by the Rev. and Mrs. Horace Bachelder.

The public is cordially invited to attend the service and everyone is invited to attend an informal reception in Kendall Hall following the service.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

APR 28 1972 New England Newsclip

IN REHEARSAL — Soloists with the Framingham Symphony Orchestra, who will be performing in concert with the orchestra at Framingham South High School Auditorium, Flagg Drive, Framingham, Sunday at 3 p.m. include tenor David Dusing (center) and Charles Yancich, (right), first horn for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At left is the conductor, Alfred L. Schnedier. (News Photo by Brian Fullington)

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 4 1971 New England Newsclip

* * *

On Sunday, Dec. 5, Temple Beth El will present a Symphonic Concert featuring the Beth El Choral Society and the Salem Repertory Orchestra under the direction of guest conductor Alfred Schneider, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Marjory Kransberg of Beverly will appear as violin solist.

Included in the concert program will be Sholom Secunda's oratorio, "If Not Higher", with tenor soloist Cantor Israel J. Barzok of Fall River, baritone soloist Cantor Morton Shanok of Temple Beth El, and narrator Mary Wolfman, president of the Jewish Music Forum of Boston. Committee chairmen for the event are Mrs. Arthur Feldman, general chairman; Mrs. David Klaiman, co-chairman; Mrs. Louis Hotz, ticket chairman; Mrs. Sidney Strome, ticket co-chairman; Macklin Kleiman, treasurer, Mrs. Carl Hooker and Mrs. Howard Frisch, co-chairmen of hostesses and ushers, Herbert Schultz; advisor, Richard Hillman; and Mrs. Morton Shanok, publicity. Tickets may be obtained from members of the Beth El Choral Society or from the committee.

THE RICHMOND NEWS LEADER
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 120,654

SEP 25 1971

1971-72 Season Announced By Virginia Music Society

Boston and Philadelphia, Tokyo and Cadiz, these are the origins of the performers included in the 1971-72 season of the Virginia Music Society.

The Society sponsors four concerts annually which are held in the Virginia Museum Theater. As a change from past years, all of the events this year will be held on Sunday afternoons at 4:00.

The season wll open Oct. 31 with the appearance of the Woodwind Quintet of the Boston Symphony Playes. Consisting of the principal woodwind soloists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Quintet has won strong acclaim for its performances both in this country and on European tours.

The second group of the season is a young ensemble, only two years old, but one that has already won International plaudits. The Tokyo String Quartet, composed of recent graduates of Japan's esteemed Toho School, captured the coveted first prize at the 1970 Munich International Competition. The Quartet has also received top prize at the Coleman Chamber Music Competition in Los Angeles and the Young Concert Artists Competition in New York.

The Philadephia Composers' Forum moves into Richmond for a week-long residency program co-sponsored by the Music Society and the Music Department of Virginia Commonwealth University, the highlight of which will be their performance at the Museum Theatre on Jan. 16. The ensemble will perform a specially-commissioned work by resident composer George Crumb.

For the final event of the season, the Museum Theatre stage will come alive the fiery rhythms of the Flamenco as played by one of Spain's most honored guitarists, Francisco Espinosa. A master of both classiical and Falmenco guitars, Espinosa's concert should prove one of the most popular of the season.

Tickets for the Music Society series are available through the Museum Theatre box office. For reservations, or additional information, call 770-6331.

SUNDAY POST
LYNN, MASS.
S. 15,000

NOV 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Two Members of Boston Symphony Will Be Soloists at Lynn Concert

Marylou Speaker, violin, and Lawrence Wolfe, double bass, will be the soloists at the Fall Concert of the North Shore Philharmonic Orchestra in its 24th season at the Lynn City Hall Memorial Auditorium next Sunday at 7:30 p.m. Rolland Tapley is the conductor.

The soloists, both members of the Boston Symphony, will play the Grand Duo Concertante for solo violin and double bass by Bottecini. The program includes music by Verdi, Wagner, Dvorak, Strauss, and the Selection from "No, No Nanette" by Youmans.

Miss Speaker, a native of Oregon, began the study of the violin at seven and when ten was the youngest member of the Portland, Ore., Junior Symphony. She took her degree at the New England Conservatory of Music and has concertized extensively throughout the country. Lawrence Wolfe who comes from Hingham was a principal in the Greater Boston Youth Symphony and graduated from the New England Conservatory of Music. He gave a concert in Carnegie Hall last winter.

Tickets may be obtained from members of the orchestra, at Mary Brennan's Card Shop, Lynn, from E. W. Rhodes, president, Lynn, or from members of the co-sponsor of the concert, Friends of St. Mary's School, Lynn, for which Mrs. John W. Hingston is president.

OLD COLONY
MEMORIAL
PLYMOUTH, MASS.
W. 9,500

APR 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Installation next Sunday

REV. HORACE L. BACHELDER

At 7 p.m. in the First Parish Church, Town Square, prior to the installation service of Horace L. Bachelder, the Spooner Fund will provide special music by a trio composed of Mary Lou Speaker, violinist, Joel Moerschell, cellist, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Margaret Bachelder, pianist, playing "Trio in D Major, Opus 49" by Mendelssohn.

The installation service will start at 7:30 with the following program:

Processional Hymn No. 369. Invocation and Lord's Prayer by Rev. Edwin T. Anthony of the Church of the Pilgrimage, Plymouth. First Lesson by Dr. George J. Spencer, Department of the Ministry, U.U.A. Boston. Installation Sermon by Rev. Peter J. Gomes, Assistant Minister, Memorial Church, Harvard University. Anthem, "The Heavens are Telling" from "The Creator" by Hayden.

The Act of Installation by Spencer H. Brewster, Chairman of the Parish Committee. Acceptance of Minister. Prayer of Installation, Rev. Charles C. Forman, Department of Religion, Wheaton College. Charge To the Minister, Rev. Donald D. Marcy, Minister First Parish, Kingston. Anthem, "How Lovely Is Thy Dwelling Place" by Brahms.

Greeting from Ballou-Channing District, Rev. Wallace Bush, Executive Secretary. Welcome to The Community, Rev. Edwin T. Anthony. Greetings from American Unitarian Association, Dr. George J. Spencer. Benediction, Rev. Horace L. Bachelder. Recessional Hymn, "We Come Together on Our Way" written by the Rev. and Mrs. Horace Bachelder.

The public is cordially invited to attend the service and everyone is invited to attend an informal reception in Kendall Hall following the service.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

APR 28 1972 New England Newsclip

IN REHEARSAL — Soloists with the Framingham Symphony Orchestra, who will be performing in concert with the orchestra at Framingham South High School Auditorium, Flagg Drive, Framingham, Sunday at 3 p.m. include tenor David Dusing (center) and Charles Yancich, (right), first horn for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At left is the conductor, Alfred L. Schnedier. (News Photo by Brian Fullington)

REFORMER
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
D. 8,000

DEC 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Chamber Music Concert Offered

A chamber music concert will be presented by the Brattleboro Music Center on Sunday at 3:30 p.m., at All Souls Church in West Brattleboro. The artists will be Mary Burgess, mezzo-soprano; David Golub, piano, and Harold Wright, clarinet.

The concert will include songs by Schubert, Brahms and Mahler; Six German songs for voice, clarinet and piano by Ludwig Spohr; and Robert Schumann's Frauenliebe und Leben, Op. 42.

Mary Burgess is familiar to Brattleboro audiences for her frequent participation in Music Center Festivals, and as soloist on the BMC recording of Bach's Cantata 30. Miss Burgess has sung with the New York City Opera, the Santa Fe Opera and at the Lincoln Center summer Mozart festivals, and has attended the Aspen, Grand Teton and Marlboro Music Festivals.

David Golub has appeared as soloist with the Dallas Symphony and has participated in chamber music performances at Saratoga Springs and Marlboro Music Festivals. A student of Beveridge Webster at the Juilliard School, Mr. Golub has also performed with the Juilliard Orchestra in New York and has conducted a chamber orchestra at Carnegie Recital Hall. Currently teaching at Marlboro College, he will participate in a filmed recital for National Educational Television this winter, and in the spring will be part of a "Music from Marlboro" tour to the West Coast.

Harold Wright is the first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. For many years the first clarinet of the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington, Mr. Wright has attended the Casals Festival in Puerto Rico and the Marlboro Music Festival and has played with such ensembles as the Budapest String Quartet, the Juilliard Quartet and the Guarneri Quartet.

Tickets for Sunday's concert may be reserved by calling the Brattleboro Music Center at 254-8122, or purchased at the door.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 4 1971 New England Newsclip

* * *

On Sunday, Dec. 5, Temple Beth El will present a Symphonic Concert featuring the Beth El Choral Society and the Salem Repertory Orchestra under the direction of guest conductor Alfred Schneider, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Marjory Kransberg of Beverly will appear as violin solist.

Included in the concert program will be Sholom Secunda's oratorio, "If Not Higher", with tenor soloist Cantor Israel J. Barzok of Fall River, baritone soloist Cantor Morton Shanok of Temple Beth El, and narrater Mary Wolfman, president of the Jewish Music Forum of Boston. Committee chairmen for the event are Mrs. Arthur Feldman, general chairman; Mrs. David Klaiman, co-chairman; Mrs. Louis Hotz, ticket chairman; Mrs. Sidney Strome, ticket co-chairman; Macklin Kleiman, treasurer, Mrs. Carl Hooker and Mrs. Howard Frisch, co-chairmen of hostesses and ushers, Herbert Schultz; advisor, Richard Hillman; and Mrs. Morton Shanok, publicity. Tickets may be obtained from members of the Beth El Choral Society or from the committee.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)

OCT 15 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO members to perform at services for Prof. Smith

Musicians of Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Sunday at 3 p.m. in Brown Hall of New England Conservatory of Music during memorial services for Warren Storey Smith, 86, teacher, composer, author and music critic who died Wednesday.

A potent force in the musical life of Boston for over 60 years, he was music critic for the Boston Post for three decades. At the time of his death, Mr. Smith was professor emeritus at New England Conservatory of Music.

As a critic he regarded himself as a member of the audience rather than as a hanging judge. He was at home in a news room but equally at home at the piano or in the conductor's green room of a symphony hall.

On radio's Metropolitan Opera Quiz where he often appeared with Owen Downs, Boris Goldovsky, Nicholas Slonimsky and other musical celebrities, his erudition was astonishing.

In recent years he was a fixture at concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra where the management had given him an honorary seat in recognition of his service to music.

He leaves his wife, Rhodora (Buckle), a singer and also a teacher with whom he often gave Conservatory recitals.

The Collage of Contemporary Music

BY STEVE ROBINSON

Collage is a new chamber group that has formed within the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Like the B.S.O. Chamber Players, they will give concerts separate from the B.S.O. regular concerts, but, unlike the Chamber Players, they will devote themselves exclusively to 20th century music. This is an extremely rare and auspicious development.

Having arrived twenty minutes after the start of one of their rehearsals I heard a composition being practiced whose identity I knew nothing of. It was scored for flute, clarinet, soprano, percussion, violin, 'cello, contra bass and solo dancer, and, like many recent compositions for chamber ensemble, this select instrumentation was being used to build a delicate, almost transparent texture. The harmonic language was fiercely atonal, its fabric a mosaic of sudden Webernesque dynamic changes. The composer had succeeded in creating great tension and I could see the need in this piece, mercilessly packed into a dozen minutes, for a solo dancer to help express the drama.

I discovered after the rehearsal that Collage was preparing for its premiere concert works by Mario Davidovsky, George Crumb, Jacob Druckman, Ernst Krenek, Lukas Foss and Tibor Pusztai. The Pusztai was written especially for Collage and would be given its world premiere at the first concert in Amherst. It was the Pusztai composition, entitled Nocturnes, that I had heard in rehearsal.

After talking with its composer - conductor, I learned that at the actual performance the sound from the ensemble on stage was to be fed into seven speakers encircling the audience. An elaborate switching process was designed by the composer so that the sound of any instrument, or combination of instruments, could be fed into any combination of speakers at any time. Each such spatial manipulation had been carefully notated in the score and six additional musicians would be required to handle the electronics during the performance. Tibor's idea, as you can imagine, was to have the sound dancing around the hall while the performance was taking place. This, together with the composition itself, and the solo dance work of Ina Hahn, would make for a three dimensional experience. A very ambitious idea, I thought and as I talked with Tibor after the rehearsal he kept checking his watch because at any minute a technician was due to arrive to help plan the electronics of the performance.

The performance of Nocturnes one week later in Amherst was a disaster. Very simply, the elaborate switching process failed. Connections were bad, an undercurrent of hiss emanated from each speaker, and the impedance on some of the contact mikes used to pick up the instruments seemed to be wrong. Every time an attempt was make to amplify the clarinet, for example, a terrific blast shook the hall. Once or twice, a breathtaking swish of sound travelled from one end of the hall to another, giving the listener a brief idea of what was supposed to be happening. But for the most part, the entire sense of Tibor's composition was lost. Hopefully, speaker music will become more and more standard in years to come and a piece such as Tibor Pusztia's Nocturnes will be tried again and again until it works.

Nocturnes certainly stood out on this program of contemporary music, but not far behind was Valentine for Solo Contrabass (1969) by Jacob Druckman. According to the composer, "this work demands that the player attack the instrument with bow, tympani sticks, as both hands alternate percussive tapping on the body of the instrument with pizzicato harmonics, and the voice sustains tones, signs counterpoint and punctates accents." In other words, Druckman is out to prove that the string bass is more than an overgrown 'cello forever banished to the rear of the orchestra to double the 'cello part in tutti passages. In his hands, it became a powerful solo instrument.

The first half of the program also included the Three Madrigals for Soprano, Vibraphone and Contrabass (1965) by George Crumb. The Madrigals are based on extracts from poems of Federico Garcia Lorca and is a relaxed, loosly constructed composition in three sections. For the most part, the contrabass and vibraphone serve to embellish the vocal part sung sensuously by Joan Heller. It is very much a random compostion, more a study in timbre than in form. One unusual technique employed by Druckman is a section for vibraphone sticks to be played on the bass strings while the bassist plays glissandos over the finger board.

After intermission, Collage presented Trio for Violin, Clarinet and Piano (1946) by Ernst Krenek and Time Cycle (1960) by Lukas Foss.

The performance of the Krenel by Ronald Knudson, violin, Peter Hadcock, clarinet, and Christopher Kies, piano, was quite pleasing, although I was bored by the work itself. It sounded like a cross between Schoenberg and Darius Milaud, as if the composer couldn't make up his mind whether to use a strict row technique of writing, or to simply meander about one tonality. It was the earliest work on the program and I couldn't quite figure out why it had been programmed.

The concert ended with Time Cycle by Lukas Foss. This composition, first written for soprano and orchestra and later arranged for chamber ensemble by the composer, shows Foss in his first departure from a traditional style of compostion. It is the first of a series of experiments for Foss, who recently wrote "a game for four combatants" called Maps in which the composer keeps score of various musical contests at a blackboard. Collage has been working on this music since last summer at Tanglewood and nowhere was this long preparation more evident than in this final work. It was given a clear, extremely accurate performance by Joan Heller, soprano; Peter Hadcock, clarinet; Ronald Feldman, 'cello; and Christopher Kies, piano and celesta. They played with the authority and confidence that is normally expected from a group which has been together for many years.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

DEC 13 1971 New England Newscli

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

OCT 28 1971 New England Newscli

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 500,118 SUN. 657,560

APR 11 1972 By Kelles

Underattended 'Renaissance'

By Joan Reinthaler

They gave a Renaissance at Georgetown University Sunday and almost nobody came. It was the opening concert in the university's "Renaissance II" week of music, their second annual such affair. The performers were a contemporary chamber group called "Collage" mostly from the Boston Symphony, and the program they brought with them was of unusual interest and superbly performed. What a pity that only about 15 people were in the audience.

Stealing the show, as his music has done so often in concerts here recently, was George Crumb's "3 Madrigals for Soprano, Vibraphone and Contrabass." Written in 1965, it is part of a series Crumb has written for soprano on Lorca texts. It is characterized by the delicacy that makes all his music so special, and by consuming concern with sounds for themselves. Every coincidence of instrumental sounds is an event carefully gauged and tempered. To rearrange or reorchestrate any of Crumb's music would be unthinkable.

Soprano John Heller, bass player Laurence Wolfe, and percussionist Frank Epstein performed it beautifully. Miss Heller's is a small but absolutely accurate voice and she uses it intelligently and with ease.

In "Time Cycle" Lucas Foss works with some of the same premises Crumb does. He is concerned with pure sound and he handles it well, with a heavier hand, perhaps, than Crumb's and with larger gestures. It is a fine set and the ensemble, particularly Epstein's percussion, played it sensitively.

Wolfe had to be an athlete as well as a musician in Druckman's mysteriously named "Valentine" for solo Contrabass. With drum stick in hand, he walloped the bass, plucked its guts, grunted and hissed and climed around, looking for all the world like a karate exhibit. He may well be the only black-belt bass player going today. If you an just listen and not look, Druckman has constructed interesting sound patterns.

In Davidovsky's "Synchronism no. 3" for cello and tape, cellist Paul Feldman seemed to find togetherness with the tape easy to accomplish. The tape provides promarily percussion sounds while the cello plays it pretty straight. With the speaker placed just behind the cello, there was a greater unity of sound than often occurs when the speaker is more remote.

Flutist Paul Fried and pianist Christopher Kies gave a spirited performance of Poulenc's delightful Flute Sonata, and a comfortably contrapuntal Sonata for clarinet and cello by Charles Rosen, and an uncomfortable contrived Interlute for voice and Vibraphone" by Gitta Steiner completed the program.

Fine concerts are scheduled at Georgetown every night this week. They deserve a much bigger turnout.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

OCT 11 1971 New England Newscli

Chamber Music Concerts Will Continue at UMass

AMHERST — Chamber music concerts sponsored by The University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Council will continue during the 1971-72 academic year.

The 1971-72 Chamber Series will bring to the Amherst campus three distinguished foreign ensembles and two prominent American groups. The series will begin Nov. 5 with a concert by the newly - organized Boston Symphony Orchestra College, an ensemble of young Boston Symphony members dedicated to the performance of contemporary music.

Organized by Michael Tilson Thomas, the group will feature a world premiere performance of "Nocturnes" by Tibor Pusztai, and works by Davidovsky, Druckman, Crumb, Krenek and Foss.

An unusual feature of this concert will occur earlier in the week when a pre-concert by the same group will provide an opportunity for audience and musicians to explore this unusual literature through dialogue and performance.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

OCT 7 1971 New Engla News

Chamber Music Series Slated

Chamber music concerts sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Council will continue during the 1971-72 academic year.

For the past three years, the Chamber Music Series has become one of the outstanding features of the Fine Arts Council series and has attracted an ever - increasing audience of students, townspeople and many out-of-town enthusiasts.

The 1971 - 72 Chamber Series will bring to the Amherst campus three distinguished foreign ensembles and two prominent American groups. The series will begin Nov. 5 with a concert by the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra Collage, an ensemble of young Boston Symphony members dedicated to the performance of contemporary music.

Organized by Michael Tilson Thomas, the group will feature a world premiere performance of "Nocturnes" by Tibor Pusztai, and works by Davidovsky, Druckman, Crumb, Krenek and Foss.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 303,506 SUN. 338,862

APR 10 1972 By Kelles

Collage Delights Listeners

Collage, a Contemporary Music Ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Performers: Frank Epstein, percussion; Ronald Feldman, cello; Paul Fried, flute; Joan Heller, soprano; Christopher Kies, piano; Felix Viscuglia, clarinet; Lawrence Wolfe, contrabass. Gaston Hall, Georgetown University. Program: Synchronism No. 3, for cello and tape, Davidovsky; 3 Madrigals for Soprano, Vibraphone, and Contrabas (Book I, 1965), Crumb; Sonata for Clarinet and Cello (1956), Rosen; Interlude for Voice and Vibraphone, Steiner; Valentine, for solo Contrabass, Druckman; Sonata for Flute and Piano, Poulenc; Time Cycle, Foss.

The first of a week-long series of concerts at Georgetown University took place last night in Gaston Hall, and is a hard act to follow.

The musicians were the members of "Collage," a contemporary music ensemble made up of musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with others as required by the repertoire. I have never heard contemporary music performed with better musicianship, and I have never heard it done in such a relaxed manner, not to impress, not to crusade, but only to make music.

A catalogue of the individual excellences would exceed the space allotted to this review, but I must mention the work of Joan Heller, soprano, who sang beautifully, communicated the sense of every assignment to the audience (no mean task in this repertoire), and who stayed implacably on pitch, while following melodic lines that may well have been traced by the saddle horn on a bucking bronco.

Lawrence Wolfe stopped the show with his performance of "Valentine" for solo contrabass, which had him belaboring his instrument with bow, timpani stick, and both hands, all over the instrument, emitting vocables the while. I have never seen such environmental bass playing. I don't know who wrote the lyrics.

Poulenc's flute sonata was given an exquisite performance by Paul Fried, flute, and Christopher Kies, a young pianist and composer from the Washington area.—W.M.

New Boston Ensemble In UM Concert

Bowker Auditorium on the University of Massachusetts - Amherst campus will be the site of the first performance of a new ensemble of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Collage, an organization dedicated to music of the 20th century, will make its bow Friday, Nov. 5, at 8 p.m., to open the University Fine Arts Council's 1971-72 Chamber Music Series.

Participating in this first performance will be Frank Epstein, percussion; Ronald Feldman, cello; Paul Freid flute; Peter Hadcock clarinet; Lawrence Wolfe, contrabass; Ronald Knudson violin; and Chris Kies, piano. Also, Joan Heller, soprano; Ina Hahn, dancer; and Tibor Pusztai, conductor.

The program, designed for contemporary music enthusiasts, will include the world premiere of "Nocturnes" by Pusztai, Boston composer and conductor. Other scheduled works include Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 1 for Flute and Tape;" Jacob Druckman's "Valentine for Solo Bass;" George Crumb's "Madrigal No. 1 for Soprano, Bass and Vibraphone;" Ernst Krenek's Trio for Violin, Clarinet and Piano; and Lukas Foss' "Time Cycle."

In addition to the formal concert Nov. 5, Collage will also appear at UMass Monday, Nov. 1, at 8 p.m., in a free open rehearsal which will provide an opportunity to observe a performance in the making, at Bowker Auditorium.

Reserved tickets for the concert are available from the Fine Arts Council, 125 Herter Hall.

In ensembles following the Boston Symphony Orchestra Collage will be The Berlin Philharmonic Octet, Feb. 3; The Tokyo String Quartet, Feb. 16; The Juilliard String Quartet, March 17; and The Amadeus String Quartet, April 19.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

DEC 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Italy's Ceccato spoiled by 'Superbo' musicians

Conductor eyes US orchestra

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

Aldo Ceccato, the handsome young Italian conductor who makes his debut with the BSO tomorrow afternoon, is interested in settling down — preferably in America, preferably with an American orchestra.

"I'm tired to be like a gypsy," he said Tuesday afternoon as he drank espresso in the bar of the new Colonnade Hotel. "The time has come to settle down with one instrument and to be completely devoted to it."

Ceccato has been doing the guest conductor circuit from Covent Garden to La Scala and from the New York Philharmonic to the Cleveland Orchestra, and he admits to "being spoiled by American orchestras." The musicians are "superbo" and, unlike their European counterparts, do not "believe themselves to be gods because they belong to a particular orchestra."

EVEN with the New York Philharmonic, whose members have been known to be difficult on occasion, Ceccato had "a marvelous experience." He was twice offered the position of Associate Conductor so the feelings must have been mutual.

Originally, music was something Ceccato's parents had in mind to occupy 10-year-old Aldo when he wasn't in school. "They felt I was too free and music was supposed to complete my day," he explained.

He found musical study no "particular difficulty," but didn't really consider making a serious pursuit of it for some time — at least not until he was 12. He studied piano for 10 years at the conservatory and then studied for four years in Berlin. "Half of my education is Italian, the other German," he said.

While in Germany, he found lots of occasion to conduct and had "a very rare opportunity" to do "Otello" in a german translation. (After viewing Walter Felsenstein's German film of the Verdi work, I would think Ceccato, as an Italian ,would find the experience a little bizarre as well.)

In 1964, Ceccato met the great composer-conductor Victor de Sabata who had a pronounced impact on the young conductor's career.

"A friend of mine was conducting the Milan Radio Orchestra and supposed to do de Sabata's tone poem 'Juventu.' He could not conduct and asked me to take over for him. The piece was very difficult, but I decided to take over. So, I called de Sabata at the Riviera and after studying the score for three days went to see him and to discuss the interpretation. After the performance I took a tape for him to hear."

Ceccato stopped the story at this point and would not say what the maestro's reaction was. "It's very personal and I'm proud to have for myself what de Sabata said."

The press release put out by Ceccato's publicists, however, tells all. De Sabata is reported to have said, "My boy, Toscanini premiered this work. I conducted it myself. Yours is the best performance of all, because you put into it all the characteristics of 'Juventu' — youth. You are a born conductor."

ALDO CECCATO
. . . time to settle

The relationship with de Sabata did not end there. Several years later, his daughter attended a performance of "Juventu" conducted by Ceccato in Rome. She apparently did not think as much of the interpretation as her father and went backstage to tell that to Ceccato. "After three months, we got married," the conductor added.

For several years after, he would take his scores to the Riviera to work with de Sabata. "It wasn't officially teaching, but he would give me indications and orientations. We had a thousand, thousand marvelous experiences."

If Ceccato were to become musical director of an American orchestra, he would give almost all of his time to it, but would like to spend one or two months a year guest conducting.

"It's important to do both opera and orchestral conducting," he said. "One is useful to the other. Many just opera conductors become too interested in singers and the orchestra is often under-considered. He forgets how interesting it is to get the colors of orchestral combinations, and sometimes he is not used to treating the orchestra members properly."

MERRIMACK VALLEY
ADVERTISER
TEWKSBURY, MASS
W. 24,000

DEC 15 1971 New England Newsclip

Ceccato To Debut As Symphony Conductor

Aldo Ceccato makes his debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Orchestra's tenth pair of Friday Saturday concerts, Friday afternoon, December 17, at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, December 18, at 8:30 p.m.

The concert begins with Corelli's concerto grosso in g minor, the "Christmas" concerto, followed by Mendelssohn's symphony No. 1, and Dvorak's symphony no. 9 - "New World".

A native of Milan, Aldo Ceccato began conducting in his early twenties after a promising career as a pianist.

In 1969 he won first prize in the Third International Competition of Italian Radio - television for young donductors, and in the same year made his American debut with the Chicago Lyric Opera Company, conducting I puritani.

In the fall of 1970 he conducted the New York Philharmonic and Chicago Symphony for the first time.

He has since been engaged to conduct the Cleveland, Philadelphia, and Minnesota Orchestras, and the Pittsburgh and San Francisco SYmphonies, and to return with engagements in New York and Chicago.

Ceccato Concert

Aldo Ceccato makes his debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the orchestra's tenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday afternoon, Dec. 17, at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Dec. 18, at 8:30 p.m. The concert begins with Corelli's Concerto grosso in g minor, the "Christmas" concerto, followed by Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 9, "New World."

TIMES
WALPOLE, MASS.
W. 4,000

DEC 16 1971 New England

Corelli Works a Pleasure Always

By ANN M. BETHERFIELD

It is always a pleasure to hear the works of Corelli. When these are handled with the tender grace of the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the listener's joy is redoubled, as it was at yesterday afternoon's concert.

Under the exciting direction of the young Milanese conductor Aldo Ceccato, making his BSO debut, the composer's "Christmas" Concerto grosso in G minor was performed with clarity and genuine love.

The orchestration for this piece is small, consisting of a group of strings and a "concertino" ensemble of two violins and cello. In its delicate way, it is quite demanding, and it could not have been done better.

Ceccato, an operatic conductor of sensitivity and renown, brought out the pure singing lines of this exquisite piece, particularly in the limpid "pastorale" section, and achieved perfect balance and blend between the concertino group and the other players. The harpsichord continuo was managed with just the right degree of prominence by Robert Levin.

Restrained passion was the keynote for the Corelli., but it was in the following two selections — Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor ("New World") — that the conductor's true romantic brilliance and fire emerged.

There is nothing half-hearted about the Mendelssohn; it starts tumultuously and except for the second "andante" section, burns with a turbulent flame. A hand and a soul like Ceccato's are required to make the most of it.

In the quieter movement, the woodwinds shone with their usual fine quality, while the strings, throughout, managed the swirling emotions of the score without sacrificing musical precision and crispness.

The Dvorak is an interesting work, composed by the great Bohemian artist on a visit to America. Inspired by Negro spirituals and other American folk themes, he wove them into the colorful tapestry of this work, notably in the famous largo ("Going Home") movement.

The work bursts with the feeling of a new world being born, and it is a field day for the brasses. Full of lively native rhythms, and American dance accents passed through a Slavic filter, it crashed and rolled along magnificently under Ceccato's baton.

It is a somewhat disjointed work that tends to explore as it goes, but that is exactly what the people of early America were doing, and their ebullient, spunky, not always smooth temperament is portrayed well by these adventurous sounds.

Young Ceccato, his black hair tossing, was just the man for this symphony, bringing its grand spirit across with ardor and flair.

This program will be repeated Saturday evening.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 110,[illegible]

DEC 18 1971 New England

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

DEC 30 1971

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

DEC 30 1971

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

DEC 30 1971

New Englan
Newscl

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

DEC 30 1971

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

DEC 30 1971

BSO Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducts three ~~all-Brahms~~ concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, Dec. 30 at 8:30 p.m., and at the eleventh pair of Friday/Saturday concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 31 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Jan. 1 at 8:30 p.m.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

DEC 30 1971

New England
Newsclip

Thomas Leads BSO In Brahms-Stravinsky

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts ~~three~~ all-Brahms concerts Thursday evening, Dec. 30, at 8:30 p.m., and at the concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 31 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Jan. 1, at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is pianist Misha Dichter.

The second series of concerts in the Spectrum series takes place Friday and Saturday evenings, Jan. 7 and 8 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct two all-Stravinsky concerts, part I on Friday evening and part II on Saturday evening.

Friday evening, Jan. 7, Mr. Thomas will conduct the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, Introitus, Requiem Canticles and Rite of Spring. Saturday evening, Jan. 8, the Orchestra will perform Scenes de Ballet, Violin Concerto, with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Symphony of Psalms. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, conductor, will assist in the Requiem Canticles and Symphony of Psalms.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

DEC 29 1971

Ne
Eng
New

Brahms music at 3 concerts of symphony

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts three all-Brahms concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, Dec. 30, 8:30 p.m., and at the eleventh pair of Friday-Saturday concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Jan. 1 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is pianist Misha Dichter. Thomas conducts the Serenade no. 2 and the Second piano concerto with Misha Dichter.

Dichter was born in Shanghai in 1945, and with his family settled in Los Angeles in 1947. He began his musical studies as a small boy with Aube Tzerko, and later enrolled in the Juilliard School to study with Rosina Lhevinne. Immediately after winning a silver medal at the 1966 Tchaikovsky Piano Competition in Moscow, he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf in a nationally televised concert. His concert engagements this season include performances at the Hollywood Bowl, at Ravinia, at the Holland Festival, as well as extended tours of the United States, Europe, and Japan.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 6 1972

New England
Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

HANDEL AND HAYDEN'S "CREATION"

The Handel and Haydn Society came up with one of the more smashing ideas of the holiday season when it mounted Haydn's "Creation" on New Year's Eve. The notion was not without a certain nobility of tradition, for this fine old organization had presented excerpts from this oratorio on Christmas at its first concert just 156 years back.

"Creation", of course, is one of the more seminal examples of Haydn's genius, a melding of the craft of the artist in fullest maturity with an exuberance and freshness that ordinarily bespeak youth. The score has moment after moment of breathtakingly beautiful descriptive passages, starting with the orchestral sunrise and going on from there to evocations of birds and fish and water and pastoral scenes. These delights are purveyed in equal measure among the soloists, the orchestra, and in the Handel manner, the chorus.

The conductor, Thomas Dunn, worked his forces — the Chorus of the Handel and Haydn Society, members of the Boston Philharmonia and Diane Higginbotham, soprano, Richard Shadley, tenor, Francis Hester, bass baritone, and Joan Kerssenbrock, alto — into a cohesive ensemble. He obviously knew what he was about, and the large canvas was painted with notable security.

But along with the cohesiveness and security ran the one thing you cannot take with Haydn: blandness. This was the pervading characteristic of the performance of "The Seasons" last spring by the Society, and it does take the edge off the excitement. One waited for a catalyzing, an unleashing, a surge, a ring of affirmation in the rendering, but none ever appeared. Even Miss Higginbotham's beautiful singing of "Nun zeigt die Flur das frische Grun" brought no special applause from an audience that clapped only after the end of each section.

Still, the work is so gorgeous, and the investment in care and effort by the conductor and performers were sufficiently manifest that it was difficult to imagine a commencement of a New Year's Eve in a more elegant way.

BSO'S ALL-BRAHMS PROGRAM

The next evening witnessed Michael Tilson Thomas's all-Brahms program at Symphony with Mischa Dichter as piano soloist. The works ~~included the first~~ performance in twenty-five years of the second Serenade, the one in A major, and the D minor piano concerto.

The Serenade is a highly unusual piece, chamber music in essence. The absence of violins brings a quite wonderful somberness to the extraordinarily mellifluous yet quite personal writing. Some of Brahms' music will move ahead most nicely where the balance, the tempi and the dynamics are well in hand, as they certainly were in this performance. Yet, just so to Play Along with Brahms does not quite pan out in all of his pieces, as this one where there is an infinity of detail that requires the meticulous shaping of every phrase. Maybe it was the large hall, but whatever it was. Mr. Thomas could not or did not engage in the kind of moulding that is indispensable to an exquisite reading.

As for the D minor concerto, it was a most welcome visitor. This has been the Year of the Piano at Symphony, but heavens, what piano: Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Khatchaturian so far, with Lizst yet to come, among others. So this bold, independent giant of a work, with its utter disregard of external devices and its majesty of proclamation, stands out with great eminence. A flawed giant, to be sure, but still a giant.

Young Mr. Dichter again demonstrated that he is one of the finest pianists around and came through with a majestically moving and poetic reading. The conception of the collaboration was quite different from the traditional one for this concerto. That conception contemplates something of a battle between piano and orchestra, with the sense of strain running through the entire work an essential dimension of its drama. In this performance the confrontation was subdued and the soloist and accompanist each rendered unto its own, as it were. This is another of those questions of taste, but I would opt for the traditional route.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

JAN 3 1972

New England
Newsclip

Boston's year end concerts

By Louis Snyder

Brahms and Haydn brought Boston's musical year to an end on Friday in two concerts at Symphony Hall. In the afternoon, music written by Brahms in his late 20's was played by the Boston Symphony under the direction of a conductor and with a soloist also in their late 20's. The evening's work, "The Creation," sung by the 156-year-old Handel and Haydn Society, is the product of Haydn's middle 60's, and has been in the repertory of the society since its initial concert in 1815. Years however, had little to do with the impressions both performances made. Each was invigorating and enjoyable on its own terms.

Solid technique

The Brahms selections — the Serenade No. 2 in A, and the First Piano Concerto (D minor) — were ideal companions. The serenade, employing a small orchestra, without violins, is an aural treat of rich texture, and Michael Tilson Thomas conducted it with the kind of loving care which maintained its chamber context without underrating its very substantial musical ideas. The winds, with so much of interest to contribute throughout the five movements, were in fine form, while the warmth of viola, cello, and bass sound complemented them engagingly throughout.

Pianist Misha Dichter, the afternoon's second young Lochinvar out of the West, was appearing in the BSO's subscription series for the first time, although he has played with the orchestra at special concerts in Boston and at Tanglewood. And it may be said that the results he achieved with the Concerto No. 1 (which the composer himself premiered at Mr. Dichter's age—26) were gained through solid, musicianly means, unostentatiously conveyed. A 1966 Moscow Tchaikovsky Competition winner, he has apparently spent the intervening time consolidating a formidable technique in preference to acquiring salable platform mannerisms.

The fact that the concerto is not an obvious showpiece, in the style of its romantic predecessors, doesn't lessen its demands on the strength or coloristic abilities of the soloist's approach. With Mr. Thomas's sensitive knitting together of piano and orchestral parts, the work proceeded from Maestoso to Adagio to Rondo with a great deal of style and sweep on everyone's part. At the end, there was a predictable ovation for all concerned. The BSO-Brahms program will be repeated at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, and will be recorded by WGBH-TV [illegible] television.

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

DEC 30 1971

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

DEC 30 1971

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

DEC 30 1971

New Englan
Newscl

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

DEC 30 1971

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

DEC 30 1971

BSO Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducts three ~~all-Brahms~~ concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, Dec. 30 at 8:30 p.m., and at the eleventh pair of Friday/Saturday concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 31 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Jan. 1 at 8:30 p.m.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

DEC 30 1971

New England
Newscling

Thomas Leads BSO In Brahms-Stravinsky

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~conducts three~~ all-Brahms concerts Thursday evening, Dec. 30, at 8:30 p.m., and at the concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 31 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Jan. 1, at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is pianist Misha Dichter.

The second series of concerts in the Spectrum series takes place Friday and Saturday evenings, Jan. 7 and 8 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct two all-Stravinsky concerts, part I on Friday evening and part II on Saturday evening.

Friday evening, Jan. 7, Mr. Thomas will conduct the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, Introitus, Requiem Canticles and Rite of Spring. Saturday evening, Jan. 8, the Orchestra will perform Scenes de Ballet, Violin Concerto, with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Symphony of Psalms. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, conductor, will assist in the Requiem Canticles and Symphony of Psalms.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

DEC 29 1971

Ne
Engl
New

Brahms music at 3 concerts of symphony

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts three all-Brahms concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, Dec. 30, 8:30 p.m., and at the eleventh pair of Friday-Saturday concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 31, at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Jan. 1 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is pianist Misha Dichter. Thomas conducts the Serenade no. 2 and the Second piano concerto with Misha Dichter.

Dichter was born in Shanghai in 1945, and with his family settled in Los Angeles in 1947. He began his musical studies as a small boy with Aube Tzerko, and later enrolled in the Juilliard School to study with Rosina Lhevinne. Immediately after winning a silver medal at the 1966 Tchaikovsky Piano Competition in Moscow, he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf in a nationally televised concert. His concert engagements this season include performances at the Hollywood Bowl, at Ravinia, at the Holland Festival, as well as extended tours of the United States, Europe, and Japan.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 6 1972

New England
Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

HANDEL AND HAYDEN'S "CREATION"

The Handel and Haydn Society came up with one of the more smashing ideas of the holiday season when it mounted Haydn's "Creation" on New Year's Eve. The notion was not without a certain nobility of tradition, for this fine old organization had presented excerpts from this oratorio on Christmas at its first concert just 156 years back.

"Creation", of course, is one of the more seminal examples of Haydn's genius, a melding of the craft of the artist in fullest maturity with an exuberance and freshness that ordinarily bespeak youth. The score has moment after moment of breathtakingly beautiful descriptive passages, starting with the orchestral sunrise and going on from there to evocations of birds and fish and water and pastoral scenes. These delights are purveyed in equal measure among the soloists, the orchestra, and in the Handel manner, the chorus.

The conductor, Thomas Dunn, worked his forces — the Chorus of the Handel and Haydn Society, members of the Boston Philharmonia and Diane Higginbotham, soprano, Richard Shadley, tenor, Francis Hester, bass baritone, and Joan Kerssenbrock, alto — into a cohesive ensemble. He obviously knew what he was about, and the large canvas was painted with notable security.

But along with the cohesiveness and security ran the one thing you cannot take with Haydn: blandness. This was the pervading characteristic of the performance of "The Seasons" last spring by the Society, and it does take the edge off the excitement. One waited for a catalyzing, an unleashing, a surge, a ring of affirmation in the rendering, but none ever appeared. Even Miss Higginbotham's beautiful singing of "Nun zeigt die Flur das frische Grun" brought no special applause from an audience that clapped only after the end of each section.

Still, the work is so gorgeous, and the investment in care and effort by the conductor and performers were sufficiently manifest that it was difficult to imagine a commencement of a New Year's Eve in a more elegant way.

BSO'S ALL-BRAHMS PROGRAM

The next evening witnessed Michael Tilson Thomas's all-Brahms program at Symphony with Mischa Dichter as piano soloist. The works ~~included the first~~ performance in twenty-five years of the second Serenade, the one in A major, and the D minor piano concerto.

The Serenade is a highly unusual piece, chamber music in essence. The absence of violins brings a quite wonderful somberness to the extraordinarily mellifluous yet quite personal writing. Some of Brahms' music will move ahead most nicely where the balance, the tempi and the dynamics are well in hand, as they certainly were in this performance. Yet, just so to Play Along with Brahms does not quite pan out in all of his pieces, as this one where there is an infinity of detail that requires the meticulous shaping of every phrase. Maybe it was the large hall, but whatever it was, Mr. Thomas could not or did not engage in the kind of moulding that is indispensable to an exquisite reading.

As for the D minor concerto, it was a most welcome visitor. This has been the Year of the Piano at Symphony, but heavens, what piano: Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Khatchaturian so far, with Lizst yet to come, among others. So this bold, independent giant of a work, with its utter disregard of external devices and its majesty of proclamation, stands out with great eminence. A flawed giant, to be sure, but still a giant.

Young Mr. Dichter again demonstrated that he is one of the finest pianists around and came through with a majestically moving and poetic reading. The conception of the collaboration was quite different from the traditional one for this concerto. That conception contemplates something of a battle between piano and orchestra, with the sense of strain running through the entire work an essential dimension of its drama. In this performance the confrontation was subdued and the soloist and accompanist each rendered unto its own as it were. This is another of those questions of taste, but I would opt for the traditional route.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,964

JAN 3 1972

New England
Newsclip

Boston's year end concerts

By Louis Snyder

Brahms and Haydn brought Boston's musical year to an end on Friday in two concerts at Symphony Hall. In the afternoon, music written by Brahms in his late 20's was played by the Boston Symphony under the direction of a conductor and with a soloist also in their late 20's. The evening's work, "The Creation," sung by the 156-year-old Handel and Haydn Society, is the product of Haydn's middle 60's, and has been in the repertory of the society since its initial concert in 1815. Years however, had little to do with the impressions both performances made. Each was invigorating and enjoyable on its own terms.

Solid technique

The Brahms selections — the Serenade No. 2 in A, and the First Piano Concerto (D minor) — were ideal companions. The serenade, employing a small orchestra, without violins, is an aural treat of rich texture, and Michael Tilson Thomas conducted it with the kind of loving care which maintained its chamber context without underrating its very substantial musical ideas. The winds, with so much of interest to contribute throughout the five movements, were in fine form, while the warmth of viola, cello, and bass sound complemented them engagingly throughout.

Pianist Misha Dichter, the afternoon's second young Lochinvar out of the West, was appearing in the BSO's subscription series for the first time, although he has played with the orchestra at special concerts in Boston and at Tanglewood. And it may be said that the results he achieved with the Concerto No. 1 (which the composer himself premiered at Mr. Dichter's age—26) were gained through solid, musicianly means, unostentatiously conveyed. A 1966 Moscow Tchaikovsky Competition winner, he has apparently spent the intervening time consolidating a formidable technique in preference to acquiring salable platform mannerisms.

The fact that the concerto is not an obvious showpiece, in the style of its romantic predecessors, doesn't lessen its demands on the strength or coloristic abilities of the soloist's approach. With Mr. Thomas's sensitive knitting together of piano and orchestral parts, the work proceeded from Maestoso to Adagio to Rondo with a great deal of style and sweep on everyone's part. At the end, there was a predictable ovation for all concerned. The BSO-Brahms program will be repeated at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, and will be recorded by WGBH-TV for later telecast.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

DEC 20 1971

New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

For the first time at any in-town event this season Christmas really burst forth on Friday at Horticultural Hall. For some reason this year the Christmas spirit, in comparison with other years, has been slow to appear with few really big seasonal benefits on the calendar. However on Friday at the Pre-Symphony luncheon it was out in force with almost every lady in a Christmassy color and seasonal decorations on every side.

The event was the second in the series of four luncheons arranged by the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before certain of the Friday afternoon concerts. Just as popular as the Stage Door Lectures these affairs are so convenient for those attending Symphony for the one time parking is a boon, and the short walk across the street from one hall to the other the only distance to be traveled.

Fortunately for the decorations committee on Friday they had inherited a great deal of help from the Massachusetts Horticultural Society for the remains of the previous week's Christmas Show of that society was still in evidence. This consisted of big Christmas trees of all kinds and one truly lofty one that greeted the guests at the top of the stone steps, which were placed all around the area where the pre-luncheon cocktails were served. Beautifully and simply decorated with gold stars and natural groups of all shapes and sizes the tree caught the attention of every guest as they arrived. Evergreens and outsize Christmas parcels tied with red ribbons decorated the lobby, while all around the high ceilinged hall where the luncheon was served evergreen wreaths were hung, each wreath crossed with red ribbons linking a gold angel, such as is on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's calaphon, and a group of small gold instruments. The result was most effective and so in keeping with the luncheon's purpose.

The ladies responsible for the decorations were Mrs. Allen P. Joslin, Mrs. Charles Hovey, Mrs. August Meyer, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Robert Siegfried, and Mrs. Herbert Harwood of Brookline who designed the gigantic mobile that hung over the heads of the lunchers. It was made of huge gold notes and clefts interspersed with sunbursts of glittery ornaments in all the seasonal colors.

This was the affair for all the Christmas jewelry and pins to appear. It seemed that every lady had one pinned to her outfit. Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead whose unusual fake fur dress of simulated zebra skin was by Adele Simpson, had a Christmas tree made of rows of pearls outlined with gold pinned to the bodice. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, one of the orchestra's trustees, who wore a crimson red dress and jacket, had a pin in the shape of a small swag in diamonds and gold, and Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard's grey suit was a good background to show off the little jeweled Christmas tree pin she wore. Even the maids serving the luncheon of goulash, rice, carrots and a Christmas molded salad of aspic and green avocado, wore Christmas pins on their black dresses to add to the festive occasion.

One of the prettiest dresses at the luncheon was worn by Mrs. Charles Hovey. Made in a princess style of green wool it had a square neckline and short sleeves and had a band of dark mink around the hem. She had pinned a simple sprig of berried holly to the bodice, the perfect touch on a devastingly simple and effective dress. Mrs. Alfred Willmann, who always looks so cheerful and pretty, had on her special "Christmas hat" which she keeps from year to year. In the shape of a circlet it is made of dozens of tiny Christmas balls and little sparkling ornaments and is most becoming.

The chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, had her sister-in-law, the Governor's wife, as her guest at her table. Mrs. Sargent was escorted by Mrs. Lewis Cabot of Louisburg Square, who wore a pants suit in black and white checks. Also among Mrs. George Sargent's guests were Talcott Banks, president of the trustees of the orchestra; Mrs. George C. Seybolt of Dedham, wife of the president of the Museum of Fine Arts, and Mrs. Frank W. Whitty, the efficient and extremely popular executive secretary of the Friends of the B.S.O.

Others in the gaily dressed crowd were Mrs. William Mixter, Jr. of Dedham, Mrs. Richard Thompson of Swampscott, Mrs. W. Russell Peabody of Dedham, all of whom were seated with Mrs. Fahnestock and Mrs. Goodhue; Mrs. Thomas E. Morris and Mrs. Robert Clasby, both from Wellesley; Mrs. Roy Benson of Needham, another in cheerful red; Mrs. William Manice of Weston; and Mrs. Jack Parker of Wellesley, in the prettiest of dresses of black velvet with a red tartan silk skirt.

After the luncheon the ladies streamed across the street, many of them carrying red poinsettias that they had purchased from the luncheon tables, to see Mrs. Francis Sargent perform the ceremony of lighting the Christmas tree in the lobby of Symphony Hall.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 268,561

DEC 18 1971

New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

BSO

Decorations Add Festive Note At Gay Pre-Symphony Luncheon

THE CHRISTMAS TREE in the Massachusetts Avenue lobby of Symphony Hall was lighted by Mrs. Francis W. Sargent, Massachusetts' First Lady, yesterday, immediately after the Pre-Symphony Luncheon across the street in Horticultural Hall. Decorated with red and white velvet bows and tiny lights, the tree was donated by Mrs. Boyd Roberts of Beverly Farms.

Cavernous Horticultural Hall was gay with tall Christmas trees and there were wreaths in the huge windows. On each luncheon table was a red poinsettia, which sold for $1.50. Luncheon guests could also buy the wreaths for $5 apiece.

The committee responsible for the decorations in the barn-like building included Mrs. Allen P. Joslin, Mrs. Herbert Harwood, Mrs. August Meyer, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Robert Siegfried and Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, who had a sprig of holly pinned to her forest green dress.

She was a luncheon guest of Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Symphony. Others at the table were Mrs. Francis W. Sargent, Talcott M. Banks, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. George C. Seybolt, William C. Meyer and Mrs. Frank W. Whitty.

THE LUNCHEON was under the auspices of members of the Brookline, Chestnut Hill, Belmont and Lexington areas. The hostesses were Mrs. Alexander H. Bright, Mrs. John Cancian, Mrs. P. Adams Colony, Mrs. James M. Gavin, Mrs. Robert Hamlin, Mrs. Stephen Hibbard, Mrs. August Meyer, Mrs. Robert Siegfried and Mrs. Alfred W. Willmann, who wore with her Christmas red suit a wreath of tiny Christmas tree ornaments.

Also in red were Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, one of the two women trustees of the orchestra, and Mrs. Victor Jones. Mrs. Rufus Hale wore bright green. Mrs. Williiam D. Manice Jr. and Mrs. M. Ducey Ryerson are cochairmen of the luncheon committee, which includes Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. Melville Chapin, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Edward Culver, Mrs. Howard W. Davis, Mrs. Paul E. Dodson, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Thomas Otis, Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. B. Gring Wallace.

Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, whose son, David, has just returned from a trip to Europe, attended the luncheon with Mrs. Miles N. Clair. David told his mother: "We are spoiled in this country. Things are too easy."

But this country has its problems, too. Mrs. Richard Thompson said that in addition to mounted police to help luncheon guests cross the street to Symphony Hall, policemen accompanied by police dogs are stationed in the subway to protect Symphony travelers from bag-snatching. The subway is a favorite mode of travel for many Friday afternoon Symphony-goers, especially those from Cambridge.

Friends of the Symphony were reminded that tickets are still available for the Pre-Symphony Suppers—at the Sheraton-Boston, Jan. 23 and March 25; the Tuesday "A" series at Symphony Hall, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and April 11, and the Thursday "B" series, also at Symphony Hall, Jan. 27, Feb. 24 and April 13.

Among others at yesterday's luncheon were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John G. Cornish, Mrs. Edward L. Francis, Mrs. Jack Parker, Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, Mrs. Thomas Mahony, Mrs. S. Bruce Black and Mrs. John Knowles.

JOURNAL
HINGHAM, MASS.
W. 2,900

NOV 25 1971

785

New England Newsclip

Judge Paul Reardon Named Trustee Boston Symphony

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS — Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that Paul C. Reardon, Associate Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and a resident of 20 Martin's Lane, has been elected a Trustee of the Orchestra for a five-year term.

Judge Reardon was a charter member of the Orchestra's Board of Overseers, founded in 1968, and has been Chairman of the Board's Community Relations Committee since its inception.

Harvard Cum Laude

A native of Quincy, Judge Reardon was educated at St. John's Parochial School in Quincy, at the Quincy High School, and Phillips Andover Academy. He graduated from Harvard College cum laude and received his Bachelor of Law degree from Harvard Law School. During World War II, he served as an officer in the United States Navy, and in the years since, he has held many positions of responsibility, including the Presidency of the Harvard Alumni Association, an Overseer of Harvard College, and Graduate Advisor of the Harvard Glee Club (of which he was a member as a college undergraduate.)

In his legal practice, he has been Counsel to Governor Christian A. Herter, General Counsel to the Boston Chamber of Commerce, Member of the Executive Council of the Boston Bar Association, and Trustee of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency. He has also been a Fellow of the Institute of Judicial Administration, and Chairman of the American Bar Committee on Fair Trial and Free Press. Judge Reardon served as Chief Justice of the Massachusetts Superior Court from 1955 to December 1962. He became an Associate Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth in December of 1962.

Today, Judge Reardon is Chairman of the National Center for State Courts, and a Trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

NOV 23 1971

New England Newscli

Judge Reardon Elected to Board of BSO

BOSTON — Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today that Paul C. Reardon, associate justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, has been elected a trustee of the orchestra for a five-year term.

Judge Reardon was a charter member of the orchestra's board of overseers, founded in 1968, and has been chairman of the board's community relations committee since its inception.

A native of Quincy, Judge Reardon was educated at St. John's School in Quincy, at the Quincy High School, and Phillips Andover Academy. He graduated from Harvard College cum laude and received his bachelor of law degree from Harvard Law School. During World War II, he served as an officer in the United States Navy, and in the years since, he has held many positions of responsibility, including the presidency of the Harvard Alumni Association, an overseer of Harvard College, and graduate adviser of the Harvard Glee Club, of which he was a member as an undergraduate Judge Reardon served as chief justice of the Massachusetts Superior Court from 1955 through 1962. He became an associate justice of the Supreme Court in December of that year.

NEWS
MILFORD, MASS.
D. 11,172

NOV 19 1971

New England Newsclip

NAMED TRUSTEE

BOSTON — Talcott M. Banks, President of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that Paul C. Reardon, Associate Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Mass., has been elected a Trustee of the Orchestra for a five-year term. Judge Reardon was a charter member of the Orchestra's Board of Overseers, founded in 1968, and has been chairman of the Board's Community Relations Committee since its inception.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003

NOV 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Thanksgiving, Yule Decor

Stephen Bebe and Mrs. Edward F. Logan.

★

Three Symphony Dinners at the Sheraton Boston Hotel before the Saturday concerts is an innovation sponsored by the Council of Friends of the BSO. The evenings include convenient free parking in the hotel garage and round trip transportation from the hotel to Symphony Hall and particularly a gourmet dinner at the Kon Tiki Ports Restaurant.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard W. Davis of Concord and Mrs. Samuel A. Levine of Newton will be on hand to greet old and new friends and to make sure the evening is a pleasant and congenial occasion.

Dinner dates are Friday, Nov. 13, Jan. 22nd and March 25. Reservations may be made with Mrs. Whitty in the Friends office 266-1348.

Invitations are on the way for a series of Table Talk Suppers at Symphony Hall before the Tuesday "A" concerts and the Thursday "B" concerts. These will be held during January, Februray and April.

Informal talks will be given by members of the BSO, and subscribers will have an opportunity to meet new members of the Orchestra as well as Trustees. Husbands can come right from the office to meet their wives at the Stage Door entrance.

An a la carte bar will precede dinner. Mrs. William K. Russell of Chestnut Hill has planned the Thursday series. Mrs. Samuel M. Ryburn and Mrs. John L. Thorndike of Dover are co-chairmen of the Tuesday suppers, assisted by Mrs. Atherton Loring of Duxbury.

★

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003

DEC 21 1971 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Quick-Witted Woman Invents a Reminder

A quick-minded member of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra made sure that guests at Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon in Horticultural Hall would not forget the Pre-Symphony Suppers to be held at the Sheraton-Boston Hotel.

She made en eye-catching green flyer of a hand with a string and bit of holly tied around the forefinger and listed the supper dates for the Saturday evenings, the Tuesday "A" series, and the Thursday "B" series.

Mrs. William D. Manice and Mrs. W. Ducey Ryerson who are co-chairmen of the very popular luncheons welcomed Mrs. Francis Sargent who was the guest of Mrs. George Lee Sargent on Friday, before going on to light the Christmas Tree in the Mass. ave. lobby of Symphony Hall.

Single plants of red poinsettias centered the tables in Horticultural Hall which the members of the Brookline, Chestnut Hill, Belmont and Lexington areas had decorated handsomely with red velvet garlanded wreaths dotted with miniature gold musical instruments and cupid's.

Both the plants and wreaths were sold for the Council of Friends' fund benefitting the BSO. Mrs. Allen P. Joslin, Mrs. Herbert Harwood, Mrs. Charles F. Mrs. August Meyer, Mrs. Robert Hopkins and Mrs. Robert Siegfried were the artistic ladies responsible for the decor.

Talcott M. Banks lunched with the First Lady as did Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. George C. Seybolt ((representing her husband who was on his way back from England) and Mrs. Frank W. Whitty.

HERALD
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 7,200

DEC 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Pre-Symphony Christmas Luncheon

Mrs. August R. Meyer, chairman of the Belmont committee of Friends of the Boston Symphony, and Mrs. Robinson Murray, Jr. helped with the decorations in Horticultural Hall for the Pre-Symphony Luncheon before tomorrow's concert.

The Belmont committee shared responsibility with the groups from Brookline, Chestnut Hill and nearby Lexington. Belmont also share hostess honors tomorrow, with Mrs. Alfred Willmann and Mrs. John Cancian serving in that capacity.

The Christmas ceremony of the lighting of the Christmas tree will be done by the Governor's wife, Mrs. Francis Sargent, who will later walk across Massachusetts Avenue to Symphony Hall, with Mrs. George Lee Sargent, under the watchful care of the Mounted Police detail that adds so much pomp and color to these occasions.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

DEC 22 1971 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY
by Miriam Tod

Looking ahead to January, it would seem that the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have arranged an event for every concert-goer regardless of which series of concerts are attended. For those attending the Saturday concerts, the second in the series of three mid-winter dinners will take place at the Sheraton-Boston Hotel on Jan. 22. The evening is a bargain indeed for the price of the dinner ticket includes dinner in the Kon Tiki Ports Restaurant, parking in the hotel garage and round trip transportation to Symphony Hall.

For those whose tickets are for the Tuesday series the first of this season's Table Talk Suppers will be held Jan. 25, and for those with Thursday tickets the same dinner will be held Jan. 27. Extremely popular last year, these events are arranged by members of the Friends and are held in the basement of Symphony Hall, just as the pre-Friday afternoon concert Stage Door Lectures are. Reservations for all these events may be made through the Friends Office at Symphony Hall.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003

DEC 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Our musical knowledge has been enriched, thanks to Chester Schmitz, principal tuba of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who fascinated his audience at Friday's State Door Lecture presented by the Council of Friends of the BSO in Symphony Hall.

We know what a Sousa horn is (named for the great band leader, John Philip Sousa); that the large tuba was not utilized until the time of Brahms, that you never have to transpose music for the tuba and that Mr. Schmitz' tuba weighs 35 pounds.

Another bit of interesting information is that Symphony Hall has an attic where the principal tuba player found an old instrument that has six valves instead of three.

During the after-lecture question session, Schmitz, who began playing the instrument about 15 years ago in the Vinton, Iowa High School band, was asked by one of the ladies what was the highest and lowest note on a tuba. He replied by playing both, and commented about the high one, "This is the first time I ever got to play it in public."

Mrs. George L. Bates and Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, cochairmen of the popular series of talks by members of the Orchestra for the benefit of the BSO had as hostesses for the box luncheon hour members of the Cambridge and Newton areas.

The group included Mrs. David Bird, Mrs. Melville Chapin, Mrs. Addison M. Closson, Jr., Mrs. Francis DeMaraeffe, Mrs. John M. Perry, Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. B. Gring Wallace.

Also Mrs. Edward A. Caredis, Mrs. Niles N. Clair, Mrs. Douglas Garfield, Mrs. Kenneth A. Henderson, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Bruce Seddon, Jr., and Mrs. Irving Usen.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

NOV 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Saturday Subscribers Share In Symphony Social Events

SATURDAY SUBSCRIBERS to the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now coming in for their share of social events. Four Pre-Symphony Luncheons precede the Friday afternoon concerts, and there are Table Talk Suppers before the Tuesday "A" concerts and the Thursday "B" concerts.

Now the Saturday evening subscribers have received invitations to three Symphony Dinners at the Sheraton-Boston before the Saturday concerts.

This new series, sponsored by the Council of Friends, includes convenient free parking in the hotel garage and round-trip bus transportation from the Sheraton-Boston to Symphony Hall, in addition to a gourmet dinner at the Kon Tiki Ports Restaurant.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard W. Davis of Concord and Mrs. Samuel A. Levine of Newton will be on hand to greet old and new friends and to make sure the evening is a pleasant and congenial occasion. The first dinner will take place Nov. 13; with succeeding ones planned for Jan. 22 and March 25. To make reservations there is still time to call Mrs. Whitty in the Friends office.

INVITATIONS WILL be in the mail this week for a series of Table Talk Suppers at Symphony Hall in January, February and April before the Tuesday and Thursday concerts. Informal talks will be given by members of the orchestra and subscribers will have an opportunity to meet new members of the orchestra as well as trustees.

Husbands can come right from the office to meet their wives at the Stage Door entrance and enjoy a relaxing, entertaining get-together before the concert. The supper will be preceded by an a la carte bar.

Mrs. William K. Russell of Chestnut Hill is planning the Thursday series. Mrs. Samuel M. Ryburn and Mrs. John L. Thorndike of Dover are cochairmen of the Tuesday series, assisted by Mrs. Atherton Loring of Duxbury. John L. Thorndike, treasurer and trustee of the orchestra, will be present at the first supper.

Members of the orchestra who will give informal talks during the series include Luis Laguia, 'cello; Tom Mowry, producer of all Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pops recordings; David Ohanian, horn; Arthur Press, percussion; and Jordan M. Whitelaw, producer of all Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pops TV shows.

[54]

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

DEC 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Music

Classical

TODAY

Children's concert; works of Poulenc, Mozart and Wayland; Gardner Museum, 4 p.m.

TUESDAY

Boston Symphony, Erich Kunzel conducting works of Kabalevsky, Rorem, Elgar and Dvorak; Symphony Hall, 8:30 p.m.

THURSDAY

Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, with piano soloist Misha Dichter; Works of Brahms; Symphony Hall, 8:30 p.m.

FRIDAY

Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, with piano soloist Misha Dichter; works of Brahms; Symphony Hall, 2 p.m.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Thomas Conducts, Dichter at Piano

All-Brahms at Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE

The idea of an all-Brahms program devoted to the Serenade in A. Op. 16, and the Piano Concerto in D Minor, Op. 15, has a great deal of merit, hardly any of which was apparent Thursday night when Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist Misha Dichter and the Boston Symphony collaborated in the execution of that idea. Yes, the pun is intentional, though "execution" doesn't convey an altogether accurate impression of what happened. Brahms, on this occasion, died a lingering death. Malnourishment seemed to be the main problem.

IT WAS SOMETHING of a shock to witness Thomas turning in a performance as lame as this one. Usually he's a conductor who can be relied upon to make a piece of music bright-sounding and rhythmically alive at the very least, but his Brahms lacked even surface attractiveness. Sluggish rhythms, poor ensemble, disregard for dynamic distinctions—failures such as these characterized the entire evening. And one couldn't begin to speak of how Thomas conceives this music at a deeper level, for at this point he seems to have no very confident notion at all as to the kind of statement these works should make.

Misha Dichter is the kind of pianist who should be able to do a bang-up job on the First Piano Concerto. He produces a big and rich tone, his technique is first-rate, and he has an excellent feeling for the mood of the music at any given moment. I thought he was terribly hampered by Thomas, who never once projected the urgency of the first movement, the serenity of the second, the drive and momentum of the third. Too bad, for the D Minor Concerto can be an electrifying experience, and I think Dichter would have made it so with some kind of minimal assistance.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 1 1972 New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

Pianist Dichter BSO soloist

Thomas Conducts Brahms

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Michael Tillson Thomas, who conducted yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, is 27, and Misha Dichter, the soloist, is 26, but Brahms was younger than that when he composed the music on the program: the A major serenade, finished at 26, and the D minor piano concerto on which he worked from 20 to 25.

The Brahms part of those figures is amusing and sobering, partly because we are always inclined to see Brahms as white-bearded and stout (he was blond, skinny, and clean-shaven in the 1850s), and partly because we are flooded with propaganda to persuade us that youth was an invention of the 1960s.

When Brahms was only 20, Schumann hailed him as one who had sprung "like Minerva, fully armed, from the head of Jove." It was a risky stance for Schumann to take, but what Brahms had achieved by his middle 20s showed that Schuman was right. Brahms of the D minor concerto and the A major serenade is all there, and in the most assertive way possible, writing music that shows his love of Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann, but which sounds only like his own, worked out with terrific technical boldness, and, as the juxtaposition of these two works dramatically shows, moving confidently across a wide expressive range.

The serenade is not often played, though Leon Kirchner did it with the Boston Philharmonia a couple of seasons ago. It is a most lovely piece, in its intimacy and physical quiet completely different from the concerto, which is all Beethoven-haunted drama and huge gestures. The orchestra for the serenade is small — woodwinds and horns by twos (with a piccolo delightfully added to the finale, though not really asserting itself until that movement was more than half over), and lower strings only. Even in tutti, it has a real serenade sound, warm and mellow but with no fat.

Twice Brahms moved into sonorous territory he never entered again in his orchestral music — in the Adagio, where he produces lean, horizontal writing out of the world of Haydn and Philipp Emanuel Bach, and in the Trio of the movement he labels "quasi menuetto," in which single woodwinds play a tantalizingly fragmented melody over an accompaniment of murmuring violas and pizzicato real (cellos) and fake (flutes and bassoons).

Thomas's performance of the serenade concentrated on its anti-proclamatory nature: finely balanced sound, pacing that was very sure, even while exceeding the gentle, everything said rather reticently, though by no means coldly. The string playing was gorgeous, but the winds intonation was careless.

I would not call the performance of the concerto underated, but the playing was very far from the sweaty pounding to which Brahm's music is so often submitted. Misha Dichter is an extraordinary musician and pianist. He played freely and imaginatively, with grace, and with an easy sense of direction. Everything was natural, but in no way naive. He also made singularly beautiful sounds by leaving plenty of air between the rich, sharply defined bass and an unpercussive, ringing cantabile in the right.

Dichter and Thomas seemed to work congenially, but something was uncomfortable between conductor and orchestra in the concerto: there was some beautiful playing by the strings and on kettle drums, but most of the wind playing was shrilly out of tune, and ensemble was off on certain periods. What was heard yesterday, then, was a flawed version of a fresh and highly intelligent interpretation. In any case, what a pleasure to hear Brahms when he is not made to shout.

The Friends of the Boston Symphony had quite a year. A group of them accompanied the orchestra on its 23-day concert tour in Europe in the spring. And in May, the Friends raised more than $37,000 for the orchestra by a three-day Musical Marathon.

In Concert

No Small Artistry

By Peter M. Knapp

Big Brahms and Little Brahms were on Tuesday night's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by ~~Michael Tilson~~ Thomas beneath the glare of TV lights. The program was being taped by WGBH-TV, and at least one member of the orchestra had the foresight to bring his sun glasses.

There were Brahms' Serenade No. 2 in A. Opus 16 (Little) and the Piano Concerto No. 1 in d minor Opus 15 (Big), written about the same time, and yet poles apart in scale and concept.

The concerto was completed in 1858, the serenade two years later. Yet, little that Brahms wrote could really be termed "small" in craftsmanship, not even a serenade (one of two) designed for court performances at Detmold, where the composer spent three seasons as director of music.

The A major serenade is a gracious and lovely score, apparently inspired by the wind serenades and divertimenti of Mozart. Here, Brahms drops violins in favor of the lower strings, blended with five pairs of winds, plus piccolo. There is an artful variety of textures and voicings in this work of flowing lines and graceful themes.

Balanced Performance

Thomas presented a relaxed, properly scaled performance, generally well balanced, maybe somewhat cautious in the opening movement, a little stiff in the scherzo. Particularly auspicious were the adagio — a masterly movement with its dark, mysterious mood pierced by dramatic accents —and the crisp rhythms of the rondo finale. The wind playing, too, was fluent and deft.

For the concerto, Misha Dichter joined the orchestra in a satisfying performance. Dichter, 26 (the same age as Brahms, incidentally, when he gave the first performance), has performed with the orchestra previously at Tanglewood (after winning second prize in the 1966 Tschaikovsky competition in Moscow) and in Boston, and seems to be well regarded by the BSO.

In some respects, the first movement was unusual — Thomas taking a decisively slow tempo (perhaps the better to articulate those difficult orchestral trills) and Dichter using a good deal of rubato in the opening piano statements. But the movement turned out to be "big" and spaciously laid out, rather than drifting, and both pianist and conductor contributed a good deal of sensitivity.

Dichter is quite a mature player for his age, avoiding flashy effect for the sake of expression. He is an accurate pianist with a clean, firm tone and can rap out impressive octaves. Though the opening movement did not have quite the lifting power a more bravura approach might have brought, he sailed through the finale with notable precision and sharp rhythms. Thomas and the orchestra supplied an uncommonly refined partnership in this heroic symphonic concerto.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

JAN 6 1972 New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 23 1972 New England Newsclip

B Symphony

On Tilson Thomas

It is time that true music lovers speak up. (Michael) Steinberg (Globe critic) has been pushing for some time now the recognition of Mr. Tilson Thomas as the coming young genius of orchestra conductors. It is also obvious that in this respect Mr. Steinberg's strong friendship for Mr. Thomas has quite obscured Steinberg's acute critical judgment. If anyone else (Leinsdorf, for example) had directed the Brahm's Concerto in the lethargic manner as conducted by Thomas, that Mr. Steinberg would have become vitriolic.

Mr. Thomas is not a bad conductor but he has not the experience or the repertoire of musical knowledge that a great orchestra should expect in its leader. Why should such outstanding musicians have to rehearse and rehearse pieces of music they know so well just for Mr. Thomas to learn his music? . . . Let him conduct less important orchestras for several years to familiarize himself with the repertoire and to prepare himself properly before he is lead to believe he is ready to take over one of the world's great musical bodies . . .

BETTY ANTHONY

Cambridge

[55]

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

DEC 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Music

Classical

TODAY

Children's concert; works of Poulenc, Mozart and Wayland; Gardner Museum, 4 p.m.

TUESDAY

Boston Symphony, Erich Kunzel conducting works of Kabalevsky, Rorem, Elgar and Dvorak; Symphony Hall, 8:30 p.m.

THURSDAY

Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, with piano soloist Misha Dichter; Works of Brahms; Symphony Hall, 8:30 p.m.

FRIDAY

Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, with piano soloist Misha Dichter; works of Brahms; Symphony Hall, 2 p.m.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Thomas Conducts, Dichter at Piano

All-Brahms at Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE

The idea of an all-Brahms program devoted to the Serenade in A. Op. 16, and the Piano Concerto in D Minor, Op. 15, has a great deal of merit, hardly any of which was apparent Thursday night when Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist Misha Dichter and the Boston Symphony collaborated in the execution of that idea. Yes, the pun is intentional, though "execution" doesn't convey an altogether accurate impression of what happened. Brahms, on this occasion, died a lingering death. Malnourishment seemed to be the main problem.

IT WAS SOMETHING of a shock to witness Thomas turning in a performance as lame as this one. Usually he's a conductor who can be relied upon to make a piece of music bright-sounding and rhythmically alive at the very least, but his Brahms lacked even surface attractiveness. Sluggish rhythms, poor ensemble, disregard for dynamic distinctions—failures such as these characterized the entire evening. And one couldn't begin to speak of how Thomas conceives this music at a deeper level, for at this point he seems to have no very confident notion at all as to the kind of statement these works should make.

Misha Dichter is the kind of pianist who should be able to do a bang-up job on the First Piano Concerto. He produces a big and rich tone, his technique is first-rate, and he has an excellent feeling for the mood of the music at any given moment. I thought he was terribly hampered by Thomas, who never once projected the urgency of the first movement, the serenity of the second, the drive and momentum of the third. Too bad, for the D Minor Concerto can be an electrifying experience, and I think Dichter would have made it so with some kind of minimal assistance.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 1 1972 New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

Pianist Dichter BSO soloist

Thomas Conducts Brahms

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Michael Tillson Thomas, who conducted yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, is 27, and Misha Dichter, the soloist, is 26, but Brahms was younger than that when he composed the music on the program: the A major serenade, finished at 26, and the D minor piano concerto on which he worked from 20 to 25.

The Brahms part of those figures is amusing and sobering, partly because we are always inclined to see Brahms as white-bearded and stout (he was blond, skinny, and clean-shaven in the 1850s), and partly because we are flooded with propaganda to persuade us that youth was an invention of the 1960s.

When Brahms was only 20, Schumann hailed him as one who had sprung "like Minerva, fully armed, from the head of Jove." It was a risky stance for Schumann to take, but what Brahms had achieved by his middle 20s showed that Schuman was right. Brahms of the D minor concerto and the A major serenade is all there, and in the most assertive way possible, writing music that shows his love of Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann, but which sounds only like his own, worked out with terrific technical boldness, and, as the juxtaposition of these two works dramatically shows, moving confidently across a wide expressive range.

The serenade is not often played, though Leon Kirchner did it with the Boston Philharmonia a couple of seasons ago. It is a most lovely piece, in its intimacy and physical quiet completely different from the concerto, which is all Beethoven-haunted drama and huge gestures. The orchestra for the serenade is small — woodwinds and horns by twos (with a piccolo delightfully added to the finale, though not really asserting itself until that movement was more than half over), and lower strings only. Even in tutti, it has a real serenade sound, warm and mellow but with no fat.

Twice Brahms moved into sonorous territory he never entered again in his orchestral music — in the Adagio, where he produces lean, horizontal writing out of the world of Haydn and Philipp Emanuel Bach, and in the Trio of the movement he labels "quasi menuetto," in which single woodwinds play a tantalizingly fragmented melody over an accompaniment of murmuring violas and pizzicato real (cellos) and fake (flutes and bassoons).

Thomas's performance of the serenade concentrated on its anti-proclamatory nature: finely balanced sound, pacing that was very sure, even while exceeding the gentle, everything said rather reticently, though by no means coldly. The string playing was gorgeous, but the winds intonation was careless.

I would not call the performance of the concerto underated, but the playing was very far from the sweaty pounding to which Brahm's music is so often submitted. Misha Dichter is an extraordinary musician and pianist. He played freely and imaginatively, with grace, and with an easy sense of direction. Everything was natural, but in no way naive. He also made singularly beautiful sounds by leaving plenty of air between the rich, sharply defined bass and an unpercussive, ringing cantabile in the right.

Dichter and Thomas seemed to work congenially, but something was uncomfortable between conductor and orchestra in the concerto: there was some beautiful playing by the strings and on kettle drums, but most of the wind playing was shrilly out of tune, and ensemble was off on certain periods. What was heard yesterday, then, was a flawed version of a fresh and highly intelligent interpretation. In any case, what a pleasure to hear Brahms when he is not made to shout.

The Friends of the Boston Symphony had quite a year. A group of them accompanied the orchestra on its 23-day concert tour in Europe in the spring. And in May, the Friends raised more than $37,000 for the orchestra by a three-day Musical Marathon.

In Concert

No Small Artistry

By Peter M. Knapp

Big Brahms and Little Brahms were on Tuesday night's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas beneath the glare of TV lights. The program was being taped by WGBH-TV, and at least one member of the orchestra had the foresight to bring his sun glasses.

There were Brahms' Serenade No. 2 in A, Opus 16 (Little) and the Piano Concerto No. 1 in d minor Opus 15 (Big), written about the same time, and yet poles apart in scale and concept.

The concerto was completed in 1858, the serenade two years later. Yet, little that Brahms wrote could really be termed "small" in craftsmanship, not even a serenade (one of two) designed for court performances at Detmold, where the composer spent three seasons as director of music.

The A major serenade is a gracious and lovely score, apparently inspired by the wind serenades and divertimenti of Mozart. Here, Brahms drops violins in favor of the lower strings, blended with five pairs of winds, plus piccolo. There is an artful variety of textures and voicings in this work of flowing lines and graceful themes.

Balanced Performance

Thomas presented a relaxed, properly scaled performance, generally well balanced, maybe somewhat cautious in the opening movement, a little stiff in the scherzo. Particularly auspicious were the adagio — a masterly movement with its dark, mysterious mood pierced by dramatic accents —and the crisp rhythms of the rondo finale. The wind playing, too, was fluent and deft.

For the concerto, Misha Dichter joined the orchestra in a satisfying performance. Dichter, 26 (the same age as Brahms, incidentally, when he gave the first performance), has performed with the orchestra previously at Tanglewood (after winning second prize in the 1966 Tschaikovsky competition in Moscow) and in Boston, and seems to be well regarded by the BSO.

In some respects, the first movement was unusual — Thomas taking a decisively slow tempo (perhaps the better to articulate those difficult orchestral trills) and Dichter using a good deal of rubato in the opening piano statements. But the movement turned out to be "big" and spaciously laid out, rather than drifting, and both pianist and conductor contributed a good deal of sensitivity.

Dichter is quite a mature player for his age, avoiding flashy effect for the sake of expression. He is an accurate pianist with a clean, firm tone and can rap out impressive octaves. Though the opening movement did not have quite the lifting power a more bravura approach might have brought, he sailed through the finale with notable precision and sharp rhythms. Thomas and the orchestra supplied an uncommonly refined partnership in this heroic symphonic concerto.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

JAN 6 1972 New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 23 1972 New England

B Symphony

On Tilson Thomas

It is time that true music lovers speak up. (Michael) Steinberg (Globe critic) has been pushing for some time now the recognition of Mr. Tilson Thomas as the coming young genius of orchestra conductors. It is also obvious that in this respect Mr. Steinberg's strong friendship for Mr. Thomas has quite obscured Steinberg's acute critical judgment. If anyone else (Leinsdorf, for example) had directed the Brahm's Concerto in the lethargic manner as conducted by Thomas, that Mr. Steinberg would have become vitriolic.

Mr. Thomas is not a bad conductor but he has not the experience or the repertoire of musical knowledge that a great orchestra should expect in its leader. Why should such outstanding musicians have to rehearse and rehearse pieces of music they know so well just for Mr. Thomas to learn his music? . . . Let him conduct less important orchestras for several years to familiarize himself with the repertoire and to prepare himself properly before he is lead to believe he is ready to take over one of the world's great musical bodies . . .

BETTY ANTHONY
Cambridge

Brash Young Men and

Boston Symphony

Washington Post
January 11, 1972

By Lon Tuck

The thirtyish and somewhat retiring critic approaches with hesitation reviewing a concert like the Boston Symphony's last night at the Kennedy Center featuring those swinging, headstrong 26-year-olds, conductor Michael Tilson Thomas and pianist Misha Dichter.

Anything he writes that comes out as a barb at the under-30s could expose an unbecoming fustiness that he didn't think was there. And he may end up in the corner with those critics who stubbornly stick to nit-picking miscalculations such as, "Just think what Leonard Bernstein would be like if he had developed ALL his talent."

Yet at separate concerts recently, Thomas and Dichter each had seemed to these ears like artists whose development was, not surprisingly, still hampered by the brash young man syndrome, though each was clearly big league material —particularly the quick, bold, versatile Thomas.

Thomas, you may recall, is the chap who stepped before the Boston Symphony in a last-minute emergency several years ago and who not only came away a smash hit, but also almost got the conductorship of that venerable institution along with it. He is famous for his offbeat tastes, such as the recent remark that his musical

See BOSTON, B12, Col. 1

Music

The Brash Young Men of Boston

BOSTON, From B1

heroes are the obscure Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach and soul singer James Brown.

Dichter, a boyhood friend of Thomas, has been a slightly lower profile wunderkind, winning a Number Two in Moscow's Tchaikovsky competition and following it up with a full scale virtuoso career, with the focus on the blockbusters.

Last night's program didn't really change the earlier impressions of either man, but part of it, at least, was so well matched to Thomas' present style that it didn't much matter.

The program began with Stravinsky's cryptic Symphonies for Wind Instruments, one of the landmark pieces of 20th-century music, and the area in which Thomas carries the greatest authority at this time. In fact, he is a real master of the dry, highly abstract problems of Stravinsky's short composition, one of the first examples of the contemporary, both musical and literary, to put important statements in smaller packages. But for a few shaggy entrances, the performance would have been unbeatable.

After that, Thomas played a swashbuckling piece that shows it isn't all bad to be a brash young man, Borodin's Second Symphony. He reveled in the open, confident, late-19th-century Russian lines of the piece.

The trickiest piece came last, the First Concerto of Beethoven, a product turned out by that prodigy when he was 30. But the concerto is not necessarily a young man's music.

Its youthful exuberance was well in hand last night. The tempos were strong and the phrases were long and graceful. And both pianist and orchestra kept a consistently beautiful tone.

Yet the performance, through a lack of subtle inflection, missed the gutsy intimacy that gives this concerto its human quality. Beethoven's concerto is full of wit and playfulness, and those qualities the Thomas-Dichter team lacked.

The performance had a smooth, marble-in-the-moonlight perfection about it that reminds me of the Soviet pianist Emil Gilels' Beethoven playing. As with Gilels, it is lovely but misses too much of the music, I think.

The brash young man image persists for both performers. Yet Thomas' neat sidestepping of the issue disarms the carping critic. And Dichter's diversion from the blockbuster repertory, even if not yet a success, is commendable.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
B. 217,[illegible]

JAN 6 1972

New England Newsclip

Dichter: 'I play them all with love'

By Nora E. Taylor

Boston

Professional pianists practice all the hours there are and have no time for social or private life, right? Well, not always.

Misha Dichter disproves that dictum. True, he does practice at least five hours daily. But he is married—to a fellow performer he met at Juilliard—and the two have a 4½-month-old son. Family life keeps Mr. Dichter busy, too.

When Gabriel Sviatoslav Dichter (the baby is named to honor Sviatoslav Richter: "I admire him very much," Mr. Dichter said) was only a couple of months old his parents toured him around Japan with them. He came to Boston, too, and would be along on the rest of his father's Boston Symphony Orchestra tour.

Sitting lightly in a chair in one of the Symphony Hall studios, his wavy hair somewhat disheveled, his lively eyes awaiting the questions that would come, his rehearsal costume an ordinary jacket-and-pants outfit that no one would notice in a crowd, Mr. Dichter looked like any graduate student from one of the area colleges.

Concerts scheduled

But this young man was scheduled to be piano soloist for the Dec. 30, 31, Jan. 1 and 4 BSO concerts in the Boston area, and then to go with the symphony to New York for two concerts on Jan. 12 and 14, and to the Kennedy Center, Washington, on Jan. 10 and 13.

It was a long engagement for a free-lance performer. But it has to be remembered that this accomplished young man was invited to play with the BSO right after he won second place to a Soviet citizen in the Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow in 1966. And that was before any other orchestra in this country had engaged him. So the Boston weekend and the BSO tour were a sort of homecoming.

Mr. Dichter is a close friend of Michael Tilson Thomas, the associate conductor of the BSO. The two met originally in school in Los Angeles. Mr. Dichter admires him too. "Michael Tilson Thomas juxtaposes old and new," he said. "I like that."

He may not be an actual spokesman for the younger set in music, because "I have no time to listen to popular music," Mr. Dichter explained. Nevertheless, he has many of the same ideas.

"I think all young people have rather a fresh approach to things," he explained. "Young people generally are looking toward more interesting, more varied programs than their older colleagues."

Words documented

He documented his words by pointing out that symphony audiences of older people often leave at intermission before the more modern works come along. But the young turn out in droves for Bartok and Stravinsky and shun "Chopin and Brahms as being gooey," he said.

In Spain, he recalled, where his program called for Haydn, Schumann, Bartok, and Liszt, many older members in the audience "left for the Bartok and came back for the Liszt." It seems to be an international nonmeeting of the minds. For when young people come backstage nowadays to visit with him, "it is the Bartok and Stravinsky and not the Schumann they talk about."

Ciba and Misha Dichter

For himself, "I want to give them both. They are certainly different worlds, but if a person appreciates one he can the other. All I want to do is keep my horizons wide; I play them all with love." In echo of an earlier statement, he added, "Brahms at the moment is my favorite composer."

Next March he will be playing one or the other of his favorites in a concert in the Arts Across the River series sponsored by Harvard Business School. And in August he and his Brazilian wife, Ciba, will play a Mozart Two Piano Concerto in the Hollywood Bowl.

'On her horse . . .'

He made the arrangements for that concert before Gabriel was born, to give his wife something to look forward to. With the baby's care, of course, she cannot give the same time to practice that he does, but "I am starting to get her on her horse," he said, and there was a warm smile to accompany the words.

Mr. Dichter began his musical career by gravitating toward the piano in the house of friends of his parents. In Los Angeles he studied with a Schnabel pupil, Aube Tzerko, and at Juilliard with Rosina Lhevinne. It was she who, in effect, encouraged him to enter the Tchaikovsky competition.

After Van Cliburn's success there in 1958, the Tchaikovsky is on every young musician's list of things to try, he said. He suggested it to his teacher, and she promised, "If by three months before the competition you are of acceptable quality I will let you go." And then, he added, she emphasized not his possible part in the event but that if he went, "you are going to hear the cream of the world."

Just before he actually went to Moscow she said, "You know, I think you have a chance of getting into the finals." That was heady encouragement to the young man.

The competition lasted three weeks, and Mr. Dichter played three times. But since winning his silver medal he has been back to the Soviet Union and toured Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, and Odessa. "We have so many musical friends in Moscow now, going back is like a party," he said.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS
14,900

JAN 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Near the Waterfront

A Potpourri of people, places and things . . .

By LILLIAN BONO

DORCHESTER ARGUS
CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 9,800

DEC 30 1971 New Englan Newscl

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

DEC 24 1971 New Englan

Rubinstein is soloist

The Boston Symphony Pension Institution is pleased to announce Artur Rubinstein as the soloist in a concert of benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund, Wednesday, January 5 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. In his only Boston appearance this season, Mr. Rubinstein celebrates more than fifty years' association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In a concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, Mr. Rubinstein will perform the Rachmaninov Piano concerto and the Brahms Second Piano concerto.

Artur Rubinstein first performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 1, 1921. The conductor on that occasion was Pierre Monteux, and Mr. Rubinstein played Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4. In later seasons he played with the Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein and Erich Leinsdorf, and during recent years recorded the five Piano concertos of Beethoven, the B flat minor Concerto of Tchaikovsky, and the D minor Concerto of Brahms, all for RCA Victor under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

Mr. Rubinstein, still indefatigable, divides his time, when not performing, among his houses in Paris and the coast of Spain, and an apartment in New York. He gives concerts in every part of the world.

ford; three sisters, Mesdames Camille and Mary Bertolami and Mrs. Jean DeVito of Bayside New York.

* * *

Artur Rubinstein was soloist in a concert to benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund, last Wednesday, in Symphony Hall. In his only Boston appearance this season, Mr. Rubinstein celebrated more than fifty years' association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In a concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, Mr. Rubinstein performed the Rachmaninov Piano concerto and the Brahms Second Piano concerto.

Artur Rubinstein first performed with the Boston Sympnony Orchestra on April 1, 1921. The conductor on that occasion was Pierre Monteux, and Mr. Rubinstein played Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4. In later seasons he played with the Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein and Erich Leinsdorf, and during recent years recorded the five Piano concertos of Beethoven, the B flat minor Concerto of Tchaikovsky, and the D minor Concerto of Brahms, all for RCA Victor under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

Mr. Rubinstein, still indefatigable, divides his time, when not performing, among his houses in Paris and the coast of Spain, and an apartment in New York. He gives concerts in every part of the world, recently won an Oscar as the star of a feature film made in France called "L'amour de la vie", and is writing an autobiography. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is proud of its long association with Artur Rubinstein who is not only one of the greatest artists of our time, but also a man of immeasurable warmth, charm and wit.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 49,250

DEC 28 1971

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,00

DEC 27 1971

Rubenstein in benefit concert Jan. 5

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Pension Institution is pleased to announce Artur Rubin-

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

DEC 17 1971

Artur Rubinstein

. . . will mark a 50-year association with the Boston Symphony when he appears as soloist with the orchestra on Jan. 5 in the Second Piano Concertos of Rachmaninoff and Brahms, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting. The occasion is the annual Pension Fund concert at Symphony Hall.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

JAN 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Rubinstein's fingers fly for BSO fund

By Louis Snyder

At the end of the Boston Symphony's 155th Pension Fund concert on Wednesday evening in Symphony Hall, the soloist who had just played two concertos with the orchestra was recalled alone. It was practically understood that he would sit down again at the piano for a solo encore, and that is what happened.

The pianist was Artur Rubinstein, who was marking his 50th year of association with the BSO, and the encore was Chopin's Nocturne in D-flat. To say that it crowned an occasion compounded of such elements as admiration, wonder, sentiment, and occasionally outright astonishment, wouldn't be too far wrong.

Whereas the muscular demands of the Second Concertos of Brahms and Rachmaninoff were met with Rubinstein's accustomed titan authority, each note of the Chopin glowed like a multi-faceted gem. If it was Rubinstein's intention to make this his musical anniversary present to the orchestra (whose members sat as transfixed as the audience), it was a rare gift indeed. It would be hard to believe that everyone who heard it won't long remember with what beauty, feeling, and skill it was produced.

Tonal fireworks

Michael Tilson Thomas and the orchestra did Rubinstein the honor of providing a strongly accented and, for the most part, carefully meshed partnership in both works. The Andante of the Brahms was particularly ingratiating, sweeping into the finale with pianistic fingers and instrumental sparks flying. To have a combination of the Rubinstein-BSO stature play the Rachmaninoff C minor is to restore much of its dignity, once injured by the transformation of its Adagio into ballad form as "Full Moon and Empty Arms." Wednesday it sounded pristine again.

A capacity audience made no secret of its veneration of Mr. Rubinstein or its pleasure in the combined efforts of all the musicians onstage. Two of them, violinists Clarence Knudsen and Rolland Tapley, are also 50-year BSO veterans.

Rubinstein, of course, was his usual charming, gracious self, to his listeners and his colleagues. An annual visitor to Boston, this was his only appearance here this season. The closest he will come is Worcester, where he gives a solo recital tonight in Memorial Auditorium

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

DEC 29 1971

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

DEC 24 1971

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

DEC 22 1971

QUODLIBET

Rubinstein marks 50th BSO concert

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

Artur Rubinstein will celebrate 50 years of association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when he performs at the Pension Fund Concert Jan. 5 in Symphony Hall. He will perform the Rachmaninoff and Brahms Second Piano Concertos. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct.

The BSO concert is Rubinstein's only Boston appearance this season, but he will also give a recital at the Worcester Memorial Auditorium, Jan. 7.

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN
. . . Booked Jan. 5

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 6 1972 New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

A review

Rubenstein plays with BSO

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Arthur Rubinstein played with the Boston Symphony at the orchestra's pension fund concert last night. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted, and the program consisted simply of two big piano concertos, flat and C minor. ram also "Ruslan Overture, ncert be- Thomas announced estion of nd with all con- ture had One old- onalist in y booed, an again: n of Mr. with the LL con- peared a verybody uced one walls of nly four rs com- always— and then everybody settled into the Brahms. One of the loveliest features of the really extraordinary evening it turned out to be was the grace of the transitions from party to perfromance and back. Rubinstein on any concert stage instantly turns the occasion into festivity. But beyond that, this was a special party because it celebrated—albeit months late—the 50th anniversary of the 83-year-old pianist's first concert with the Boston Symphony.

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN
. . . Soloist

MICHAEL THOMAS
. . . Conductor

Rubinstein played both concertos very beautifully. His playing has become somewhat reduced in physical scale, and he has turned that fact to extraordinary advantage. It works even in "big" pieces like the Brahms and Rachmaninoff—in fact, part of the special pleasure in last night's performances was that the pieces were big, but not big and fat.

What Rubinstein does now has a similarity of surface to what you can hear on the recordings he made in the thirties—the difference is that his work now is more serious, though not more solemn, and that his musical taste is informed by a refinement that is a very sure and very exciting statement of "I really know."

There was a marvellous sense of ownership in his approach to both concertos. Many of the gestures of old-fashioned rhetoric were ones which have virtually been frozen into the performance tradition; last night, though, they sounded new. Rubinstein made those gestures not as though he had inherited them as part of a tradition, but with the special authority of one who had helped make that tradition.

The interpretations were cohesive, graceful, economical, truly elegant, and executed with unusual loveliness of sound, often with dazzling lightness, and always with marvellous dash. In whatever he did, Rubinstein was excellently backed by Thomas and the orchestra. The orchestral context was transparent and perfectly scaled to Rubinstein's playing, and in matters of both continuity and texture, this was —especially in the Brahms — some of the finest working together of a conductor and orchestra with a soloist that I have ever heard. And on its own terms, the playing of the Boston Symphony, much turned on by Rubinstein and by a sense of the occasion, was exceptionally fine.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 6 1972 New England Newsclip

Rubinstein Hailed At BSO Concert

By HARRY NEVILLE

Two of the musical world's most venerable institutions—Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony—appeared jointly in Symphony Hall last night. The occasion was the orchestra's annual pension fund benefit concert. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted, and the program consisted of the second piano concertos of Brahms and Rachmaninoff in both of which Rubinstein was the soloist.

Rubinstein is somewhat less than a decade younger than the 90-year-old BSO, and so it seems not at all irrelevant to mention that he remains the most durable, most glamorous of pianists, as well as one of the greatest living exponents of the romantic musical tradition. Ungracious as it may be, one might also mention that Rubinstein, at 80 plus years, displayed more vitality last night than the only slightly older BSO. One hopes that some of the magic—whatever it is—rubs off.

It would be pointless, at this late date, to attempt a detailed critical assessment of this master's playing. I would mention only that in the Brahms, which came first on the program, I though I detected a few signs of tiredness, a few points at which the playing was not assured and forceful. But then came the Rachmaninoff, and I was bowled over by the freshness and beauty of the performance. I was impressed all over again, too, by the naturalness and rightness of Rubinstein's famous rubato.

Thomas's conducting was more satisfactory in the Rachmaninoff than in the Brahms, where, as in last Thursday's concert, the phrasing seemed leaden and lacking in rhythmic impulse. The orchestra did tend to come alive whenever Rubinstein happened to be playing, which fortunately, was most of the time. It was clearly Rubinstein's night from beginning to end, and the man's past artistry alone would have justified the standing ovations he received. Fortunately, that artistry is still very much a fact.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

DEC 31 1971

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

DEC 24 1971

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN, renouned pianist, will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Pension Fund Concert on Jan. 5 at 8:30 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Michael Tilson thomas will conduct Rachmaninov's Piano concerto in C minor and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B Flat. Tickets are $5, 10, 15, 20 and $25. Tickets available by mail or in person. Box office, Symphony Hall, Boston 02115; call 266-1492.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

DEC 30 1971

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

DEC 30 1971 New England Newsclip

DEC 30 1971

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

DEC 30 1971

BSO Pension Concert Wed.

The Boston Symphony Pension Institution is pleased to announce

Artur Rubinstein as the soloist in a concert to benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund, Wednesday, Jan. 5 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

In his only Boston appearance this season, Mr. Rubinstein celebrates more than fifty years' association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In a concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, Mr. Rubinstein will perform the Rachmaninov Piano concerto and the Brahms Second Piano Concerto.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988

DEC 26 1971 Ne Engl

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

DEC 30 1971

INFORMATION OBSCURED

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS
14,900

JAN 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Near the Waterfront

A Potpourri of people, places and things . . .

By LILLIAN BONO

DORCHESTER ARGUS
CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 9,800

DEC 30 1971 New Englan Newscl

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

DEC 24 1971 New Englan

Rubinstein is soloist

The Boston Symphony Pension Institution is pleased to announce Artur Rubinstein as the soloist in a concert of benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund, Wednesday, January 5 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. In his only Boston appearance this season, Mr. Rubinstein celebrates more than fifty years' association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In a concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, Mr. Rubinstein will perform the Rachmaninov Piano concerto and the Brahms Second Piano concerto.

Artur Rubinstein first performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 1, 1921. The conductor on that occasion was Pierre Monteux, and Mr. Rubinstein played Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4. In later seasons he played with the Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein and Erich Leinsdorf, and during recent years recorded the five Piano concertos of Beethoven, the B flat minor Concerto of Tchaikovsky, and the D minor Concerto of Brahms, all for RCA Victor under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

Mr. Rubinstein, still indefatigable, divides his time, when not performing, among his houses in Paris and the coast of Spain, and an apartment in New York. He gives concerts in every part of the world. recently won an Oscar as the star of a feature film made in France called "L'amour de la vie", and is writing an autobiography. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is proud of its long association with Artur Rubinstein who is not only one of the greatest artists of our time, but also a man of immeasurable warmth, charm and wit.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 49,250

DEC 28 1971

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,000

DEC 27 1971

Rubenstein in benefit concert Jan. 5

BOSTON — The Boston S[illegible]mphony Pension Institution is pleased to ann[illegible]rtur Rubin- [illegible] benefit the [illegible], Jan. 5 at [illegible] only Boston [illegible]binstein cele- [illegible]ssociation with [illegible]. In a concert [illegible]mas, Mr. Rubin- [illegible]inov Piano con- [illegible]iano concerto.

[illegible]erformed with the [illegible] on April 1, 1921. [illegible]ccasion was Pierre [illegible]n played Beethoven's [illegible]ter seasons he played [illegible] the direction of Serge [illegible]Munch. Leonard Bern- [illegible]orf, and during recent [illegible]ive Piano concertos of [illegible]flat minor Concerto of [illegible] D minor Concerto of Brahms, all for [illegible] Victor under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

Mr. Rubinstein, still indefatigable, divides his time, when not performing, among his houses in Paris and the coast of Spain, and an apartment in New York. He gives concerts in every part of the world. recently won an Oscar as the star of a feature film in France called "L'amour de la vie," and is writing an autobiography. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is proud of its long association with Artur Rubinstein who is not only one of the greatest artists of our time, but also a man of immeasurable warmth, charm and wit.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

DEC 17 1971

[illegible] Friday, De[illegible]

In vic

We trust that [illegible]mph India's [illegible]mber Winston [illegible]unction: "In victo[illegible] She has had a mo[illegible] a woman, was [illegible] professional soldiery [illegible]id she know about w[illegible] mere few battles [illegible] woman, [illegible]

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

JAN 7 1972 New England Newsclip

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

DEC 24 1971 New Englan

DORCHESTER ARGUS
CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 9,800

DEC 30 1971 New Englan Newscl

under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

Mr. Rubinstein, still indefatigable, divides his time, when not performing, among his houses in Paris and the coast of Spain, and an apartment in New York. He gives concerts in every part of the world, recently won an Oscar as the star of a feature film made in France called "L'amour de la vie", and is writing an autobiography. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is proud of its long association with Artur Rubinstein who is not only one of the greatest artists of our time, but also a man of immeasurable warmth, charm and wit.

ford, three sisters, Mesdames Camille and Mary Bertolami and Mrs. Jean DeVito of Bayside New York.

* * *

Artur Rubinstein was soloist in a concert to benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund, last Wednesday, in Symphony Hall. In his only Boston appearance this season, Mr. Rubinstein celebrated more than fifty years' association with the Boston Sympnony Orchestra. In a concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, Mr. Rubinstein performed the Rachmaninov Piano concerto and the Brahms Second Piano concerto.

Artur Rubinstein first performed with the Boston Sympnony Orchestra on April 1, 1921. The conductor on that occasion was Pierre Monteux, and Mr. Rubinstein played Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4. In later seasons he played with the Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein and Erich Leinsdorf, and during recent years recorded the five Piano concertos of Beethoven, the B flat minor Concerto of Tchaikovsky, and the D minor Concerto of Brahms, all for RCA Victor

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

DEC 22 1971

[illegible]UDLIBE[illegible]

[illegible]eiamu will present [illegible]mporary Irish art to be [illegible] Weeden said.

[illegible]d sponsoring institutions [illegible]ram director, City Hall, [illegible]tor, Institute of Contem- [illegible]ustee, ICA; Mrs. Kather- [illegible]oundation, Dept. of Cul- [illegible]rector, The Erie Society; [illegible]t. of Contemporary Art, [illegible]d John Watts, chairman, [illegible] Humanities.

[illegible]ingus, has agreed to de- [illegible] Sy[illegible]ntings to Boston. [illegible] he [illegible] Fu[illegible] on the Arts and Humani- [illegible] Sym[illegible]ds the costs of the exhib- [illegible]perfor[illegible]r is being sought. [illegible] and [illegible] Gulf Oil. [illegible] Concer[illegible] Thoma[illegible]

The [illegible]binstein [illegible]pearance [illegible] he will a[illegible] a recital at the Worcester Memorial Auditorium, Jan. 7.

[illegible]ree that is simply mad ab[illegible] [illegible]he boy. Bo[illegible] [illegible]FLECTIONS/VOID". [illegible] Arts, 533 Tren[illegible] [illegible]center for the indefinite run. S[illegible] [illegible] at 8:30. [illegible]

Rubinstein's fingers fly for BSO fund

By Louis Snyder

At the end of the Boston Symphony's 155th Pension Fund concert on Wednesday evening in Symphony Hall, the soloist who had just played two concertos with the orchestra was recalled alone. It was practically understood that he would sit down again at the piano for a solo encore, and that is what happened.

The pianist was Artur Rubinstein, who was marking his 50th year of association with the BSO, and the encore was Chopin's Nocturne in D-flat. To say that it crowned an occasion compounded of such elements as admiration, wonder, sentiment, and occasionally outright astonishment, wouldn't be too far wrong.

Whereas the muscular demands of the Second Concertos of Brahms and Rachmaninoff were met with Rubinstein's accustomed titan authority, each note of the Chopin glowed like a multi-faceted gem. If it was Rubinstein's intention to make this his musical anniversary present to the orchestra (whose members sat as transfixed as the audience), it was a rare gift indeed. It would be hard to believe that everyone who heard it won't long remember with what beauty, feeling, and skill it was produced.

Tonal fireworks

Michael Tilson Thomas and the orchestra did Rubinstein the honor of providing a strongly accented and, for the most part, carefully meshed partnership in both works. The Andante of the Brahms was particularly ingratiating, sweeping into the finale with pianistic fingers and instrumental sparks flying. To have a combination of the Rubinstein-BSO stature play the Rachmaninoff C minor is to restore much of its dignity, once injured by the transformation of its Adagio into ballad form as "Full Moon and Empty Arms." Wednesday it sounded pristine again.

A capacity audience made no secret of its veneration of Mr. Rubinstein or its pleasure in the combined efforts of all the musicians onstage. Two of them, violinists Clarence Knudsen and Rolland Tapley, are also 50-year BSO veterans.

Rubinstein, of course, was his usual charming, gracious self, to his listeners and his colleagues. An annual visitor to Boston, this was his only appearance here this season. The closest he will come is Worcester, where he gives a solo recital tonight in Memorial Auditorium

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

DEC 29 1971

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

DEC 24 1971

[57]

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 6 1972 New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

A review

Rubenstein plays with BSO

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Arthur Rubinstein played with the Boston Symphony at the orchestra's pension fund concert last night. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted, and the program consisted simply of two big piano concertos, the Brahms in B flat and Rachmaninoffs in C minor. The printed program also listed Glinka's "Ruslan and Ludmila" Overture, but before the concert began BSO manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. announced that "at the suggestion of Mr. Rubinstein and with the agreement of all concerned" the overture had been dropped. One old-time Russian nationalist in the (left) balcony booed, and Mr. Perry began again: "At the suggestion of Mr. Rubinstein and with the agreement of ALL concerned . . ."

Rubinstein appeared a moment later. Everybody stood up and produced one of those rock-solid walls of applause which only four or five performers command—but they always—and then everybody settled into the Brahms. One of the loveliest features of the really extraordinary evening it turned out to be was the grace of the transitions from party to perfromance and back. Rubinstein on any concert stage instantly turns the occasion into festivity. But beyond that, this was a special party because it celebrated—albeit months late—the 50th anniversary of the 83-year-old pianist's first concert with the Boston Symphony.

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN
. . . Soloist

MICHAEL THOMAS
. . . Conductor

Rubinstein played both concertos very beautifully. His playing has become somewhat reduced in physical scale, and he has turned that fact to extraordinary advantage. It works even in "big" pieces like the Brahms and Rachmaninoff—in fact, part of the special pleasure in last night's performances was that the pieces were big, but not big and fat.

What Rubinstein does now has a similarity of surface to what you can hear on the recordings he made in the thirties—the difference is that his work now is more serious, though not more solemn, and that his musical taste is informed by a refinement that is a very sure and very exciting statement of "I really know."

There was a marvellous sense of ownership in his approach to both concertos. Many of the gestures of old-fashioned rhetoric were ones which have virtually been frozen into the performance tradition; last night, though, they sounded new. Rubinstein made those gestures not as though he had inherited them as part of a tradition, but with the special authority of one who had helped make that tradition.

The interpretations were cohesive, graceful, economical, truly elegant, and executed with unusual loveliness of sound, often with dazzling lightness, and always with marvellous dash. In whatever he did, Rubinstein was excellently backed by Thomas and the orchestra. The orchestral context was transparent and perfectly scaled to Rubinstein's playing, and in matters of both continuity and texture, this was —especially in the Brahms — some of the finest working together of a conductor and orchestra with a soloist that I have ever heard. And on its own terms, the playing of the Boston Symphony, much turned on by Rubinstein and by a sense of the occasion, was exceptionally fine.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

DEC 30 1971

DEC 30 1971 New England Newsclip

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

DEC 30 1971

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

DEC 30 1971

BSO Pension Concert Wed.

The Boston Symphony Pension Institution is pleased to announce Artur Rubinstein as the soloist in a concert to benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund, Wednesday, Jan. 5 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

In his only Boston appearance this season, Mr. Rubinstein celebrates more than fifty years' association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In a concert conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, Mr. Rubinstein will perform the Rachmaninov Piano concerto and the Brahms Second Piano Concerto.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988

DEC 26 1971 Ne

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

DEC 30 1971

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 6 1972 New England Newsclip

Rubinstein Hailed At BSO Concert

By HARRY NEVILLE

Two of the musical world's most venerable institutions—Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony—appeared jointly in Symphony Hall last night. The occasion was the orchestra's annual pension fund benefit concert. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted, and the program consisted of the second piano concertos of Brahms and Rachmaninoff in both of which Rubinstein was the soloist.

Rubinstein is somewhat less than a decade younger than the 90-year-old BSO, and so it seems not at all irrelevant to mention that he remains the most durable, most glamorous of pianists, as well as one of the greatest living exponents of the romantic musical tradition. Ungracious as it may be, one might also mention that Rubinstein, at 80 plus years, displayed more vitality last night than the only slightly older BSO. One hopes that some of the magic—whatever it is—rubs off.

It would be pointless, at this late date, to attempt a detailed critical assessment of this master's playing. I would mention only that in the Brahms, which came first on the program, I though I detected a few signs of tiredness, a few points at which the playing was not assured and forceful. But then came the Rachmaninoff, and I was bowled over by the freshness and beauty of the performance. I was impressed all over again, too, by the naturalness and rightness of Rubinstein's famous rubato.

Thomas's conducting was more satisfactory in the Rachmaninoff than in the Brahms, where, as in last Thursday's concert, the phrasing seemed leaden and lacking in rhythmic impulse. The orchestra did tend to come alive whenever Rubinstein happened to be playing, which fortunately, was most of the time. It was clearly Rubinstein's night from beginning to end, and the man's past artistry alone would have justified the standing ovations he received. Fortunately, that artistry is still very much a fact.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

DEC 31 1971

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

DEC 24 1971

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN, renouned pianist, will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Pension Fund Concert on Jan. 5 at 8:30 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Michael Tilson thomas will conduct Rachmaninov's Piano concerto in C minor and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B Flat. Tickets are $5, 10, 15, 20 and $25. Tickets available by mail or in person. Box office, Symphony Hall, Boston 02115; call 266-1492.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Spectrum Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas
conductor

IGOR Stra

1882–1971

2 retrospective concerts

January 7 8:30 p.m.
Symphonies of Wind Instruments
Introitus
Requiem Canticles
Rite of Spring

January 8 8:30 p.m.
Scenes de Ballet
Violin Concerto,
Joseph Silverstein soloist
Symphony of Psalms
with the New England Conservatory Chorus
Lorna Cooke De Varon, conductor

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG
Music Director

Tickets $3 $4.50 $5.50
available at the Symphony Hall Box Office 266-1492

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Spectrum Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas
conductor

IGOR Stra

1882-1971

2 retrospective concerts

January 7 8:30 p.m.
Symphonies of Wind Instruments
Introitus
Requiem Canticles
Rite of Spring

January 8 8:30 p.m.
Scenes de Ballet
Violin Concerto,
Joseph Silverstein soloist
Symphony of Psalms
with the New England Conservatory Chorus
Lorna Cooke De Varon, conductor

WILLIAM STEINBERG
Music Director

Tickets $3 $4.50 $5.50
available at the Symphony Hall Box Office 266-1492

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

JAN 5 1972 New England Newscli

Two concerts in Spectrum series set

BOSTON — The second series of concerts in the Spectrum series will take place Friday and Saturday evenings, Jan. 7 and 8 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct two all-Stravinsky concerts, Part I on Friday evening and Part II on Saturday evening.

Friday evening, Jan. 7, Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, Introitus, Requiem Canticles and the Rite of Spring. Saturday evening, January 8 the Orchestra will perform Scenes de Ballet, Violin Concerto, with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and the Symphony of Psalms. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, conductor, will assist the Orchestra in the Requiem Canticles and the Symphony of Psalms.

Between 1925 and 1949 Igor Stravinsky appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as pianist and conductor. He directed concerts of his own works in Boston, Cambridge, Providence and New York. The composer's link with the Orchestra was further strengthened by his dedication of the Concerto for piano and winds to Natalie Koussevitsky, of the Symphony of Psalms to the Boston Symphony orchestra, and of Ode to the memory of Natalie Koussevitsky. The Orchestra also gave several world and American premieres of Stravinsky's work, among them Symphony of Psalms, the suite from Pulcinella, Ode, Persephone, the Greetings prelude for the 80th birthday of Pierre Monteux, Four Norwegian moods, Oedipus rex and the Concerto for piano and winds.

All but the latecomers to the second Spectrum concert will have the opportunity to view an unusual display of well-known photographs of the late composer Igor Stravinsky. Beginning 20 minutes before concert time, photographs from Arnold Newman's book, BRAVO STRAVINSKY will be shown in a double image projection at the back of the stage.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

JAN 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Arnold Newman is contributing his work in BRAVO STRAVINSKY to be used in these special all-Stravinsky concerts. Newman was born in New York City in 1918. After much travel he returned to that city in 1946 and opened a studio.

He has been known as one of the most important American free-lance magazine and creative photographers — working for publications such as Look, Holiday, Life, Time, Fortune, Harper's Bazaar, Newsweek, and others. His work has taken him on extensive tours of the United States, Europe, Africa, and trips to the Middle and Far East. He became a friend of Stravinsky's. He was the only person allowed to photograph him in his home and at work during the late years of the composer's life.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

DEC 26 1971 New England

Tribute to Stravinsky

by Harry Neville

"STRAVINSKY FOILS ARREST BY PLAYING ANTHEM O.K.," said the headlines of a story that appeared Jan. 16, 1944, in a Boston newspaper. The item began: "Igor Stravinsky, Russian - born composer, who shocked a Symphony Hall audience by playinga strange and weird version of the 'Star Spangled Banner,' Friday afternoon, took the podium last night and led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the approved, orthodox version before a packed assembly. Whereupon a squad of 12 police, including a captain, sergeant and members of the radical squad, nodded to each other that 'everything is O.K.' and departed."

What Stravinsky had done at that memorable Friday afternoon concert was to conduct his own arrangement of the national anthem. It was an arrangement in which he had changed the melody slightly—to fit the voice range better, he explained —and rearranged the harmonies —to suggest a musical style resembling that of the Puritans, he explained, somewhat less convincingly. He had written this version, he said, as an expression of gratitude for the peace and opportunity he had found in America.

Some Bostonians, however—including a local patriotic organization—seemed to feel the arrangement was more an expression of contempt than of gratitude. As for those who were actually present in Symphony Hall when it was played, they seemed confused and bewildered. "Only a few of the first bars had been played," said one contemporary account, "when voices began to falter, eyebrows lifted and nearly everybody stopped singing, to let the orchestra finish alone its dissonant rendition of the well-known music."

In this 1939 photo Stravinsky is shown discussing the fine points of one of his scores with Arthur Fiedler. The scene is the Arlington St. Church, where the composer conducted a choral rehearsal.

What brought the police to Symphony Hall was the complaint of innumerable amateur lawyers that the statutes of Massachusetts prohibited alteration of the anthem. Chapter 264, Section 9 of the General Laws stated that the anthem must be played "as a whole or separate composition or number, without embellishment or addition in the way of national or other meodies." Apprised of the law and of the commotion his arrangement had created, Stravinsky decided not to repeat the performance, and thus ended what was undoubtedly the most sensational episode of the composer's numerous visits to Boston.

Perhaps the most important of these visits took place in 1939-40, when he delivered the lectures, from the Charles Eliot Norton Chair at Harvard, that became one of the most influential esthetic manifestos of modern times, the celebrated "Poetics." It was in Boston, too, that Stravinsky conducted a 1953 performance of his opera, "The Rake's Progress," staged in the Esquire Theater by one Sarah Caldwell, who several years later directed a controversial "mod" version of the same opera.

All that was in a past that seems quite distant. Now there are plans afoot here and elsewhere to celebrate the memory of this great composer who died last April at the age of 88. Ballet Theater will present new productions of two of his ballets this winter, and in the spring the New York City Ballet will present a season that includes a Stravinsky retrospective. Here in Boston the major commemoration will be the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan. 7 and 8, at which Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct two different programs, which, together will give a good idea of the astonishing diversity of Stravinsky.

Scheduled Jan. 7 are "Symphonies of Wind Instruments," "Introitus—T.S. Eliot in Memoriam," "Requiem Canticles" and "Le Sacre du Printemps." On Jan. 8, "Scenes de Ballet," the Violin Concerto in D and "Symphony of Psalms." Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO, will be the soloist in the concerto, and the choral group participating in the performance of the "Requiem Canticles" and "Symphony of Psalms" will be the New England Conservatory Chorus.

The performances will begin at 8:30 p.m. and will be preceded by a 20-minute slide show of Arnold Newman's photographs from the book "Bravo Stravinsky." These will be shown in a series of double-image projections covering the organ pipes at the back of the stage. In the lobby there will be a photographic exhibit as well as a display of the manuscript of the "Symphony of Psalms."

All this is being presented as part of the BSO's "Spectrum" series, which, with tickets priced at $3, $4.50 and $5.50 per concert, is surely one of Boston's great musical bargains. The first concert of this series was a great critical and popular success, and the upcoming concert promises to be just as exciting, although in a different way. I would urge all Stravinsky admirers to be present.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

JAN 7 1972 New England Newsclip

The PERFORMING ARTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays tribute to the late Igor Stravinsky in the second series of concerts in its Spectrum Series, begun this season. Two all Stravinsky concerts tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Tonight's Part I will feature The Rite of Spring and the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, Introitus and Requiem Canticles. Tomorrow the orchestra will perform Scenes de Ballet, Violin Concerto with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist and the Symphony of Psalms. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke DeVaron, conductor, will assist the orchestra in the Requiem Canticles and the Symphony of Psalms.

Between 1925 and 1949 Igor Stravinsky appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony as pianist and conductor. Photographs of the composer will be shown from Arnold Newman's book, "Bravo Stravinsky," beginning 20 minutes before concert time at both performances.

TRAVEL
FLORAL PARK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 279,000

JAN 1972

Celebrity Spotlight

By Edward N. Mintz

ceeds go to the League's Players' Pension Plan. . . . Martin Feinstein, top concert publicist and administrator leaves Hurok Concerts vice president post to serve as Executive Director of J.F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. . . . Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony in the second and third series of Spectrum Concerts, A Stravinsky Retrospective, Jan. 7, 8, and Four Religious Ceremonies Mar. 31 and April 1 in Boston Symphony Hall.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

JAN 5 1972

New Englan
Newscl

Two concerts in Spectrum series set

BOSTON — The second series of concerts in the Spectrum series will take place Friday and Saturday evenings, Jan. 7 and 8 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct two all-Stravinsky concerts, Part I on Friday evening and Part II on Saturday evening.

Friday evening, Jan. 7, Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, Introitus, Requiem Canticles and the Rite of Spring. Saturday evening, January 8 the Orchestra will perform Scenes de Ballet, Violin Concerto, with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and the Symphony of Psalms. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, conductor, will assist the Orchestra in the Requiem Canticles and the Symphony of Psalms.

Between 1925 and 1949 Igor Stravinsky appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as pianist and conductor. He directed concerts of his own works in Boston, Cambridge, Providence and New York. The composer's link with the Orchestra was further strengthened by his dedication of the Concerto for piano and winds to Natalie Koussevitsky, of the Symphony of Psalms to the Boston Symphony orchestra and of Ode to the memory of Natalie Koussevitsky. The Orchestra also gave several world and American premieres of Stravinsky's work, among them Symphony of Psalms, the suite from Pulcinella, Ode, Persephone, the Greetings prelude for the 80th birthday of Pierre Monteux, Four Norwegian moods, Oedipus rex and the Concerto for piano and winds.

All but the latecomers to the second Spectrum concert will have the opportunity to view an unusual display of well-known photographs of the late composer Igor Stravinsky. Beginning 20 minutes before concert time, photographs from Arnold Newman's book, BRAVO STRAVINSKY will be shown in a double image projection at the back of the stage.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

JAN 5 1972

New England
Newsclip

Arnold Newman is contributing his work in BRAVO STRAVINSKY to be used in these special all-Stravinsky concerts. Newman was born in New York City in 1918. After much travel he returned to that city in 1946 and opened a studio.

He has been known as one of the most important American free-lance magazine and creative photographers — working for publications such as Look, Holiday, Life, Time, Fortune, Harper's Bazaar, Newsweek, and others. His work has taken him on extensive tours of the United States, Europe, Africa, and trips to the Middle and Far East. He became a friend of Stravinsky's. He was the only person allowed to photograph him in his home and at work during the late years of the composer's life.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

DEC 26 1971

New
England

Tribute to Stravinsky

by Harry Neville

"STRAVINSKY FOILS ARREST BY PLAYING ANTHEM O.K.," said the headlines of a story that appeared Jan. 16, 1944, in a Boston newspaper. The item began: "Igor Stravinsky, Russian - born composer, who shocked a Symphony Hall audience by playinga strange and weird version of the 'Star Spangled Banner,' Friday afternoon, took the podium last night and led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the approved, orthodox version before a packed assembly. Whereupon a squad of 12 police, including a captain, sergeant and members of the radical squad, nodded to each other that 'everything is O.K.' and departed."

What Stravinsky had done at that memorable Friday afternoon concert was to conduct his own arrangement of the national anthem. It was an arrangement in which he had changed the melody slightly—to fit the voice range better, he explained—and rearranged the harmonies—to suggest a musical style resembling that of the Puritans, he explained, somewhat less convincingly. He had written this version, he said, as an expression of gratitude for the peace and opportunity he had found in America.

Some Bostonians, however—including a local patriotic organization—seemed to feel the arrangement was more an expression of contempt than of gratitude. As for those who were actually present in Symphony Hall when it was played, they seemed confused and bewildered. "Only a few of the first bars had been played," said one contemporary account, "when voices began to falter, eyebrows lifted and nearly everybody stopped singing, to let the orchestra finish alone its dissonant rendition of the well-known music."

In this 1939 photo Stravinsky is shown discussing the fine points of one of his scores with Arthur Fiedler. The scene is the Arlington St. Church, where the composer conducted a choral rehearsal.

What brought the police to Symphony Hall was the complaint of innumerable amateur lawyers that the statutes of Massachusetts prohibited alteration of the anthem. Chapter 264, Section 9 of the General Laws stated that the anthem must be played "as a whole or separate composition or number, without embellishment or addition in the way of national or other meodies." Apprised of the law and of the commotion his arrangement had created, Stravinsky decided not to repeat the performance, and thus ended what was undoubtedly the most sensational episode of the composer's numerous visits to Boston.

Perhaps the most important of these visits took place in 1939-40, when he delivered the lectures, from the Charles Eliot Norton Chair at Harvard, that became one of the most influential esthetic manifestos of modern times, the celebrated "Poetics." It was in Boston, too, that Stravinsky conducted a 1953 performance of his opera, "The Rake's Progress," staged in the Esquire Theater by one Sarah Caldwell, who several years later directed a controversial "mod" version of the same opera.

All that was in a past that seems quite distant. Now there are plans afoot here and elsewhere to celebrate the memory of this great composer who died last April at the age of 88. Ballet Theater will present new productions of two of his ballets this winter, and in the spring the New York City Ballet will present a season that includes a Stravinsky retrospective. Here in Boston the major commemoration will be the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan. 7 and 8, at which Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct two different programs, which, together will give a good idea of the astonishing diversity of Stravinsky.

Scheduled Jan. 7 are "Symphonies of Wind Instruments," "Introitus—T.S. Eliot in Memoriam," "Requiem Canticles" and "Le Sacre du Printemps." On Jan. 8, "Scenes de Ballet," the Violin Concerto in D and "Symphony of Psalms." Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO, will be the soloist in the concerto, and the choral group participating in the performance of the "Requiem Canticles" and "Symphony of Psalms" will be the New England Conservatory Chorus.

The performances will begin at 8:30 p.m. and will be preceded by a 20-minute slide show of Arnold Newman's photographs from the book "Bravo Stravinsky." These will be shown in a series of double-image projections covering the organ pipes at the back of the stage. In the lobby there will be a photographic exhibit as well as a display of the manuscript of the "Symphony of Psalms."

All this is being presented as part of the BSO's "Spectrum" series, which, with tickets priced at $3, $4.50 and $5.50 per concert, is surely one of Boston's great musical bargains. The first concert of this series was a great critical and popular success, and the upcoming concert promises to be just as exciting, although in a different way. I would urge all Stravinsky admirers to be present.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

JAN 7 1972

New England
Newsclip

The PERFORMING ARTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays tribute to the late Igor Stravinsky in the second series of concerts in its Spectrum Series, begun this season. Two all Stravinsky concerts tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Tonight's Part I will feature The Rite of Spring and the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, Introitus and Requiem Canticles. Tomorrow the orchestra will perform Scenes de Ballet, Violin Concerto with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist and the Symphony of Psalms. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke DeVaron, conductor, will assist the orchestra in the Requiem Canticles and the Symphony of Psalms.

Between 1925 and 1949 Igor Stravinsky appeared on many occasions with the Boston Symphony as pianist and conductor. Photographs of the composer will be shown from Arnold Newman's book, "Bravo Stravinsky," beginning 20 minutes before concert time at both performances.

TRAVEL
FLORAL PARK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 279,000

JAN 1972

Celebrity Spotlight

By Edward N. Mintz

ceeds go to the League's Players' Pension Plan. . . . Martin Feinstein, top concert publicist and administrator leaves Hurok Concerts vice president post to serve as Executive Director of J.F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. . . . Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony in the second and third series of Spectrum Concerts, A Stravinsky Retrospective. Jan. 7, 8, and Four Religious Ceremonies Mar. 31 and April 1 in Boston Symphony Hall.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961
JAN 8 1972
New England Newsclip

All-Stravinsky Concert Presented by BSO

By HARRY NEVILLE

Symphony Hall has come intensely, electrically alive this year on two occasions, the first being the initial concert in the Boston Symphony's new "Spectrum" series and the second, last night's concert in this same series. Not that the playing was the best the orchestra has done this year, for I believe that distinction goes to Seiji Ozawa's concert of a few weeks ago.

What I do mean is that at both "Spectrum" concerts there has been an intense interreaction—among audience members, between audience and orchestra, between audience and conductor. It's a phenomenon as exciting as it is rare nowadays — rare at symphony concerts anywhere, not just in Boston. It's a phenomenon for which everyone can thank Michael Tilson Thomas, whose brainchild this extraordinarily attractive series is.

WHAT DREW a predominantly young and all-nerve-ends-exposed audience to Symphony Hall last night was the first of a two-part series devoted to music by Igor Stravinsky. A paradoxical thing about the liveliness of the atmosphere was that the program was devoted largely to the rites of death: Symphonies of Wind Instruments (1920), written in memory of Debussy; Introitus (1965), textually based on portions of the Requiem Mass and written in memory of T. S. Eliot; and Requiem Canticles (1966), also based on parts of the Requiem Mass and also, one suspects, commemorating a great artist: Stravinsky of the 1920s and then a few bars of Stravinsky of the 1960s.

To these three pieces was added "The Rite of Spring," a touch which for this listener amounted to inspired programming. Aside from the austere nature and commemorative function of the first three works, they share, too, many stylistic features. It is a point that Thomas made instantly clear to the audience by playing first a few bars of Stravinsky of the 1960's.

Another thing these works have in common, it seems to me, is the absence of any feeling of hope or consolation in the face of death. Which is what made "The Rite" so compelling a conclusion to the evening, for this music seems to celebrate life in the face of death as no other work does.

The performances were all excellent with clear-textured, bright and incisive playing from the orchestra and some really impressive singing from the New England Conservatory Chorus. Contralto Pamela Gore and baritone David Evitts were the effective soloists in the Canticles. Thomas seems to have made it a custom at "Spectrum" concerts to include on each program an unannounced bonus piece. Last night it was the brief 1911 cantata for male chorus, "The King of the Stars."

Tonight's concert will again be all-Stravinsky. The works to be performed are: Scenes de Ballet, the Violin Concerto and Symphony of Psalms. I urge you to be there.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988
JAN 2 1972
New England Newsclip

(All-Stravinsky Concert Due

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony in an all-Stravinsky concert Jan. 7 and 8 at 3:30 p. m. in Symphony Hall. This is the second in a series of three Spectrum Concerts presented by the Orchestra.

An unusual display of photographs of the late composer, Igor Stravinsky, who appeared with the BSO on many occasions between 1923 and 1949 as pianist and conductor, will be featured. Twenty minutes before concert time, photographs from Arnold Newman's new book, "Bravo Stravinsky," will be screened.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003
JAN 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Spectrum Concerts Continue

The second series of concerts in the Spectrum series, begun this season, will take place Friday and Saturday at 8:30 p. m. in Symphony Hall, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting two all-Stravinsky concerts, Part I on Friday and Part II on Saturday evenings.

On Friday evening, Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, Introitus, Requiem Canticles and the Rite of Spring. On the following evening, the orchestra will perform Scenes de Ballet, Violin Concerto, with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and the Symphony of Psalms. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon conducting, will assist the orchestra in the Requiem Canticles and the Symphony of Psalms.

All but the latecomers to the second Spectrum concert will have the opportunity to view an unusual display of well-known photographs of the late composer Igor Stravinsky. Beginning 20 minutes before concert time, photographs from Arnold Newman's book, "Bravo Stravinsky," will be shown in a double image projection at the back of the stage.

Arnold Newman is contributing his work in "Bravo Stravinsky" to be used in these special all-Stravinsky concerts. Born in New York City in 1918, after much travel he returned to that city in 1946 and opened a studio.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234
JAN 6 1972
New Englan Newscl

BSO Concerts

The second series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Spectrum series, begun this season and hailed as "a joyous historical happening ... the audience was enthralled ..." (Christian Science Monitor), "A joyous festive, totally remarkable evening..." (Herald Traveler) will take place on Friday and Saturday evenings, Jan. 7 and 8 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct two all-Stravinsky concerts, part I or Friday evening and part II on Saturday evening.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000
JAN 6 1972
CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350
JAN 6 1972
TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200
JAN 6 1972
MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993
JAN 6 1972

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961
JAN 2 1972
New England Newsclip

music

Classical

TODAY

New England Chamber Orchestra, Endel Kalam conducting, with piano soloist Tonu Kalam; works of Pergolesi, Stravinsky, Mozart and Shostakovich; Gardner Museum, 4 p. m.

TUESDAY

Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, with piano soloist Misha Dichter; works of Brahms; Symphony Hall, 8:30 p. m.

WEDNESDAY

Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson conducting, with piano soloist Artur Rubinstein; works of Brahms and Rachmaninoff; Symphony Hall, 8:30 p. m.

FRIDAY

Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting works of Stravinsky; Symphony Hall, 8:30 p.m.

SATURDAY

Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting works of Stravinsky; Symphony Hall, 8:30 p. m.

Stravinsky

BY SUSAN RESSLER

Stravinsky's music is lean and spare, without ornamental padding. This is the man whose highly trimmed art could produce a mini-requiem, compressed to essentials. It was therefore distressing to see Michael Tilson Thomas flesh out that art with a series of superfluous antics, carnival style, that all but subverted the music in the BSO's, Friday and Saturday night Stravinsky Retrospective.

"I have just heard a conductor improve a work of mine with beauty treatments, daubing the music with lipstick and smothering it with face powder." This was Stravinsky's own comment on conductors who feel compelled to deliver the goods in a fancy package. Thomas apparently wanted to inform his audience -- there were slides and short commentaries before the pieces -- but an atmosphere of levity and cuteness marred the explications: "No, we have not discovered a sing along version of Sacre," Thomas quipped after the New England Conservatory Chorus had lumbered onstage.

They were about to perform an unscheduled work, The King of Stars. This piece, originally a present to Debussy, was considered so extraordinary in the context of Stravinsky's major works like the Sacre and Symphony of Psalms that it was played again the second night. Disappointed groans, however, emitted from the large portion of the audience which was attending both nights. Stravinsky's output was not prolific, but if additional works were needed, the "Orchestral Variations" at only four and a half minutes could have filled in.

It was principally this second concert which soured the Stravinsky Retrospective for me. The first night was flawed by some flippant comments, but the playing and sequencing of the music made it an exciting experience. Stravinsky once said, "The only true comment on a piece of music is another piece of music." The Symphonies for Winds, with its molting configurations of wind instruments and rhythmic pauses, prefigures sections of the Requiem Canticles. The pieces, moreover, have a spiritual affinity, a compression and etched sound that complement each other. These, with Introitus, are tense moody works that accent the furious release of energies that occurs in The Rite of Spring.

The Rite is almost guaranteed to be the high point of any concert. It is Stravinsky's most celebrated work, and perhaps his best, although composed as early as 1913. The late experiments in serialism never encroached upon its eminence; Thomas and the BSO should be commended for a stirring performance. The playing was frenetic but well articulated. The fevered strings and horns seemed engaged in a cataclysmic battle, a frantic melee which threatened to become chaos. Thomas ably steered the orchestra through the debris. Boulez, on a Columbia recording of the piece, evinces a similar exuberance which probably served as Thomas' model.

The second night's concert had a model, too, but this time of ostentatious showmanship. Thomas introduced the Scenes de Ballet with one of his "surprises" that were to continually mar the evening. Two trumpeters abruptly stood up and began to play like medieval heralds. It was astonishing because this was a Stravinsky fanfare composed for the opening of a New York theatre, and its dissonance, while a clever satire, did not merit these theatrics.

The Scenes de Ballet are so much pseudo-American kitsch. Casual music, Thomas designated it as an example of the "lush pre-'Sacre' period." The woman seated behind me had a different interpretation: "That's a funny piece of music, isn't it?" she mused at the Hollywood-like intensity. Admittedly, I am a prejudiced fan, favoring the early and later works over this middle Stravinskian diddling. Therefore, the neo-classical Violin Concerto which came after the re-run of The King of Stars, with its lengthy change of set (the chorus strolling on and off) was not especially exhilirating either. It, however, was adequately performed by the soloist, Joseph Silverstein, and he was duly applauded for his craftsmanship. Stravinsky achnowledges that this piece presents no technical difficulties, especially since he did not write a cadenza for it. After intermission, Thomas announced that he had another "surprise" for us. This time we heard Mrs. Stravinsky's favorite poem, "The Owl and the Pussycat," set to serial music. Miss Joan Heller sang the lyrics about the pig with the ring in his nose with remarkable presence, despite titters in the audience. And Thomas was very good playing single notes in a single octave range on piano. This was actually a rather pleasant interlude, but Thomas was having so much fun that he decided to go through it again! The concert closed with a rendition of the Symphony of Psalms in which the chorus, contrary to Stravinsky's specifications, predominated over the orchestra, so that the Psalms took on lullabye proportions.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

JAN 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas has done brilliant work in the past, and he professes to an intelligent philosophy of conducting: "My idea of a performance is one that presents new ideas about the music. Recordings have worked against this in music... There is no one way to play anything." In the Stravinsky Retrospective, Thomas demonstrated that there are at least two ways to play anything. One can position works in a context which allows their musical attributes to reinforce and explicate each other; or, one can hope that smiles and joking annexed to lighter works, avowedly not masterpieces, but more palatable, will suffice to sell out the box office. Sell out it did, but happily, the standing ovation was on the first night, after Sacre, when it was well deserved.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 200,961

JAN 16 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

A 'really different' series

by Harry Neville

With the Stravinsky retrospective that was given Jan. 7 and 8, the Boston Symphony's new "Spectrum" series of "really different" (as the publicity release has it) concerts is halfway over. "Really different" these events have been, and I'm sure that anyone who has attended or read about these concerts has been gratified by their success. These events have drawn full houses, the performances have been excellent, and — best of all — they have engendered a rare kind of excitement on the part of the audience and, one guesses, the players too.

To describe the excitement as "rare" is not to exaggerate. People who faithfully attend the regular Friday-Saturday BSO concerts have told me that they had never before experienced anything like the "Spectrum" concerts. Out-of-towners have been equally impressed. A gentleman from San Francisco wondered, "Why doesn't anything like this ever happen where I come from?" And a New Yorker wanted to know if BSO concerts were always this exciting. To the latter person I responded that regular BSO concerts weren't as exciting as these have been, and I added that I didn't suppose there was any way they could be made so.

I hope that I'm wrong in that estimate, but after thinking about the matter further I've seen no reason to change my mind. If there's a lesson to be learned from the "Spectrum" concerts, it's a lesson that would appear to have limited utility for the BSO. What this series demonstrates, it seems to me, is that there does exist a large, ready-made, relatively young and relatively untapped audience for symphony concerts — all of which contradicts the frequently expressed view that the orchestra concert nowadays is a dead institution, a museum in which old-fashioned works are played for an old-fashioned audience.

Unfortunately, I see no way in which the BSO or any other orchestra can put this lesson to great practical advantage. "Spectrum" has succeeded for a variety of reasons, among which the charisma of Michael Tilson Thomas and the shrewdness of the programming and of the publicity are important factors. But more important than these factors, I suspect, is the matter of ticket prices. Top price for "Spectrum" is little more than half the cost of a top-price seat for a regular BSO concert, which almost certainly means that "Spectrum" is, in effect, subsidized by the regular series. Now there is the possibility, of course, that the symphony trustees might like to try out something comparable to "Spectrum" on the subscribers who attend the Friday-Saturday concerts. I confess to being dubious about the success of such a venture, and yet there's nothing to lose and there's the possibility of something very big to be gained. It's true that we're never going to see the Friday afternoon patrons dance in the aisles of Symphony Hall, but I wonder if they wouldn't prefer a little more spice to the concerts than the trustees assume.

The Boston Opera Associa-

BSO Performs Stravinsky Work

By HARRY NEVILLE

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony Saturday night in the second and final part of that orchestra's Stravinsky retrospective. The program might have been entitled "The Best and Worst of Igor Stravinsky," for along with the Violin Concerto and the magnificent Symphony of Psalms it included "Scenes de Ballet," which comes mighty close to being a potboiler.

The work was written for a Broadway revue produced by Billy Rose, and one of the most entertaining things about the score is the exchange it prompted between producer and composer.

"YOUR MUSIC great success," Rose telegrammed Stravinsky, after a Philadelphia preview of the show. "Could be sensational success," he continued, "if you would authorize Robert Russell Bennett retouch orchestration. Bennett orchestrates even the works of Cole Porter." The unflappable composer wired back: "Satisfied with great success."

If "Scenes" is a potboiler — and many people think it is — it's nonetheless an elegantly crafted potboiler. More to the point, its inclusion on the program made for a well-rounded portrait of the artist, which is surely one of the purposes of a retrospective.

Other pieces of this portrait — put together of elements at once amazingly different, amazingly alike — were the Violin Concerto (1931) and the Symphony of Psalms (1930), the latter work written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony. ("How curious and how typical of Stravinsky," said one of the BSO players, "to include in this work no part for the celebrated Boston Symphony strings.")

Joseph Silverstein was soloist in the concerto, a work whose outer movements seem a witty commentary on 18th century examples of the genre and whose inner movements, as Roman Vlad points out, seem to yearn for the expressive values of that same era.

One can imagine an interpretation of this work quite different from Silverstein's but equally as good: a more biting, astringent performance, for example. But I can't imagine a performance that would convey better than his the etched-in-stone quality which the composer noted in the first movement, or the passion that lies just beneath the surface of the two arias.

THE SYMPHONY of Psalms, one of Stravinsky's most moving creations, was the exact work needed for the conclusion of the series. The New England Conservatory Chorus joined Thomas and the orchestra in a performance that captured beautifully the strange combination of austerity and fervor that makes the symphony so haunting a work.

The evening's surprises included the fanfare for two trumpets, brightly executed by Armando Ghitalla and Roger Voisin; a repeat from the previous evening of a short cantata, "The King of the Stars," and one of Stravinsky's very last works, a setting for soprano and piano of Edward Lear's "The Owl and the Pussycat," in which Thomas and soprano Joan Heller were the soloists.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 200,961

JAN 10 1972 New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,012 SUN. 506,377
JAN 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Thomas conducts Stravinsky

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

At Saturday night's Boston Symphony Spectrum concert, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the second half of his two-part Stravinsky retrospective. This time the principal works were the Symphony of Psalms, of which Thomas gave the kind of firm, unsentimental, self-denying, therefore profoundly religious performance I had otherwise heard only from Stravinsky himself, and the Violin Concerto, to which Joseph Silverstein brought all it wanted in grace, humor, quiet eloquence (in the Bachian second aria), and instrumental brilliance. The New England Conservatory Chorus sang the Psalms beautifully, with remarkable sharpness of accent and clarity of diction; the orchestral context for Silverstein's playing was admirably adjusted in the two arias, though rather nervous in the quick movements. It is surprising, but in this respect Silverstein had better luck with Leinsdorf in 1962 and 1965 than with Ozawa or Thomas since.

The program also included "Scenes de ballet," written in 1944 for Billy Rose's "Seven Lively Arts," and as unlisted surprises, the brilliant two-trumpet fanfare for the opening of the New York State Theater and dedicated to Balanchine and Lincoln Kirstein (Armando Ghitalla, Andre Come); the canata, "Svyesdoliki," which had been a Friday surprise, too (the men of the New England Conservatory Chorus), and Stravinsky's last completed work, the setting for soprano and piano of Lear's "The Owl and the Pussycat," which pleased the audience so much that it was repeated (Joan Heller, Michael Tilson Thomas).

At both concerts, there were articulate, informed and loving, nonpatronizing comments by Thomas, and the two occasions were splendidly dressed up by projections of some of the uncannily alive Arnold Newman photographs from the "Bravo Stravinsky" book.

To that I should like to add that I hope Thomas and the Symphony do not think that they have now done enough of a Stravinsky retrospective. Another such pair of concerts next season would be most welcome, and to go by the size and enthusiasm of Friday's and Saturday's audiences, I am sure that this is no idiosyncratic notion of mine. It is easy to make up a list of Stravinsky pieces which have not been heard here for a long time or indeed ever—"Threni," "A Sermon, a Narrative, and a Prayer," "The Flood," "Canticum Sacrum," the "Von Himmel hoch" Variations, "Persephone," the Capriccio, "Danses Concertantes," "Les Noces," the early Symphony in E flat — and the point is made only more urgent by the fact that in Michael Tilson Thomas we have an exceptionally qualified interpreter of Stravinsky's music. And as we were shown Friday and Saturday, a great orchestra.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
JAN 11 1972
New England Newsclip

Limelight
...focus on the arts

In Concert

A Stravinsky Spectacular

By Peter M. Knapp

A visitor from the West Coast returning to Boston after a 15-year absence was puzzled by the Symphony Hall scene. "Tell me," he asked, "do the players really perform in their shirtsleeves? Has Boston really gone so informal?"

Well yes, for the Spectrum series of concerts being arranged and conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with the Boston Symphony. The musicians do play in their shirtsleeves or sport shirts, Thomas comes on in Picasso blue, vest but no jacket, there's a good deal of informality, and the kind of yeasty atmosphere one would like to sense at every concert.

Different Look

The Spectrum concerts have been attracting full houses and a different, younger audience than the normal subscription programs. Beards and beads, shawls and jeans, hair down to here or fuzzed up in globules, stripes and swirls . . . They're alert and interested — and so far, these younger audiences are being turned on by what Michael Thomas is doing in this extraordinarily invigorating series.

Spectrum II and III, Friday and Saturday nights, were devoted to a Stravinsky Retrospective, honoring the memory of the protean composer who died last year, an overdue homage from the BSO. To help set the atmosphere, there were exhibitions of scores and photos of Igor Stravinsky and photographs from Arnold Newman's book, "Bravo Stravinsky", were projected against a screen above the stage.

But the music, after all, was the thing, and Thomas put together two programs that were enormously vital in conception and execution. Rank him as one of the finest Stravinsky interpreters.

The programs demonstrated Stravinsky's incredible variety of styles and fertility of imagination. There were works representative of his various periods. Friday's program contained the Symphonies of Wind Instruments (1920), "Introitus" (1965), the "Requiem Canticles" (1966), and "Le Sacre du Printemps" (1913). Saturday's included the "Scenes de Ballet" (1944), the Violin Concerto (1931) and the Symphony of Psalms (1930) — commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its 50th anniversary.

And as in the first Spectrum concert, Thomas added a few surprises — a work in Russian for chorus and orchestras, "The King of the Stars," composed as a present for Debussy just before "Le Sacre" (performed both nights with the men's chorus of the New England Conservatory); and on Saturday a fanfare for two trumpets written for the opening of the New York State Theatre; and Stravinsky's farewell — a whimsical, serial setting of "The Owl and the Pussycat" for soprano (Joan Heller) and piano (Thomas) which so delighted the audience that it was repeated.

Long Span

That's an oceanic span of styles — post-Romantic Russian, neo-classicism, serialism, the "rhetoric of Broadway" in the charming and amusing "Scenes from Ballet" with its outrageous parodies (a work composed with relish for Billy Rose!), the homage to Bach in the Violin Concerto, the profundity of the "Symphony of Psalms," the mystic, ritualistic quality of "Introitus — T.S. Eliot in Memoriam."

One might go on and on, for this pair of concerts was that kind of stimulating event, But suffice it to say that the music-making was vital, the orchestra played superbly (showing evident traces of careful preparation), and the young choristers from the Conservatory, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon, made major contributions in "Introitus," "Requiem Canticles" and "Symphony of Psalms."

Thomas again was an informative host in introducing the works, and even more communicative in his musical leadership. His direction produced lean and lucid sonorities and a dazzling sense of shape and detail. He does wonders with the Stravinsky rhythms, sharp and sure in the most complex metrical patterns.

His accompaniment Friday of BSO Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein — whose performances of the Violin concert over the season have been special events — was brilliant. For once, the jaunty, bantering interplay came out chrome-clean. Silverstein's playing of the two Arias forming the middle sections between the brilliant passagework and wry skips is a sublime achievement.

The "Symphony of Psalms" flowed majestically on an exalted plane — a moving performance of a beautiful score. But what really set the adrenaline flowing Friday was Thomas' sensational reading of "Le Sacre du Printemps." It had enormous vitality and lucidity. A rhythmic orgy of stabbing ostinati; snap, crackle, pop from percussion and brass. Symphony Hall must still be vibrating from the thrusting "Dance of the Earth" climax of Part 1. A good high.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
JAN 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony's Thomas: a spectral candidate?

By Louis Snyder

Now is the time that all good men (and women) are declaring themselves — coming to the aid of the party. On the Boston musico-political scene there's a big job open — the music directorship of the Boston Symphony — and since the present incumbent, William Steinberg, is not choosing to run here again, election day may be any day now. Who's in line, and who'll put him in?

The nearest thing to a primary was held in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday evenings, when the second pair of concerts in this season's Spectrum Series, under Michael Tilson Thomas, took place. These are experimental programs, devised by Mr. Thomas in furtherance of his expressed championship of logical musical contiguity within an evening's playing and listening. And since the three Spectrum events are outside the regular subscription, the orchestra's associate conductor has taken the opportunity to let down some traditional bars where presentation and repertory are concerned, without turning either the BSO or Symphony Hall upside down or inside out.

Orchestra members dress informally — free of jackets or long skirts. Mr. Thomas has a few words to say now and then as a kind of genial program commentator. The content of the first October program ranged from four trumpets playing Gabrieli in the balcony, to four electric organs playing Steve Reich on a darkened stage. This weekend's programs comprised a two-part Stravinsky Retrospective, with soloists, Lorna Cooke de Varon's top-notch New England Conservatory Chorus, and pre-concert and intermission photo slides, shown above the stage, of Arnold Newman's stunning photos of Stravinsky at work and at leisure.

'Sacre' to 'Psalms'

On Friday, a sold out house was treated to a searing, sizzling "Sacre du Printemps," with the full orchestra at its most incisive; the dramatic 1966 Requiem Canticles in a first Boston performance with the NEC Chorus, contralto Pamela Gore (in a superhuman exploration of her lowest register), baritone David Evitts in fine form, joined by soprano Beverly Morgan and tenor David Dusing from the conservatory; the engaging Symphonies of Wind Instruments; and the difficult "Introitus — T. S. Eliot in Memorian," sung by the NEC male chorus. They also added a Stravinsky curiosity, "King of the Stars," which the composer wrote to a purple text in honor of Debussy, and repeated it on Saturday as a bonus extra.

Saturday's large audience heard Stravinsky's "Scènes de Ballet," written for the Billy Rose revue, "Seven Lively Arts"; a luscious reading by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein of the handsomely trim Violin Concerto in D; a surprise turn (repeated) of Edward Lear's sly "The Owl and the Pussycat," set by the composer as his "envoi," in a charming duo performance by the ever-amazing Boston soprano, Joan Heller, with Mr. Thomas as an octave playing owl at the piano; and to conclude, a rich, affecting collaboration of chorus and orchestra in the BSO's "own" Symphony of Psalms, commissioned to mark its 50th anniversary, lo, 41 years ago!

Both nights in the hall there were, of course, familiar faces, but by and large this was a new, young audience, attentive and demonstrably appreciative. They had to be told where the phone booths and the drinking fountains are, but not when to applaud or please to stop rattling their programs. They showed understandable discrimination — the "Introitus," for instance, never quite made contact, and the "Scènes de Ballet" induced a few snickers, as well they might. But obviously the Spectrum Series has broken the ice as far as the BSO is concerned, and they identify very closely with Mr. Thomas as the one who brought it about.

There was a standing ovation on Friday, a rafter-ringing response to conductor, orchestra, and chorus on Saturday. Leaving the hall both evenings, one sensed the telling conversational compound of surprise, excitement, and satisfaction that adds up to enthusiasm for an impressive, revelatory experience.

Mr. Thomas, like other equally busy candidates, shows no signs of running for office. He's still Boston Symphony's associate conductor, and is in his first season as music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic. Two years ago he made a striking impression in his own right at his debut in Symphony Hall, before the world discovered him as an assistant suddenly catapulted by circumstance to a position of first responsibility. Since then he has been in demand as a guest conductor on three continents. And he is only 26 or so.

It is no secret that the Boston Symphony's trustees and overseers feel a need for closer relations with the ever-widening metropolitan public. Pops, Esplanade, Youth Concerts, Summerthing—yes. But here is a youthful public which comes, almost without being urged, to sample an inviting new concept. And goes away loving it. And its instigator. There's more to the job than that, of course, but in these days it's considerable.

Voting for Thomas, anyone?

Hookailo Studio

Michael Tilson Thomas

Stravinsky

BY SUSAN RESSLER

Stravinsky's music is lean and spare, without ornamental padding. This is the man whose highly trimmed art could produce a mini-requiem, compressed to essentials. It was therefore distressing to see Michael Tilson Thomas flesh out that art with a series of superfluous antics, carnival style, that all but subverted the music in the BSO's, Friday and Saturday night Stravinsky Retrospective.

"I have just heard a conductor improve a work of mine with beauty treatments, daubing the music with lipstick and smothering it with face powder." This was Stravinsky's own comment on conductors who feel compelled to deliver the goods in a fancy package. Thomas apparently wanted to inform his audience -- there were slides and short commentaries before the pieces -- but an atmosphere of levity and cuteness marred the explications: "No, we have not discovered a sing along version of Sacre," Thomas quipped after the New England Conservatory Chorus had lumbered onstage.

They were about to perform an unscheduled work, The King of Stars. This piece, originally a present to Debussy, was considered so extraordinary in the context of Stravinsky's major works like the Sacre and Symphony of Psalms that it was played again the second night. Disappointed groans, however, emitted from the large portion of the audience which was attending both nights. Stravinsky's output was not prolific, but if additional works were needed, the "Orchestral Variations" at only four and a half minutes could have filled in.

It was principally this second concert which soured the Stravinsky Retrospective for me. The first night was flawed by some flippant comments, but the playing and sequencing of the music made it an exciting experience. Stravinsky once said, "The only true comment on a piece of music is another piece of music." The Symphonies for Winds, with its molting configurations of wind instruments and rhythmic pauses, prefigures sections of the Requiem Canticles. The pieces, moreover, have a spiritual affinity, a compression and etched sound that complement each other. These, with Introitus, are tense moody works that accent the furious release of energies that occurs in The Rite of Spring.

The Rite is almost guaranteed to be the high point of any concert. It is Stravinsky's most celebrated work, and perhaps his best, although composed as early as 1913. The late experiments in serialism never encroached upon its eminence; Thomas and the BSO should be commended for a stirring performance. The playing was frenetic but well articulated. The fevered strings and horns seemed engaged in a cataclysmic battle, a frantic melee which threatened to become chaos. Thomas ably steered the orchestra through the debris. Boulez, on a Columbia recording of the piece, evinces a similar exuberance which probably served as Thomas' model.

The second night's concert had a model, too, but this time of ostentatious showmanship. Thomas introduced the Scenes de Ballet with one of his "surprises" that were to continually mar the evening. Two trumpeters abruptly stood up and began to play like medieval heralds. It was astonishing because this was a Stravinsky fanfare composed for the opening of a New York theatre, and its dissonance, while a clever satire, did not merit these theatrics.

The Scenes de Ballet are so much pseudo-American kitsch. Casual music, Thomas designated it as an example of the "lush pre-'Sacre' period." The woman seated behind me had a different interpretation: "That's a funny piece of music, isn't it?" she mused at the Hollywood-like intensity. Admittedly, I am a prejudiced fan, favoring the early and later works over this middle Stravinskian diddling. Therefore, the neo-classical Violin Concerto which came after the re-run of The King of Stars, with its lengthy change of set (the chorus strolling on and off) was not especially exhilirating either. It, however, was adequately performed by the soloist, Joseph Silverstein, and he was duly applauded for his craftsmanship. Stravinsky achnowledges that this piece presents no technical difficulties, especially since he did not write a cadenza for it. After intermission, Thomas announced that he had another "surprise" for us. This time we heard Mrs. Stravinsky's favorite poem, "The Owl and the Pussycat," set to serial music. Miss Joan Heller sang the lyrics about the pig with the ring in his nose with remarkable presence, despite titters in the audience. And Thomas was very good playing single notes in a single octave range on piano. This was actually a rather pleasant interlude, but Thomas was having so much fun that he decided to go through it again! The concert closed with a rendition of the Symphony of Psalms in which the chorus, contrary to Stravinsky's specifications, predominated over the orchestra, so that the Psalms took on lullabye proportions.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 269,961

JAN 16 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

A 'really different' series

by Harry Neville

With the Stravinsky retrospective that was given Jan. 7 and 8, the Boston Symphony's new "Spectrum" series of "really different" (as the publicity release has it) concerts is halfway over. "Really different" these events have been, and I'm sure that anyone who has attended or read about these concerts has been gratified by their success. These events have drawn full houses, the performances have been excellent, and — best of all — they have engendered a rare kind of excitement on the part of the audience and, one guesses, the players too.

To describe the excitement as "rare" is not to exaggerate. People who faithfully attend the regular Friday-Saturday BSO concerts have told me that they had never before experienced anything like the "Spectrum" concerts. Out-of-towners have been equally impressed. A gentleman from San Francisco wondered, "Why doesn't anything like this ever happen where I come from?" And a New Yorker wanted to know if BSO concerts were always this exciting. To the latter person I responded that regular BSO concerts weren't as exciting as these have been, and I added that I didn't suppose there was any way they could be made so.

I hope that I'm wrong in that estimate, but after thinking about the matter further I've seen no reason to change my mind. If there's a lesson to be learned from the "Spectrum" concerts, it's a lesson that would appear to have limited utility for the BSO. What this series demonstrates, it seems to me, is that there does exist a large, ready-made, relatively young and relatively untapped audience for symphony concerts — all of which contradicts the frequently expressed view that the orchestra concert nowadays is a dead institution, a museum in which old-fashioned works are played for an old-fashioned audience.

Unfortunately, I see no way in which the BSO or any other orchestra can put this lesson to great practical advantage. "Spectrum" has succeeded for a variety of reasons, among which the charisma of Michael Tilson Thomas and the shrewdness of the programming and of the publicity are important factors. But more important than these factors, I suspect, is the matter of ticket prices. Top price for "Spectrum" is little more than half the cost of a top-price seat for a regular BSO concert, which almost certainly means that "Spectrum" is, in effect, subsidized by the regular series. Now there is the possibility, of course, that the symphony trustees might like to try out something comparable to "Spectrum" on the subscribers who attend the Friday-Saturday concerts. I confess to being dubious about the success of such a venture, and yet there's nothing to lose and there's the possibility of something very big to be gained. It's true that we're never going to see the Friday afternoon patrons dance in the aisles of Symphony Hall, but I wonder if they wouldn't prefer a little more spice to the concerts than the trustees assume.

The Boston Opera Associa-

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

JAN 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas has done brilliant work in the past, and he professes to an intelligent philosophy of conducting: "My idea of a performance is one that presents new ideas about the music. Recordings have worked against this in music... There is no one way to play anything." In the Stravinsky Retrospective, Thomas demonstrated that there are at least two ways to play anything. One can position works in a context which allows their musical attributes to reinforce and explicate each other; or, one can hope that smiles and joking annexed to lighter works, avowedly not masterpieces, but more palatable, will suffice to sell out the box office. Sell out it did, but happily, the standing ovation was on the first night, after Sacre, when it was well deserved.

BSO Performs Stravinsky Work

By HARRY NEVILLE

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony Saturday night in the second and final part of that orchestra's Stravinsky retrospective. The program might have been entitled "The Best and Worst of Igor Stravinsky," for along with the Violin Concerto and the magnificent Symphony of Psalms it included "Scenes de Ballet," which comes mighty close to being a potboiler.

The work was written for a Broadway revue produced by Billy Rose, and one of the most entertaining things about the score is the exchange it prompted between producer and composer.

"YOUR MUSIC great success," Rose telegrammed Stravinsky, after a Philadelphia preview of the show. "Could be sensational success," he continued, "if you would authorize Robert Russell Bennett retouch orchestration. Bennett orchestrates even the works of Cole Porter." The unflappable composer wired back: "Satisfied with great success."

If "Scenes" is a potboiler — and many people think it is — it's nonetheless an elegantly crafted potboiler. More to the point, its inclusion on the program made for a well-rounded portrait of the artist, which is surely one of the purposes of a retrospective.

Other pieces of this portrait — put together of elements at once amazingly different, amazingly alike — were the Violin Concerto (1931) and the Symphony of Psalms (1930), the latter work written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony. ("How curious and how typical of Stravinsky," said one of the BSO players, "to include in this work no part for the celebrated Boston Symphony strings.")

Joseph Silverstein was soloist in the concerto, a work whose outer movements seem a witty commentary on 18th century examples of the genre and whose inner movements, as Roman Vlad points out, seem to yearn for the expressive values of that same era.

One can imagine an interpretation of this work quite different from Silverstein's but equally as good: a more biting, astringent performance, for example. But I can't imagine a performance that would convey better than his the etched-in-stone quality which the composer noted in the first movement, or the passion that lies just beneath the surface of the two arias.

THE SYMPHONY of Psalms, one of Stravinsky's most moving creations, was the exact work needed for the conclusion of the series. The New England Conservatory Chorus joined Thomas and the orchestra in a performance that captured beautifully the strange combination of austerity and fervor that makes the symphony so haunting a work.

The evening's surprises included the fanfare for two trumpets, brightly executed by Armando Ghitalla and Roger Voisin; a repeat from the previous evening of a short cantata, "The King of the Stars," and one of Stravinsky's very last works, a setting for soprano and piano of Edward Lear's "The Owl and the Pussycat," in which Thomas and soprano Joan Heller were the soloists.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 269,961

JAN 10 1972 New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JAN 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Thomas conducts Stravinsky

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

At Saturday night's Boston Symphony Spectrum concert, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the second half of his two-part Stravinsky retrospective. This time the principal works were the Symphony of Psalms, of which Thomas gave the kind of firm, unsentimental, self-denying, therefore profoundly religious performance I had otherwise heard only from Stravinsky himself, and the Violin Concerto, to which Joseph Silverstein brought all it wanted in grace, humor, quiet eloquence (in the Bachian second aria), and instrumental brilliance. The New England Conservatory Chorus sang the Psalms beautifully, with remarkable sharpness of accent and clarity of diction; the orchestral context for Silverstein's playing was admirably adjusted in the two arias, though rather nervous in the quick movements. It is surprising, but in this respect Silverstein had better luck with Leinsdorf in 1962 and 1965 than with Ozawa or Thomas since.

The program also included "Scenes de ballet," written in 1944 for Billy Rose's "Seven Lively Arts," and as unlisted surprises, the brilliant two-trumpet fanfare for the opening of the New York State Theater and dedicated to Balanchine and Lincoln Kirstein (Armando Ghitalla, Andre Come); the canata, "Svyesdoliki," which had been a Friday surprise, too (the men of the New England Conservatory Chorus), and Stravinsky's last completed work, the setting for soprano and piano of Lear's "The Owl and the Pussycat," which pleased the audience so much that it was repeated (Joan Heller, Michael Tilson Thomas).

At both concerts, there were articulate, informed and loving, nonpatronizing comments by Thomas, and the two occasions were splendidly dressed up by projections of some of the uncannily alive Arnold Newman photographs from the "Bravo Stravinsky" book.

To that I should like to add that I hope Thomas and the Symphony do not think that they have now done enough of a Stravinsky retrospective. Another such pair of concerts next season would be most welcome, and to go by the size and enthusiasm of Friday's and Saturday's audiences, I am sure that this is no idiosyncratic notion of mine. It is easy to make up a list of Stravinsky pieces which have not been heard here for a long time or indeed ever—"Threni," "A Sermon, a Narrative, and a Prayer," "The Flood," "Canticum Sacrum," the "Von Himmel hoch" Variations, "Persephone," the Capriccio, "Danses Concertantes," "Les Noces," the early Symphony in E flat — and the point is made only more urgent by the fact that in Michael Tilson Thomas we have an exceptionally qualified interpreter of Stravinsky's music. And as we were shown Friday and Saturday, a great orchestra.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
JAN 11 1972
New England Newsclip

Limelight
...focus on the arts

In Concert

A Stravinsky Spectacular

By Peter M. Knapp

A visitor from the West Coast returning to Boston after a 15-year absence was puzzled by the Symphony Hall scene. "Tell me," he asked, "do the players really perform in their shirtsleeves? Has Boston really gone so informal?"

Well yes, for the Spectrum series of concerts being arranged and conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with the Boston Symphony. The musicians do play in their shirtsleeves or sport shirts, Thomas comes on in Picasso blue, vest but no jacket, there's a good deal of informality, and the kind of yeasty atmosphere one would like to sense at every concert.

Different Look

The Spectrum concerts have been attracting full houses and a different, younger audience than the normal subscription programs. Beards and beads, shawls and jeans, hair down to here or fuzzed up in globules, stripes and swirls . . . They're alert and interested — and so far, these younger audiences are being turned on by what Michael Thomas is doing in this extraordinarily invigorating series.

Spectrum II and III, Friday and Saturday nights, were devoted to a Stravinsky Retrospective, honoring the memory of the protean composer who died last year, an overdue homage from the BSO. To help set the atmosphere, there were exhibitions of scores and photos of Igor Stravinsky and photographs from Arnold Newman's book, "Bravo Stravinsky", were projected against a screen above the stage.

But the music, after all, was the thing, and Thomas put together two programs that were enormously vital in conception and execution. Rank him as one of the finest Stravinsky interpreters.

The programs demonstrated Stravinsky's incredible variety of styles and fertility of imagination. There were works representative of his various periods. Friday's program contained the Symphonies of Wind Instruments (1920), "Introitus" (1965), the "Requiem Canticles" (1966), and "Le Sacre du Printemps" (1913). Saturday's included the "Scenes de Ballet" (1944), the Violin Concerto (1931) and the Symphony of Psalms (1930) — commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its 50th anniversary.

And as in the first Spectrum concert, Thomas added a few surprises — a work in Russian for chorus and orchestras, "The King of the Stars," composed as a present for Debussy just before "Le Sacre" (performed both nights with the men's chorus of the New England Conservatory); and on Saturday a fanfare for two trumpets written for the opening of the New York State Theatre; and Stravinsky's farewell — a whimsical, serial setting of "The Owl and the Pussycat" for soprano (Joan Heller) and piano (Thomas) which so delighted the audience that it was repeated.

Long Span

That's an oceanic span of styles — post-Romantic Russian, neo-classicism, serialism, the "rhetoric of Broadway" in the charming and amusing "Scenes from Ballet" with its outrageous parodies (a work composed with relish for Billy Rose!), the homage to Bach in the Violin Concerto, the profundity of the "Symphony of Psalms," the mystic, ritualistic quality of "Introitus — T.S. Eliot in Memoriam."

One might go on and on, for this pair of concerts was that kind of stimulating event. But suffice it to say that the music-making was vital, the orchestra played superbly (showing evident traces of careful preparation), and the young choristers from the Conservatory, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon, made major contributions in "Introitus," "Requiem Canticles" and "Symphony of Psalms."

Thomas again was an informative host in introducing the works, and even more communicative in his musical leadership. His direction produced lean and lucid sonorities and a dazzling sense of shape and detail. He does wonders with the Stravinsky rhythms, sharp and sure in the most complex metrical patterns.

His accompaniment Friday of BSO Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein — whose performances of the Violin concert over the season have been special events — was brilliant. For once, the jaunty, bantering interplay came out chrome-clean. Silverstein's playing of the two Arias forming the middle sections between the brilliant passagework and wry skips is a sublime achievement.

The "Symphony of Psalms" flowed majestically on an exalted plane — a moving performance of a beautiful score. But what really set the adrenaline flowing Friday was Thomas' sensational reading of "Le Sacre du Printemps." It had enormous vitality and lucidity. A rhythmic orgy of stabbing ostinati; snap, crackle, pop from percussion and brass. Symphony Hall must still be vibrating from the thrusting "Dance of the Earth" climax of Part 1. A good high.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
JAN 10 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony's Thomas: a spectral candidate?

By Louis Snyder

Now is the time that all good men (and women) are declaring themselves — coming to the aid of the party. On the Boston musico-political scene there's a big job open — the music directorship of the Boston Symphony — and since the present incumbent, William Steinberg, is not choosing to run here again, election day may be any day now. Who's in line, and who'll put him in?

The nearest thing to a primary was held in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday evenings, when the second pair of concerts in this season's Spectrum Series, under Michael Tilson Thomas, took place. These are experimental programs, devised by Mr. Thomas in furtherance of his expressed championship of logical musical contiguity within an evening's playing and listening. And since the three Spectrum events are outside the regular subscription, the orchestra's associate conductor has taken the opportunity to let down some traditional bars where presentation and repertory are concerned, without turning either the BSO or Symphony Hall upside down or inside out.

Orchestra members dress informally — free of jackets or long skirts. Mr. Thomas has a few words to say now and then as a kind of genial program commentator. The content of the first October program ranged from four trumpets playing Gabrieli in the balcony, to four electric organs playing Steve Reich on a darkened stage. This weekend's programs comprised a two-part Stravinsky Retrospective, with soloists, Lorna Cooke de Varon's top-notch New England Conservatory Chorus, and pre-concert and intermission photo slides, shown above the stage, of Arnold Newman's stunning photos of Stravinsky at work and at leisure.

'Sacre' to 'Psalms'

On Friday, a sold out house was treated to a searing, sizzling "Sacre du Printemps," with the full orchestra at its most incisive; the dramatic 1966 Requiem Canticles in a first Boston performance with the NEC Chorus, contralto Pamela Gore (in a superhuman exploration of her lowest register), baritone David Evitts in fine form, joined by soprano Beverly Morgan and tenor David Dusing from the conservatory; the engaging Symphonies of Wind Instruments; and the difficult "Introitus — T. S. Eliot in Memorian," sung by the NEC male chorus. They also added a Stravinsky curiosity, "King of the Stars," which the composer wrote to a purple text in honor of Debussy, and repeated it on Saturday as a bonus extra.

Saturday's large audience heard Stravinsky's "Scènes de Ballet," written for the Billy Rose revue, "Seven Lively Arts"; a luscious reading by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein of the handsomely trim Violin Concerto in D; a surprise turn (repeated) of Edward Lear's sly "The Owl and the Pussycat," set by the composer as his "envoi," in a charming duo performance by the ever-amazing Boston soprano, Joan Heller, with Mr. Thomas as an octave playing owl at the piano; and to conclude, a rich, affecting collaboration of chorus and orchestra in the BSO's "own" Symphony of Psalms, commissioned to mark its 50th anniversary, lo, 41 years ago!

Both nights in the hall there were, of course, familiar faces, but by and large this was a new, young audience, attentive and demonstrably appreciative. They had to be told where the phone booths and the drinking fountains are, but not when to applaud or please to stop rattling their programs. They showed understandable discrimination — the "Introitus," for instance, never quite made contact, and the "Scènes de Ballet" induced a few snickers, as well they might. But obviously the Spectrum Series has broken the ice as far as the BSO is concerned, and they identify very closely with Mr. Thomas as the one who brought it about.

There was a standing ovation on Friday, a rafter-ringing response to conductor, orchestra, and chorus on Saturday. Leaving the hall both evenings, one sensed the telling conversational compound of surprise, excitement, and satisfaction that adds up to enthusiasm for an impressive, revelatory experience.

Mr. Thomas, like other equally busy candidates, shows no signs of running for office. He's still Boston Symphony's associate conductor, and is in his first season as music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic. Two years ago he made a striking impression in his own right at his debut in Symphony Hall, before the world discovered him as an assistant suddenly catapulted by circumstance to a position of first responsibility. Since then he has been in demand as a guest conductor on three continents. And he is only 26 or so.

It is no secret that the Boston Symphony's trustees and overseers feel a need for closer relations with the ever-widening metropolitan public. Pops, Esplanade, Youth Concerts, Summerthing—yes. But here is a youthful public which comes, almost without being urged, to sample an inviting new concept. And goes away loving it. And its instigator. There's more to the job than that, of course, but in these days it's considerable.

Voting for Thomas, anyone?

Hookaijo Studio

Michael Tilson Thomas

[63]

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
JAN 8 1972
New England Newsclip

Thomas brings off difficult feat

Stravinsky evening glitters

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Last night in Symphony Hall, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the first of a pair of Stravinsky programs which together make up the second event in the Boston Symphony's new Spectrum series.

First there was a series of memorial pieces, the Symphonies of Wind Instruments (1920) for Debussy, the Introitus (1965) for T. S. Elliot, and the Requim Canticles (1966), dedicated to the memory of Helen Buchanan Seeger, whose son commissioned the work, but with the recent deaths of Edgard Varese, Alberto Giacometti, and Evelyn Waugh very much in the composer's mind. The second half began with the male-chorus cantata, "Svyesdoliki," also written for Debussy, though during his life-time, and finished with "Le Sacre Du Printemps," which offended Debussy, though he is very much present in it.

It was a program that went from the extreme expression of abundant physical energy in "Le sacre" to the extreme expression of its absence in the Eliot Introitus. It was fascinating — more than that, moving — to hear how unmistakably Stravinsky always remained himself, how true to his sense of musical gesture and of sonority, even when the differences of rhetoric and apparatus are as great as between the massive "Sacre" and the bone-dry Introitus. And, conversely, how richly diverse his utterances were, even when, as in the Introitus and the Requiem Canticles, text, occasion, date, all work together to produce a host of surface similarities.

The Introitus is austere, inward, quiet, a beautiful example of "multum in parvo." The Canticles are big in sound, full of dramatic changes of musical character, and, with all their compression, exuberant. "Svyesdoliki" (usually translated as "The King of the Stars"), a setting of a battily mystical text by Balmont, is the work that immediately precedes "Le Sacre," and in its idiosyncratic chromaticism and voluptuous scoring it was Stravinsky's last lush piece.

Thomas conducted this exceedingly difficult program with sympathy, skill, and exciting vitality. The Symphonies of Wind Instruments, which is a dance both sacred and profane, went beautifully.

The Introitus and Canticles were a little coarse in sonority — certainly compared to what I remember of the performances that Claudio Spies conducted in Cambridge in the summer of 1968 (and surely it was a mistake to encourage the chorus to half-shout the Dies Irae, which Stravinsky marks "sotto voce")— but in both pieces the shape and sense of movement were persuasively conveyed. "Svyesdoliki" was orderly and intelligible — no small achievement—but too open in sound and lacking in magic.

The New England Conservatory Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon, contributed competently in the three choral pieces, and the exceptionally able soloists in the Canticles were Pamela Gore, alto, and David Evitts, baritone. The Boston Symphony's Stravinsky retrospective continues tonight with Thomas conducting "Scenes de Ballet," the Violin Concerto (Joseph Silverstein), and the Symphony of Psalms (New England Conservatory Chorus).

PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 25,000
JAN 26 1972
New England Newsclip

Music: Stravinsky Retrospective

By John Robinson

STRAVINSKY RETROSPECTIVE
Boston Symphony Orchestra
At Symphony Hall

In the second of his Spectrum Series concerts at Symphony Hall, Michael Tilson Thomas gave us a well conceived, smartly mounted and beautifully executed pair of concerts — a memorable Stravinsky retrospective, Friday and Saturday nights, January 7th and 8th.

The opulence of Symphony Hall was co-opted by opulence. Gone, the array of organ pipes downstage, covered with a wide white screen. Gone, the statues standing in the niches high around the second balcony, hidden by slide projectors. Gone, the tuxedos, too. Let them play in shirtsleeves.

Thomas is exciting and accessible to neophyte and long-time listeners alike and abhorrent only to those who matter least — those subscribers who just take up space. Like the woman sitting next to me at one concert who did anagrams with the composers names during the concert.

Since he came to Boston three years ago, Thomas has been trying to add spontaneity to symphony concerts. Once last year he ran on stage after intermission and began to play a Mozart overture long before all the people were seated. This in the best 18th century tradition. The result was chaos. People trampling to their seats so they wouldn't miss a note. What they missed was Thomas's point.

Thomas has continued to pipe fresh air into Symphony Hall. Unlike previous Spectrum concerts where he relied on offbeat pieces, for the Stravinsky concerts he relegated gimmicks to the background.

I got to Symphony Hall about one half-hour early. It was almost dark. Alone, a tympanist softly practiced a few riffs on a dark stage. Above him on the screen I mentioned before a series of black and white photographs by Arnold Newman were being projected, variously depicting Stravinsky conducting, posing and composing. Beautiful pictures. And the way they were projected did them justice. From the five projectors pictures of different widths could be shown side by side. As one photo dissolved, another from a second projector superimposed itself, becoming clearer as the first disappeared and as a third next to them remained unchanged. Pictures appeared, disappeared and reappeared in this way until the concert began.

Friday's concert began with Symphonies of Wind Instruments. Actually it began with Thomas talking about it a little. Stravinsky, he said, wanted the piece played mezzo forte with no dynamic variation, the variety to come chiefly from rhythm. Where The Rite of Spring, which was also played, is a work of volcanic power and energy, nascent and raw, Symphonies of Wind Instruments, composed seven years later, is a more honed down, spare version in the style of Rite of Spring, without its passion.

Requiem Canticles, Stravinsky's last major work (1965), was composed after he was converted to serial composing (Schoenberg's method, devised in the early part of this century. Basically it is a system where the composer arranges the 12 tones of the chromatic scale in a succession of his choice. Within a given piece, he can then alter notes only according to the system; thus, it consists of modified repetitions of the originally chosen tone row.).

About the only exceptions I can think of which manage to transcend the intellectuality inherent in the 12-tone system are a few works by Berg and the Requiem Canticles, which I heard for the first time Friday night. The short piece, which Stravinsky called a mini or pocket requiem, is as good as the requiems of Faure and Brahms though very differently conceived. I think the key to the Canticles and its emotional appeal is revealed in the emotional emasculation of the serial technique and Stravinsky's desperate attempt to overcome it. Sung to perfection by the New England Conservatory Chorus and soloists Pamela Gore (contralto) and David Evitts (baritone), the Canticles attempt to transcend fear of death and doubt of the possibility of salvation. The culmination is a Libera Me, a frenetic plea spoken by the chorus and sung by four soloists.

* * *

Saturday's concert was full of surprises, not listed in the program, more evidence of Thomas's interest in spontaneity. The concert began with a trumpet fanfare — very nice. Next came the programmed Scenes de Ballet written in 1944 in, Thomas said, the middle of Stravinsky's California period. The piece was commissioned by, no joke, Billy Rose for his Broadway review, "The Seven Lively Arts." Stravinsky took up the project with enthusiasm and sent Rose a piano reduction of the score. Rose replied with a telegram: "YOUR MUSIC GREAT SUCCESS STOP COULD BE SENSATIONAL SUCCESS IF YOU WOULD AUTHORIZE ROBERT RUSSELL BENNETT RETOUCH ORCHESTRATION STOP BENNETT ORCHESTRATES EVEN THE WORKS OF COLE PORTER." The music is light and pleasant. It even has a memorable melody, played by the trumpets in perfect consonance up to an almost Mozartean leading tone that resolves to a discreetly dissonant close.

Next came another surprise — King of the Stars which, according to Thomas again, is almost never played because it requires a chorus that can sing in Russian and in tune at the same time. A big production number with enormous orchestra and chorus about pioneers defending themselves against disaster and preparing to harvest corn. Impressive. It had also been played as a surprise on Friday night but sounded better on Saturday.

The only real disappointment for me in the two concerts was the Violin Concerto in D, which came next. The orchestra played beautifully and so did Joseph Silverstein as solo violinist. He's great to watch, even when he's sitting in his concertmaster's chair. But the concerto itself is smack in the middle of Stravinsky's neo-classic period, where he sacrificed almost everything for the sake of form. In the third movement, called Aria 2, there was a hint of plaintiveness in the music, but unlike the Canticles, Stravinsky didn't transcend the limitations of the form he imposed on himself.

The last piece on the program for Saturday was Symphony of Psalms. But before it was played Thomas announced, that's right, another surprise. He walked on stage with Joan Heller and proceeded to explain that after Stravinsky had written the Canticles he felt that he didn't want to leave the musical world on such a serious note. So he took one of his favorite poems and set it for soprano and piano. The poem? Edward Lear's "The Owl and the Pussycat." The music is in the 12-tone style, but it enhances the total effect. One of English literature's best nonsense verses set in a very serious and intellectual style. All two or three minutes of it were charming. The audience loved it and the big chorus, on stage ready to sing "Symphony of Psalms," started stomping on the floor. So they did it again, Thomas at the piano.

Of all the music played last weekend, Symphony of Psalms was my favorite. Stravinsky wrote this beautiful piece in 1930, a year before the violin concerto. In the sense that the concert was a retrospective, perhaps Thomas should have left us with the Canticles as Stravinsky's last important work.

But people have a way of wanting to be left with some kind of affirmation. Symphony of Psalms is such a piece. It is three Psalms (13, 14 and 150) set for orchestra and large chorus. Psalm 13 is a supplication for recovery and strength. The text of Psalm 14 tells us of waiting patiently for the Lord. The music on the other hand is not patient at all. It is a tribute to Thomas that he emphasized Stravinsky's solemn, loud but calm, and anxious, rather than patient, waiting. The whole section quivers with the anticipation of the exultation to follow in the third and final Psalm, the well-known number 150, "Praise ye the Lord." The chorus breaks into an Alleluia which builds to a level of spiritual inebriation which falls and rises by turns in an effort to praise God in every imaginable way. ■

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112

JAN 14 1972

Music Notes

Ressel to Conduct Viennese Concert

By THOMAS PUTNAM

ROY WAAS, WHO is one of two principal French horn players in the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchester (the other is William Lane) will be soloist with the orchestra, playing Mozart's Concerto in D Major, K. 412, for the Viennese pops concert at 8:30 p.m. Jan. 21 in Kleinhans Music Hall. Fred Ressel will conduct.

Besides playing horn in the Philharmonic, Waas was in the computer research department of Cornell Aeronautical Laboratory. It is not Waas's ability to play beautiful horn notes that interests Cornell Lab, however, but techniques he gained through earning his doctorate in engineering from the Case Institute of Technology.

Waas played horn with the Kansas City Philharmonic in 1946. Two years later he joined the Cleveland Orchestra, where he remained until 1966.

FRED RESSEL comes from the viola section of the Philharmonic. He is director of his own chamber orchestra, the Buffalo Symphonette, which gives a small series of concerts at the end of the summer.

In one of the Symphonette programs in 1970, Ressel featured Waas in a performance of Benjamin Britten's Serenade for tenor (Warren Hoffer), horn and strings, a beautiful work which Waas and Hoffer repeated last spring with the Philharmonic under Lukas Foss.

The Viennese pops program includes music by a trio of Strausses: Johann Strauss Sr. ("Radetzky" march), Johann Strauss (waltz from "Wiener Blut," overture to "The Gypsy Baron" and "The Blue Danube"), and Edouard Strauss ("Clear Track").

Other works are Suppe's "Light Cavalry" overture, Och's Variations on an Austrian Folk Song, Lehar's waltz from "The Merry Widow," and the first half of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony.

MICHAEL TILSON Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening in New York, an all-Brahms program in Philharmonic Hall of Lincoln Center. On the program are the Serenade No. 2 in A, and the Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor, with Misha Dichter. Thomas is the associate conductor of the Boston orchestra, in addition to being music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic. He returns to Buffalo for a Mozart program Feb. 6 and 8.

Fred Ressel
. . . Viennese program

HARVEY PHILLIPS, tuba with the New York Brass Quintet, will give a recital at 8:30 p.m. today in the Concert Hall of the Michael C. Rockefeller Arts Center at Fredonia State College. Phillips also is with the New York City Ballet Orchestra, and the Bell Telephone Hour Orchestra.

The program will include works by three American composers, who will be in attendance: Walter Hartley, Alec Wilder and Warren Benson.

Other works are Vaughan Williams' Concerto for Bass Tuba, and Hindemith's Sonata for Tuba and Piano.

Assisting artists are Dean Boal, piano, who is chairman of the college's music department; C. Rudolph Emilson, tuba player from the college's music faculty; and Sandra Hartley, wife of the composer of Suite for Flute and Tuba.

A series of workshops and clinics conducted by Phillips will begin at 9 a.m. Saturday in the College Theater. All events are open to the public.

NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
D. 2,800

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
D. 6,735

JAN 7 1972

JAN 7 1972

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
D. 12,420

VALLEY NEWS
LEBANON, N. H.
D. 9,083

JAN 7 1972

JAN 8 1972

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
D. 4,150

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

JAN 7 1972

JAN 8 1972

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
D. 5,627

CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
D. 8,600

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
D. 045

JAN 10 1972

JAN 7 1972

JAN 7 1972

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
D. 41,749

NEWS
MILFORD, MASS.
D. 11,172

JAN 7 1972

JAN 7 1972

New England Newsclip

SUN
HUDSON, MASS.
D. 3,050

JAN 7 1972

WESTPORT NEWS
WESTPORT, CONN.
SEMI-WEEKLY 10,000

JAN 12 1972

New England Newsclip

THOMAS ON BRAHMS

BOSTON (UPI) — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct an all-Brahms concerts Jan. 12 and 14 at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall, it was announced Thursday.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

JAN 14 1972

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Cosi Fan Tutte," with Teresa Zylis-Gara, Rosalind Elias, Teresa Stratas, Pietro Bottazzo, Theodor Uppmann, Walter Berry; John Pritchard, conductor; 8.

New York City Ballet: "Bugaku," "Donizetti Variations," "Valse Fantaisie," "Symphony in C"; N. Y. State Theater, 8.

American Ballet Theater: "Theater," "La Fille mal Gardee"; City Center Theater, 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Misha Dichter, pianist; all-Brahms program: "Serenade No. 2," 'Piano Concerto No. 1"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

DEE BERRY

TIME
GREENWICH, CONN.
D. 13,160

JAN 13 1972

New England Newscl

ALL-BRAHMS

The Boston Symphony will play an all-Brahms program under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. at Philharmonic Hall. Another similar program will be presented with William Stienberg on Saturday at 8 p.m. at Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

JAN 22 1972

MUSICAL EVENTS

The Specialists

LAST Wednesday night in Philharmonic Hall, a twenty-five-year-old conductor and a twenty-six-year-old pianist played a program of music by a twenty-six-year-old composer. The conductor was Michael Tilson Thomas, the pianist was Misha Dichter, and the composer was Johannes Brahms, who at twenty-six or thereabouts had already completed his First Piano Concerto in D Minor, Opus 15, and his Serenade No. 2, in A, Opus 16, for Orchestra, which together made up the entire program. The orchestra was the Boston Symphony. After my initial enormous enthusiasm for the work of Mr. Thomas, I found myself a bit disappointed the other night. He did not seem to have the wonderful Bostonians under full control, and their playing was flaccid to the point of absentmindedness. The Serenade went by and left no impression on me. The concerto came off a good deal better, though there was a certain hurried quality about it that detracted from its incisiveness. As for Mr. Dichter, he is a fluent and able young pianist, with technique to spare, but he is not yet capable of giving this particular concerto the brilliance and excitement that more mature pianists have given it. Both his and Mr. Thomas's performances in the concerto were expert enough to be listenable. But the bite, the controlled frenzy, and the powerful propulsion that it demands seemed to be beyond them.

Boston Symphony at Philharmonic

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the third series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall Wednesday and Friday evenings, January 12 and 14, at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is pianist Misha Dichter.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

JAN 14 1972

A Nice Idea at Boston's Concert

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, with Misha Dichter, piano, At Philharmonic Hall.
Serenade No. 2; Piano Concerto No. 1
Brahms

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

As an alternative to the Brahms symphonies, those magnificent but overplayed works, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the A major Serenade at his Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night. (Perhaps he might also take a look at the first three Tchaikovsky suites as alternatives to the overplayed Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies of that composer.)

It was a nice idea, as so many of Mr. Thomas's program ideas are. The A major Serenade, the one for small orchestra minus violins, is a very charming work—lyric, sensitive, flowing. Easily one of the most attractive products of Brahms's youth, it has been consistently ignored by our hotshot conductors, who insist on making the bigger splash that the C minor Symphony offers.

Mr. Thomas gave the score a diligent performance, though not one that captured the real quality of the music. Tempos were a little too slow and careful; metrical patterns too regular; dynamics a bit limp. This was more a reading than a real interpretation. As yet, Mr. Thomas has not made the A major Serenade part of him. It is by no means so weighty and solemn an affair as he made it out to be.

To balance the Serenade on this Brahms program, there was the D minor Piano Concerto played by Misha Dichter. Long past are the days when this was considered so intellectual a piece of music, so demanding technically, that only a few pianists would touch it. Today every young pianist cuts his teeth on the Brahms D minor, most of them playing it as their graduation piece. The four-minute mile, the Brahms D minor—all are in the public domain. A new breed of athletes, on the track and on the keyboard, has come into existence.

And Mr. Dichter played the work like a superbly trained athlete. The notes, well-organized, flowed effortlessly along, and the harder the configurations, the easier they sounded. Mr. Dichter is a hugely competent technician.

•

But is he yet the pianist to take the full measure of the Brahms D minor? Not yet. Despite the keyboard proficiency and marksmanship, or perhaps because of it (that concentration on sheer literal accuracy above everything else), an element of poetry, of color, of imagination was missing.

There was drive rather than poetry; percussion rather than nuance. Mr. Dichter still has to learn how to modify his rather percussive touch (one thinks of the brittle octaves at the end of the first movement), and how to use the pedals to maximum effect. In a way this was depersonalized playing, so characteristic of many young pianists today: efficiency plus, but less feeling of involvement than one would want. Mr. Thomas supplied a carefully integrated account of the orchestral score, working closely with the pianist but not doing much on his own.

FM GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 1972

. . Philharmonic Hall will host the Boston Symphony on the 12th and 14th, and the Philadelphia Orchestra on the 18th . . . The Handel Society Chorus and Orchestra,

HERALD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 9 1972

TIME OFF CALENDAR: January 9th-15th

Boston Symphony (at Philharmonic Hall): 12th and 13th, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts all-Brahms program, with Misha Dichter, piano. 15th, William Steinberg (no soloists).

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112

JAN 14 1972

Music Notes

Ressel to Conduct Viennese Concert

By THOMAS PUTNAM

ROY WAAS, WHO is one of two principal French horn players in the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchester (the other is William Lane) will be soloist with the orchestra, playing Mozart's Concerto in D Major, K. 412, for the Viennese pops concert at 8:30 p.m. Jan. 21 in Kleinhans Music Hall. Fred Ressel will conduct.

Besides playing horn in the Philharmonic, Waas was in the computer research department of Cornell Aeronautical Laboratory. It is not Waas's ability to play beautiful horn notes that interests Cornell Lab, however, but techniques he gained through earning his doctorate in engineering from the Case Institute of Technology.

Waas played horn with the Kansas City Philharmonic in 1946. Two years later he joined the Cleveland Orchestra, where he remained until 1966.

FRED RESSEL comes from the viola section of the Philharmonic. He is director of his own chamber orchestra, the Buffalo Symphonette, which gives a small series of concerts at the end of the summer.

In one of the Symphonette programs in 1970, Ressel featured Waas in a performance of Benjamin Britten's Serenade for tenor (Warren Hoffer), horn and strings, a beautiful work which Waas and Hoffer repeated last spring with the Philharmonic under Lukas Foss.

The Viennese pops program includes music by a trio of Strausses: Johann Strauss Sr. ("Radetzky" march), Johann Strauss (waltz from "Wiener Blut," overture to "The Gypsy Baron" and "The Blue Danube"), and Edouard Strauss ("Clear Track").

Other works are Suppe's "Light Cavalry" overture, Och's Variations on an Austrian Folk Song, Lehar's waltz from "The Merry Widow," and the first half of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony.

MICHAEL TILSON Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening in New York, an all-Brahms program in Philharmonic Hall of Lincoln Center. On the program are the Serenade No. 2 in A, and the Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor, with Misha Dichter. Thomas is the associate conductor of the Boston orchestra, in addition to being music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic. He returns to Buffalo for a Mozart program Feb. 6 and 8.

Fred Ressel
. . . Viennese program

HARVEY PHILLIPS, tuba with the New York Brass Quintet, will give a recital at 8:30 p.m. today in the Concert Hall of the Michael C. Rockefeller Arts Center at Fredonia State College. Phillips also is with the New York City Ballet Orchestra, and the Bell Telephone Hour Orchestra.

The program will include works by three American composers, who will be in attendance: Walter Hartley, Alec Wilder and Warren Benson.

Other works are Vaughan Williams' Concerto for Bass Tuba, and Hindemith's Sonata for Tuba and Piano.

Assisting artists are Dean Boal, piano, who is chairman of the college's music department; C. Rudolph Emilson, tuba player from the college's music faculty; and Sandra Hartley, wife of the composer of Suite for Flute and Tuba.

A series of workshops and clinics conducted by Phillips will begin at 9 a.m. Saturday in the College Theater. All events are open to the public.

NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
D. 2,800

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
D. 6,735

JAN 7 1972

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
D. 12,420

JAN 7 1972

VALLEY NEWS
LEBANON, N. H.
D. 9,083

JAN 7 1972

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
D. 4,150

JAN 8 1972

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
D. 5,627

JAN 7 1972

CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
D. 8,600

JAN 8 1972

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
D. 045

JAN 10 1972

JAN 7 1972

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
D. 41,749

JAN 7 1972

NEWS
MILFORD, MASS.
D. 11,172

JAN 7 1972

SUN
HUDSON, MASS.
D. 3,050

JAN 7 1972

New England Newsclip

JAN 7 1972

WESTPORT NEWS
WESTPORT, CONN.
SEMI-WEEKLY 10,000

JAN 12 1972

New England Newsclip

THOMAS ON BRAHMS

BOSTON (UPI) — Michael Tislson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct an all-Brahms concerts Jan. 12 and 14 at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall, it was announced Thursday.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

JAN 14 1972

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Cosi Fan Tutte," with Teresa Zylis-Gara, Rosalind Elias, Teresa Stratas, Pietro Bottazzo, Theodor Uppmann, Walter Berry; John Pritchard, conductor; 8.

New York City Ballet: "Bugaku," "Donizetti Variations," "Valse Fantaisie," "Symphony in C"; N. Y. State Theater, 8.

American Ballet Theater: "Theater," "La Fille mal Gardee"; City Center Theater, 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Misha Dichter, pianist; all-Brahms program: "Serenade No. 2," 'Piano Concerto No. 1"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

DEE BERRY

TIME
GREENWICH, CONN.
D. 13,160

JAN 13 1972

New England Newsc

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

JAN 22 1972

MUSICAL EVENTS

The Specialists

LAST Wednesday night in Philharmonic Hall, a twenty-five-year-old conductor and a twenty-six-year-old pianist played a program of music by a twenty-six-year-old composer. The conductor was Michael Tilson Thomas, the pianist was Misha Dichter, and the composer was Johannes Brahms, who at twenty-six or thereabouts had already completed his First Piano Concerto in D Minor, Opus 15, and his Serenade No. 2, in A, Opus 16, for Orchestra, which together made up the entire program. The orchestra was the Boston Symphony. After my initial enormous enthusiasm for the work of Mr. Thomas, I found myself a bit disappointed the other night. He did not seem to have the wonderful Bostonians under full control, and their playing was flaccid to the point of absentmindedness. The Serenade went by and left no impression on me. The concerto came off a good deal better, though there was a certain hurried quality about it that detracted from its incisiveness. As for Mr. Dichter, he is a fluent and able young pianist, with technique to spare, but he is not yet capable of giving this particular concerto the brilliance and excitement that more mature pianists have given it. Both his and Mr. Thomas's performances in the concerto were expert enough to be listenable. But the bite, the controlled frenzy, and the powerful propulsion that it demands seemed to be beyond them.

ALL-BRAHMS

The Boston Symphony will play an all-Brahms program under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. at Philharmonic Hall. Another similar program will be presented with William Stienberg on Saturday at 8 p.m. at Carnegie Hall.

Boston Symphony at Philharmonic

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the third series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall Wednesday and Friday evenings, January 12 and 14, at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is pianist Misha Dichter.

FM GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 1972

HERALD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 9 1972

. . Philharmonic Hall will host the Boston Symphony on the 12th and 14th, and the Philadelphia Orchestra on the 18th . . . The Handel Society Chorus and Orchestra,

TIME OFF CALENDAR: January 9th-15th

Boston Symphony (at Philharmonic Hall): 12th and 13th, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts all-Brahms program, with Misha Dichter, piano. 15th, William Steinberg (no soloists).

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

JAN 14 1972

A Nice Idea at Boston's Concert

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, with Misha Dichter, piano. At Philharmonic Hall.
Serenade No. 2; Piano Concerto No. 1 Brahms

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

As an alternative to the Brahms symphonies, those magnificent but overplayed works, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the A major Serenade at his Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night. (Perhaps he might also take a look at the first three Tchaikovsky suites as alternatives to the overplayed Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies of that composer.)

It was a nice idea, as so many of Mr. Thomas's program ideas are. The A major Serenade, the one for small orchestra minus violins, is a very charming work—lyric, sensitive, flowing. Easily one of the most attractive products of Brahms's youth, it has been consistently ignored by our hotshot conductors, who insist on making the bigger splash that the C minor Symphony offers.

Mr. Thomas gave the score a diligent performance, though not one that captured the real quality of the music. Tempos were a little too slow and careful; metrical patterns too regular; dynamics a bit limp. This was more a reading than a real interpretation. As yet, Mr. Thomas has not made the A major Serenade part of him. It is by no means so weighty and solemn an affair as he made it out to be.

To balance the Serenade on this Brahms program, there was the D minor Piano Concerto played by Misha Dichter. Long past are the days when this was considered so intellectual a piece of music, so demanding technically, that only a few pianists would touch it. Today every young pianist cuts his teeth on the Brahms D minor, most of them playing it as their graduation piece. The four-minute mile, the Brahms D minor—all are in the public domain. A new breed of athletes, on the track and on the keyboard, has come into existence.

And Mr. Dichter played the work like a superbly trained athlete. The notes, well-organized, flowed effortlessly along, and the harder the configurations, the easier they sounded. Mr. Dichter is a hugely competent technician.

•

But is he yet the pianist to take the full measure of the Brahms D minor? Not yet. Despite the keyboard proficiency and marksmanship, or perhaps because of it (that concentration on sheer literal accuracy above everything else), an element of poetry, of color, of imagination was missing.

There was drive rather than poetry; percussion rather than nuance. Mr. Dichter still has to learn how to modify his rather percussive touch (one thinks of the brittle octaves at the end of the first movement), and how to use the pedals to maximum effect. In a way this was depersonalized playing, so characteristic of many young pianists today: efficiency plus, but less feeling of involvement than one would want. Mr. Thomas supplied a carefully integrated account of the orchestral score, working closely with the pianist but not doing much on his own.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Gomberg Model of Taste, Finesse in Oboe Concerto

By HARRY NEVILLE

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in a concert that consisted of two works: an oboe concerto in C, which has been attributed to Haydn, and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp Minor. Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe of the BSO, was soloist in the concerto, and he gave a performance that was a model of taste, musicianship and technical finesse from beginning to end.

Gomberg produces a beautiful tone, one that is warmed by just the right degree of vibrato, and his elegant sense of phrasing made him the perfect executant for this particular work. Andrew Raeburn's program notes informed us that the concerto was discovered in 1926 and that on the manuscript, which dates from the early 19th century, somebody had wirtten the words "By Haydn?" Raeburn went on to point out that the work might well have been written by a dozen other composers of the period — an assessment this writer agrees with, for the concerto bears no stylistic fingerprints that are absolutely unmistakable.

CLEARLY, the work is not top-drawer Haydn, yet it is graceful and full of good spirits — well worth hearing, especially in a performance as good as this one. Thomas and the orchestra gave excellent support, and there was particularly warm and sensitive playing from the strings.

There was a great deal to admire, too, in Thomas's conducting of the Mahler Fifth Symphony, though for me it was a performance that didn't begin to plumb the emotional depths of this work. Most of all I admired Thomas's pacing, the way he chose tempos that required but little adjustment in order to accommodate shifting mood or character. Correct tempo is ever a problem with Mahler. If the basic speed is too slow the music inevitably will become ponderous at some point or other, while a too fast speed will cause the point of Mahler's elaborate contrapuntal details to be lost. Neither of these things happened with Thomas, and as a result the music never seemed plodding or, on the other hand, desperately hurried.

The best part of Thomas's interpretation, for this listener, was the fourth movement, the Adagietto, though I confess I would be moved by any decent performance of these elegiac pages. The scherzo went well, to, with Charles Yancich doing his best work of the season in the difficult horn obbligato. Thomas might have done something more imaginative with the rhythms of the waltz themes, for they never once sounded Viennese in character, which is what I believe Mahler intended.

What the performance lacked in the end was the burning. emotional intensity most listeners expect of Mahler. It may be that Thomas deliberately underplays the emotion. It may be, to, that at this point he is so preoccupied with the work's elaborate mechanics that he isn't free to deal effectively with "interpretive" matters. Let's hope the latter premise is correct, for Thomas's performance could then ripen into something stunning.

INDEPENDENT
WESTBORO, MASS.
W. 2,000

JAN 20 1972 New Englar Newscl

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Jan. 21, 22

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS CONDUCTS FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY PERFORMANCE OF HAYDN OBOE CONCERTO WITH SOLOIST RALPH GOMBERG JANUARY 21 AND 22. CONCERT ALSO INCLUDES MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts all-Brahms with pianist Misha Dichter January 18.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS — Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the twelfth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra Friday afternoon, January 21, 1972 at 2:00 p.m., and Saturday evening, January 22 at 8:30 p.m. The concert opens with the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Haydn's Oboe concerto in C. Soloist for these concerts is Boston Symphony Principal Oboist Ralph Gomberg. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Ralph Gomberg is the product of a highly musical family. He is the youngest of seven children, five of whom graduated from the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. At the age of 14, he was the youngest student ever accepted by the renowned oboe teacher, Marcel Tabuteau. Following his studies at Curtis, Gomberg, at 17, was appointed Principal Oboe of the All American Youth Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Following his World War II Navy Career, he was Principal Oboe of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, the New York City Center Orchestra (under Leonard Bernstein), and the Mutual Broadcasting Orchestra. He joined the Boston Symphony in 1949.

Michael Tilson Thomas and pianist Misha Dichter present an all-Brahms concert with the Boston Symphony at the fourth concert of the Tuesday B series Tuesday evening, January 18 at 7:30 p.m. The concert includes the Serenade no. 2 and the First piano concerto.

The season's fourth Open Rehearsal takes place Thursday evening, January 20, 1972 at 7:30 p.m.

STAR
NORTHBORO, MASS.
W. 1,700

JAN 20 1972

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

JAN 20 1972 New England Newsclip

CITY POST
MARLBORO, MASS.
W. 3,300

JAN 20 1972

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 22 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO: an impressive concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Mahler Fifth was the principal work on the concert which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon. It was an impressive performance, and one which showed the value of paying attention to Mahler's instructions about pace and intensity.

I don't understand most conductors. When they blur — as most of them do — Mahler's crucial distinctions between things that change suddenly and those that are transformed gradually, when they normalize his idiosyncratic dynamics, I don't know what combination is at work of failure of insight into musical character, of arrogance, laziness, or annoyance at having someone (and worse, another conductor!) so specifically lay down the law about matters whose determination they are used to regarding as their prerogative.

I hope that the Corinthians understood "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life" better than those musicians and theater directors who are so ready to offer St. Paul's admonition in justification of their own departures from the letter. The letter, in Mahler, is the key to the spirit, and when conductors wander from it in some of the ways I have described, they dull Mahler's music when they do not cheapen it.

This week produced two opportunities to hear the Mahler Fifth under conductors whose interpretive point of departure was to take the composer's most explicit directions very seriously, the other being Michael Gielen, who conducted the work with the National Orchestra of Belgium in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Tuesday. Gielen responded more vitally to Mahler's humor — at least I found the scherzo and finale just a bit straitlaced in Boston — but on the whole it was Thomas who showed a greater range of sympathy in dealing with diverse tempers. The most obvious difference between the performances was in the orchestral playing: the Belgian group, though attentive and disciplined, is exceedingly limited in technique and sound, while the Boston Symphony happily made yesterday's concerts one of those occasions for letting us know what a stunning virtuoso outfit it is.

To sum it up, Michael Thomas conducted a performance of a certain emotional restraint, though of great inner intensity and remarkably sustained, with that combination of intelligence, taste, and growing technical resourcefulness, which makes him an outstandingly good conductor. The Boston Symphony responded with playing that was brilliant, but beautiful in many other ways as well. Solo bows, well earned, were taken by Charles Yancich (French horn) and Armando Ghitalla (trumpet).

To begin the concert, there was a C major Oboe Concerto from the 18th Century but otherwise of uncertain origin — early in the 19th century somebody pencilled "von Haydn?" into the manuscript, which is not persuasive evidence of authorship. It is a charming work in an open, uncomplicated style — rather more interesting, in fact, than most of Haydn's soloist, Ralph Gomberg played it with no end of assuance and verve, and Thomas, working with a small orchestra of strings, oboes, horns, trumpets, and harpsichord, produced an elegant, beautifully in scale framework for him.

BSO Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the twelfth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra Friday afternoon, Jan. 21 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Jan. 22 at 8:30 p.m.

The concert opens with the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Haydn's Oboe concerto in C. Soloist for these concerts is Boston Symphony Principal Oboeist Ralph Gomberg. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

JAN 20 1972

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

JAN 20 1972

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

JAN 20 1972

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

JAN 20 1972

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

JAN 20 1972

[65]

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Gomberg Model of Taste, Finesse in Oboe Concerto

By HARRY NEVILLE

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in a concert that consisted of two works: an oboe concerto in C, which has been attributed to Haydn, and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp Minor. Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe of the BSO, was soloist in the concerto, and he gave a performance that was a model of taste, musicianship and technical finesse from beginning to end.

Gomberg produces a beautiful tone, one that is warmed by just the right degree of vibrato, and his elegant sense of phrasing made him the perfect executant for this particular work. Andrew Raeburn's program notes informed us that the concerto was discovered in 1926 and that on the manuscript, which dates from the early 19th century, somebody had wirtten the words "By Haydn?" Raeburn went on to point out that the work might well have been written by a dozen other composers of the period — an assessment this writer agrees with, for the concerto bears no stylistic fingerprints that are absolutely unmistakable.

CLEARLY, the work is not top-drawer Haydn, yet it is graceful and full of good spirits — well worth hearing, especially in a performance as good as this one. Thomas and the orchestra gave excellent support, and there was particularly warm and sensitive playing from the strings.

There was a great deal to admire, too, in Thomas's conducting of the Mahler Fifth Symphony, though for me it was a performance that didn't begin to plumb the emotional depths of this work. Most of all I admired Thomas's pacing, the way he chose tempos that required but little adjustment in order to accommodate shifting mood or character. Correct tempo is ever a problem with Mahler. If the basic speed is too slow the music inevitably will become ponderous at some point or other, while a too fast speed will cause the point of Mahler's elaborate contrapuntal details to be lost. Neither of these things happened with Thomas, and as a result the music never seemed plodding or, on the other hand, desperately hurried.

The best part of Thomas's interpretation, for this listener, was the fourth movement, the Adagietto, though I confess I would be moved by any decent performance of these elegiac pages. The scherzo went well, to, with Charles Yancich doing his best work of the season in the difficult horn obbligato. Thomas might have done something more imaginative with the rhythms of the waltz themes, for they never once sounded Viennese in character, which is what I believe Mahler intended.

What the performance lacked in the end was the burning emotional intensity most listeners expect of Mahler. It may be that Thomas deliberately underplays the emotion. It may be, to, that at this point he is so preoccupied with the work's elaborate mechanics that he isn't free to deal effectively with "interpretive" matters. Let's hope the latter premise is correct, for Thomas's performance could then ripen into something stunning.

INDEPENDENT
WESTBORO, MASS.
W. 2,000

JAN 20 1972 New England Newsc

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Jan. 21, 22

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS CONDUCTS FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY PERFORMANCE OF HAYDN OBOE CONCERTO WITH SOLOIST RALPH GOMBERG JANUARY 21 AND 22. CONCERT ALSO INCLUDES MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts all-Brahms with pianist Misha Dichter January 18.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS — Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the twelfth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra Friday afternoon, January 21, 1972 at 2:00 p.m., and Saturday evening, January 22 at 8:30 p.m. The concert opens with the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Haydn's Oboe concerto in C. Soloist for these concerts is Boston Symphony Principal Oboist Ralph Gomberg, Following intermission, the concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Ralph Gomberg is the product of a highly musical family. He is the youngest of seven children, five of whom graduated from the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. At the age of 14, he was the youngest student ever accepted by the renowned oboe teacher, Marcel Tabuteau. Following his studies at Curtis, Gomberg, at 17, was appointed Principal Oboe of the All American Youth Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Following his World War II Navy Career, he was Principal Oboe of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, the New York City Center Orchestra (under Leonard Bernstein), and the Mutual Broadcasting Orchestra. He joined the Boston Symphony in 1949.

Michael Tilson Thomas and pianist Misha Dichter present an all-Brahms concert with the Boston Symphony at the fourth concert of the Tuesday B series Tuesday evening, January 18 at 7:30 p.m. The concert includes the Serenade no. 2 and the First piano concerto.

The season's fourth Open Rehearsal takes place Thursday evening, January 20, 1972 at 7:30 p.m.

STAR
NORTHBORO, MASS.
W. 1,700

JAN 20 1972

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

JAN 20 1972 New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 22 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO: an impressive concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Mahler Fifth was the principal work on the concert which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon. It was an impressive performance, and one which showed the value of paying attention to Mahler's instructions about pace and intensity.

I don't understand most conductors. When they blur — as most of them do — Mahler's crucial distinctions between things that change suddenly and those that are transformed gradually, when they normalize his idiosyncratic dynamics, I don't know what combination is at work of failure of insight into musical character, of arrogance, laziness, or annoyance at having someone (and worse, another conductor!) so specifically lay down the law about matters whose determination they are used to regarding as their prerogative.

I hope that the Corinthians understood "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life" better than those musicians and theater directors who are so ready to offer St. Paul's admonition in justification of their own departures from the letter. The letter, in Mahler, is the key to the spirit, and when conductors wander from it in some of the ways I have described, they dull Mahler's music when they do not cheapen it.

This week produced two opportunities to hear the Mahler Fifth under conductors whose interpretive point of departure was to take the composer's most explicit directions very seriously, the other being Michael Gielen, who conducted the work with the National Orchestra of Belgium in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Tuesday. Gielen responded more vitally to Mahler's humor — at least I found the scherzo and finale just a bit straitlaced in Boston — but on the whole it was Thomas who showed a greater range of sympathy in dealing with diverse tempers. The most obvious difference between the performances was in the orchestral playing: the Belgian group, though attentive and disciplined, is exceedingly limited in technique and sound, while the Boston Symphony happily made yesterday's concerts one of those occasions for letting us know what a stunning virtuoso outfit it is.

To sum it up, Michael Thomas conducted a performance of a certain emotional restraint, though of great inner intensity and remarkably sustained, with that combination of intelligence, taste, and growing technical resourcefulness, which makes him an outstandingly good conductor. The Boston Symphony responded with playing that was brilliant, but beautiful in many other ways as well. Solo bows, well earned, were taken by Charles Yancich (French horn) and Armando Ghitalla (trumpet).

To begin the concert, there was a C major Oboe Concerto from the 18th Century but otherwise of uncertain origin — early in the 19th century somebody pencilled "von Haydn?" into the manuscript, which is not persuasive evidence of authorship. It is a charming work in an open, uncomplicated style — rather more interesting, in fact, than most of Haydn's soloist. Ralph Gomberg played it with no end of assuance and verve, and Thomas, working with a small orchestra of strings, oboes, horns, trumpets, and harpsichord, produced an elegant, beautifully in scale framework for him.

CITY POST
MARLBORO, MASS.
W. 3,300

JAN 20 1972

BSO Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the twelfth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra Friday afternoon, Jan. 21 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Jan. 22 at 8:30 p.m.

The concert opens with the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Haydn's Oboe concerto in C. Soloist for these concerts is Boston Symphony Principal Oboeist Ralph Gomberg. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Mr. Thomas conducting Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

JAN 20 1972

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

JAN 20 1972

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

JAN 20 1972

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

JAN 20 1972

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

JAN 20 1972

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988

JAN 23 1972

New England Newsclip

Symphony Delivers Exciting Performance

By JOHN RICHARDSON

At Friday's Boston Symphony concert Michael Tilson Thomas again demonstrated that he is one of the truly fine young musicians of our time. In tackling Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony, Mr. Thomas took on a symphonic behemoth: over an hour long, intense, and extraordinarily demanding for performer and listener alike. Conductor and orchestra handled the work in remarkable fashion, giving a very exciting performance indeed.

★

The fifth symphony marks the beginning of Mahler's maturity. With this work, the first of a trilogy of purely orchestral symphonies, he discarded the gentler folk elements of the first four symphonies, charging headlong into a new style; schizophrenic, emotionally extreme, unrelievedly tense.

The first of the work's three parts consists of two movements emotionally and thematically linked. The opening movement, which alternates a long, slow funeral march with ferocious outbursts, features a long hollow trumpet solo, beautifully played Friday by Armando Ghitalla. The second movement reverses the mood of the first; the freneticism becomes central, the melancholy secondary.

• Music Review

The second part consists of only one movement, a huge scherzo. The Boston Symphony's special brand of virtuosity perfectly captured the radical change of character: joyously affirmative, at times even playful.

The fourth and fifth movements make up the last part. The serene Adagietto (for strings and harp alone) provides an interlude of calm between the strenuous Scherzo and triumphant Finale. The low brass were particularly outstanding in the Finale, one of those all-stops-out movements that is vintage Mahler.

★

Few people recognize the importance of the concertmaster. In Joseph Silverstein, the Boston Symphony has one of the finest. His abilities were much in evidence during the Mahler as he led the orchestra's excellent string section with rare commitment and involvement.

But the star of the afternoon was unquestionably Mr. Thomas. Conducting the Mahler is a little like pitching fourteen innings of baseball; the physical and mental stamina required is staggering. Mr. Thomas paced the piece beautifully, and, with the exception of a rather cold adagietto, maintained the necessary tension from beginning to end.

The concert opened with a technically amazing performance from Ralph Gomberg of an oboe concerto thought to be by Haydn. That Haydn actually wrote the piece is still conjecture.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

JAN 24 1972

New England Newsclip

Mahler a la Thomas

By Louis Snyder

In his mercurial career first as the Boston Symphony's assistant then associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas has perforce taken over some rather formidable assignments. However, the Mahler Fifth Symphony, which he directed, in scheduled weekend concerts, and which will be heard again tomorrow and Thursday evenings, reveals the extraordinary command this young leader has of one of the most complex and enigmatic works in the symphonic repertoire.

From the beginning, the orchestra expressed its complete involvement in superb playing of the kind that dusted off old memories. Aside from some predictably brilliant solo playing (Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; Charles Yancich, horn, Bernard Zighera, harp, and Doriot Dwyer, flute, among them), the body of musicians gave, in every choir, of the vibrant quality of sound that has been its traditional hallmark. The Fifth is full of opportunities for all sections—basses, cellos, woodwinds, violins, brass, percussion—and in each case the section was on top of the score, alert and keenly responsive.

The drama and contrast of the Fifth is ready-made for a conductor of Mr. Thomas's temperament—and for a display of his good taste. The openings for excess were bypassed, and the waltzes and the Adagietto, done with tremendous feeling and restraint, remained within the sensitively shaped context charted for the whole work.

This grand design never got away from Mr. Thomas, on Friday afternoon, at least, when the concept for a work essentially so full of contradictions emerged in one impressively crafted musical piece. It would appear, these days particularly, that there are as many viable interpretations of this symphony as there are top-notch conductors and orchestras to play them.

Impeccable oboe

The program began with the first performance in Boston of an Oboe Concerto in C which may or may not be by Joseph Haydn. The evidence, indicated in program notes, seems to be based on the fact of a pencil notation "Von Haydn?" on the score, which was discovered in 1926. In any case it is of more concern to musicologists than to listeners, especially since, in this instance, the soloist was Ralph Gomberg.

Whoever may have composed this lilting three-movement concerto was duly honored by Mr. Gomberg's impeccable performance. He produced a sound of liquid gold, as he familiarly does from the first oboist's chair, and a dazzling facility for which opportunities abound in the work. The cadenza, before the close of the first movement, was sufficiently breathtaking either to inspire or discourage any prospective players of the instrument. Mr. Thomas led a reduced orchestra in a smartly paced collaboration with their colleague's shining solo achievement.

Thomas to conduct Mahler

Time Out Wed Jan 19

By L.P. KATZENSTEIN

A word to the wise. Last year Michael Tilson Thomas conducted Mahler's ninth symphony, which Thomas has called "the all-time great piece." It may or may not be in that league, but it was one of the more memorable concerts of the season.

Next weekend Thomas will conduct another of the nonvocal Mahler symphonies, the fifth. Given Thomas's way with Mahler, it should be something to hear. The fifth is easier to take than some of the other symphonies; it is less pretentious, for one thing, partly because its materials are better to begin with and don't have to be stretched to make big points. The fifth is in five movements, of which the first two and last two are closely related. Listen, for example, how the lovely music of the fourth movement Adagietto (often played by itself) is transformed in the fifth movement.

Mahler's fifth is also marked by counterpoint, whole fugues even, as in the last movement. On the whole, then, quite a piece, less intense and soul-searching than the sixth or ninth symphonies, but more approachable for the newcomer to Mahler.

The Mahler will be preceded by BSO principal oboist Ralph Gomberg's playing of the Haydn C major oboe concerto, so try Symphony this weekend. You'll like it.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 14,000

FEB 5 1972

3454

EXCITING young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will return to the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thurs., Feb. 10, 8:30 p.m., to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final B'klyn performance this season. Thomas, 27, is Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony as well as Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra. Students and senior citizens may purchase discount tickets at $2.00 each on the day of the performance. For further information on tickets, call the Academy Box Office at ST 3-6700.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000

FEB 5 1972

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

FEB 10 1972

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Pelleas et Melisande" with Judith Blegen, Barry McDaniel, Louis Quilico (debut), Giorgio Tozzi; Colin Davis, conductor, 8.

New York City Ballet: "Jewels" (three acts); N.Y. State Theater, 8.

Dr. Martin Luther King Benefit Concert for Afro-American Student Center, with Marilyn Johnson, Paucho and Latin Soul Brothers; Carnegie Hall, 8.

New York Philharmonic: Pierre Boulez, conductor; Christa Ludwig, mezzo soprano; Schubert's "Symphony No. 4 ('Tragic')," Liszt's "Three Songs," Bartok's 'Dance Suite," Berg's "Symphonic Fragments from 'Wozzeck,' Opus 7"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30. Program repeated tomorrow at 2.

Dwight Peltzer, pianist; Peter Lewis' "Innerkip" (premiere), Loren Rush' "Hexahedron" (N. Y. premiere); works of Haydn, Ravel and others; Alice Tully Hall, 8.

American Opera Center: "La Boheme," James Conlon, conductor; benefit for the Juilliard Student Aid and Scholarship Fund; Juilliard Theater, 8:15. First of three performances.

Etsuko Tazaki, pianist, (N.Y. recital debut); Liszt' "Sonata in B minor," Schubert's "Four Impromptus, Opus 142," works of Messiaen; Carnegie Recital Hall, 8:30.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Laurence Lesser, cellist; Gabrieli's "Canzoni for Brass," Hindemith's "Cello Concerto," Schumann's "Symphony No. 1"; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

FEB 11 1972

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Werther," with Regine Crespin, Colette Boky, Franco Corelli, John Reardon; Alain Lombard, conductor; 8.

New York City Ballet: "Swan Lake," "The Goldberg Variations"; N. Y. State Theater, 8.

Rover," "Borst Park"; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Ralph Gomberg, oboist; Haydn's "Oboe Concerto in C," Mahler's "Symphony No. 5"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,519

FEB 11 1972

Music: Thomas's Reading of Mahler

By DONAL HENAHAN

A conductor who understood Mahler clearly at a precocious age might not be the most attractive sort of person. It should require a certain weathering and peeling of the psyche before the Viennese composer's great symphonic visions can come into full focus, with all their painful memories, bizarre pleasures and apparent paradoxes accepted and reconciled. Intellectually, however, an early grasp of the worth of what might be called Mahler's creative decadence (also epitomized in some works of Joyce and Beckett, for instance) is certainly possible, and Michael Tilson Thomas seems to have the necessary intellect in large measure.

●

Mr. Thomas, the 27-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, led the orchestra at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night in Mahler's Fifth Symphony. The performance touched the heart of the matter only intermittently, but gave promise of greater Mahler in Mr. Thomas's future.

There were curious things in this reading, one of the most deliberate and yet emotionally uncommitted this listener can recall hearing. Mr. Thomas did not accent heavily in the stomping manner of Bruno Walter, nor set the music flying wildly in the barely controlled style of more recent Mahler exponents. The famous Adagietto —which Visconti's "Death in Venice" tried so hard to make us despise, and failed—went more slowly than necessary, perhaps, but Mr. Thomas conducted it with an almost austere restraint that lent it much aching beauty in an unsentimental vein.

●

Much of the time, in this hall, Mr. Thomas could not make the Boston sound like a really great Mahler orchestra, though it played up to its highest standards, technically. The violins did not bite into their music properly, often sounding oddly muted and refined in a way that worked against Mahler's expressive ideas.

To raise the curtain, Mr. Thomas offered a possibly authentic Haydn Oboe Concerto in C, a work of arid lengths made more than tolerable by Ralph Gomberg's pure-toned excellence in the solo role.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 14,000

JAN 29 1972

Michael Tilson Thomas To Return to Brooklyn

Michael Tilson Thomas, the most exhilerating young conductor in the music world today, will return to the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Feb. 10 at 8:30 p.m. He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final Brooklyn performance this season. Thomas, 27, is Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony as well as Music Director of the "Buffalo" Philharmonic Orchestra. He has made several recordings, both as a conductor and as a pianist. He was recently awarded a Doctor of Fine Arts degree by Hamilton College.

For his appearance at the Academy, Thomas will conduct Gabrieli's Canzoni for Brass, Hindemith's Cello Concerto, with Laurence Lesser, soloist, and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat, "Spring".

The concert is the third in a series of five sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The Symphony Series has been a tradition in Brooklyn for the past 84 years. This year, the Brooklyn Institute is saluting various groups in the community. The February 10th concert will honor Brooklyn's new Medgar Evers College. The Community Council of the college will sponsor a benefit at this performance to establish a scholarship fund.

Students and senior citizens may purchase discount tickets at $2.00 each on the day of the performance. For further ticket information, call the Academy of Music Box Office (ST3-6700).

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000

JAN 22 1972

Calendar of Events

Brooklyn Academy of Music

CHELSEA THEATER CENTER - in the Third Theater of the Academy. Feb. 1-20, Allen Ginsberg's "Kaddish"; March 21-April 9, John Gay's "The Beggar's Opera"; May 9-28, "The Water Hen" by Polish playwright Stanislaw Witkiewicz. Performances - Tues. & Sun. evenings at 7:30 p.m.; Wed., Thurs., Fri. and Sat., at 8:30 p.m. No performances on Mon. Information: 783-6700, ext. 49.

ORCHESTRA SERIES - Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 10, 8:30 p.m. Upcoming events - Feb. 27, 3 p.m., Vienna Symphony; April 20, 8:30 p.m., Minnesota Orchestra. Call 783-6700 for ticket information.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

JAN 27 1972

New Englar Newsc

Friday-Sat. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two conzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

STAR
BRAINTREE, MASS.
W. 10,402

JAN 26 1972

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Announces Friday/Saturday Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the thirteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, January 28 at 2:00 p.m., and Saturday evening, January 29 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts. The program opens with two canzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: Canzon noni toni, and Canzon septimi toni no. 2. Next is a performance of Hindemith's Cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

JAN 27 1972

New England Newsclip

Thomas conducts Boston Symphony concert pair

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Jan. 29 at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two canzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's Cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

A native of Los Angeles, Lesser began performing in public at an early age. After graduating from Harvard University in 1961, he went to Europe to study under a Fulbright Fellowship. In 1966 he won a prize at the Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow, and recorded there for Melodiya records. That same year he was guest artist in the Heifitz-Piatigorsky concerts in Carnegie Hall, and also appeared at the 1968 series in Los Angeles. In 1969 he appeared in a recital in New York's Town Hall with Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,900

JAN 28 1972

New England Newsclip

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .

Lillian

John Mandra's "Veglione" (Fiesta of the Italian Carnival) will be held this year on Tuesday, February 15 at 7:30 p.m. -- as usual. Tony Bruno will entertain the many guests gathered for the annual event at Caruso's Diplomat in Saugus and there will be door prizes, dancing and tables replete with Italian delicacies -- ladies, don't wear a girdle!

* * *

On Saturday, February 5 at eleven o'clock, James P. Gilligan and Judith Ann Carlton will exchange vows at St. Pius V Church in Lynn. Mr. Gilligan is attached to the Secretary of State's Office and the number of celebrities in attendance at this lovely wedding will certainly be many.

* * *

Don't forget the opening night for Nicholas and Alexandra is February 2 at the Circle Theatre in Brookline.

* * *

Hank Crivelli's Empire Room in Cambridge is still featuring "The Collectors Item Review" through February 5. Coming are Johnny Puleo and the Harmonica Gang, Old Time Vaudeville Show, Cab Calloway and Al Martino. . .for information call 661-8100.

* * *

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the thirteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, this afternoon, January 28 at 2:00 p.m., and tomorrow evening, January 29 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at the concerts. The program opens with two canzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: Canzon noni toni, and Canzon septimi toni no. 2. Next is a performance of Hindemith's Cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 20 1972

New Engl News

Cello, Oboe Soloists for BSO

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the concerts Friday afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Jan. 29 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser. Program opens with two canzoni by Gabrieli, followed by Mr. Lesser in Hindemith's Cello concerto. Following intermission, concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 ("Spring").

A native of Los Angeles, Mr. Lesser began performing in public at an early age. After graduating from Harvard in 1961, he went to Europe to study under a Fulbright Fellowship. In 1966 he won a prize at the Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow and recorded there. That same year he was guest artist in the Heifitz-Piatigorsky concerts in Carnegie Hall, and also appeared at the 1968 series in Los Angeles. In 1969 he appeared in a recital in New York's Town Hall, with Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist.

Mr. Thomas conducts the concerts Friday afternoon, Jan. 22, at 8:30 p.m. Concert opens with Haydn's Oboe concerto in C, with soloist Boston Symphony principal oboeist Ralph Gomberg. Following intermission, concert concludes with Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Mr. Gomberg is the youngest of seven children, five of whom graduated from the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. At the age of 14 he was the youngest student ever accepted by the renowned oboe teacher, Marcel Tabuteau. Following his studies at Curtis, Gomberg, at 17, was appointed Principal Oboe of the All-American Youth Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Following World War II Navy service, he was Principal Oboe of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, New York City Center Orchestra (under Leonard Bernstein) and Mutual Broadcasting Orchestra. He joined the Boston Symphony in 1949.

Mr. Thomas conducts the sixth concert of the Tuesday "A" series on Jan. 25 at 8:30 p.m. Ralph Gomberg is soloist in Haydn's Oboe concerto in C. Program also includes Mahler's Fifth Symphony. Same program will be given at the opening concert of the Thursday

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

JAN 27 1972

New Englar Newsc

Friday-Sat. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two conzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

JAN 27 1972

New Englar Newsc

Friday-Sat. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two conzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

JAN 27 1972

New Englar Newsc

Friday-Sat. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two conzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 27 1972

New England Newsclip

CELLO SOLOIST at this weekend's Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony concerts conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas will be Laurence Lesser. Program opens with two canzoni by Gabrieli, followed by Mr. Lesser in Hindemith's concerto. Following intermission, concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 ("Spring"). A native of Los Angeles, Mr. Lesser began performing in public at an early age. After graduating from Harvard in 1961, he went to Europe to study under a Fulbright Fellowship. In 1966 he won a prize at the Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow and recorded there. That same year he was guest artist in the Heifitz-Piatigorsky concerts in Carnegie Hall, and also appeared at the 1968 series in Los Angeles. In 1969 he appeared in a recital in New York's Town Hall, with Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist.

[69]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 14,000

FEB 5 1972

3454

EXCITING young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will return to the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thurs., Feb. 10, 8:30 p.m., to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final B'klyn performance this season. Thomas, 27, is Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony as well as Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra. Students and senior citizens may purchase discount tickets at $2.00 each on the day of the performance. For further information on tickets, call the Academy Box Office at ST 3-6700.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000

FEB 5 1972

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

FEB 10 1972

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Pelleas et Melisande" with Judith Blegen, Barry McDaniel, Louis Quilico (debut), Giorgio Tozzi; Colin Davis, conductor, 8.

New York City Ballet: "Jewels" (three acts); N. Y. State Theater, 8.

Dr. Martin Luther King Benefit Concert for Afro-American Student Center, with Marilyn Johnson, Paucho and Latin Soul Brothers; Carnegie Hall, 8.

New York Philharmonic: Pierre Boulez, conductor; Christa Ludwig, mezzo soprano; Schubert's "Symphony No. 4 ('Tragic')," Liszt's "Three Songs," Bartok's 'Dance Suite," Berg's "Symphonic Fragments from 'Wozzeck,' Opus 7"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30. Program repeated tomorrow at 2.

Dwight Peltzer, pianist; Peter Lewis' "Innerkip" (premiere), Loren Rush' "Hexahedron" (N. Y. premiere); works of Haydn, Ravel and others; Alice Tully Hall, 8.

American Opera Center: "La Boheme," James Conlon, conductor; benefit for the Juilliard Student Aid and Scholarship Fund; Juilliard Theater, 8:15. First of three performances.

Etsuko Tazaki, pianist, (N.Y. recital debut); Liszt' "Sonata in B minor," Schubert's "Four Impromptus, Opus 142," works of Messiaen; Carnegie Recital Hall, 8:30.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Laurence Lesser, cellist; Gabrieli's "Canzoni for Brass," Hindemith's "Cello Concerto," Schumann's "Symphony No. 1"; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

FEB 11 1972

Music & Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Werther," with Regine Crespin, Colette Boky, Franco Corelli, John Reardon; Alain Lombard, conductor; 8.

New York City Ballet: "Swan Lake," "The Goldberg Variations"; N. Y. State Theater, 8.

Rover," "Borst Park"; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor; Ralph Gomberg, oboist; Haydn's "Oboe Concerto in C," Mahler's "Symphony No. 5"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,152 S. 1,407,519

FEB 11 1972

Music: Thomas's Reading of Mahler

By DONAL HENAHAN

A conductor who understood Mahler clearly at a precocious age might not be the most attractive sort of person. It should require a certain weathering and peeling of the psyche before the Viennese composer's great symphonic visions can come into full focus, with all their painful memories, bizarre pleasures and apparent paradoxes accepted and reconciled. Intellectually, however, an early grasp of the worth of what might be called Mahler's creative decadence (also epitomized in some works of Joyce and Beckett, for instance) is certainly possible, and Michael Tilson Thomas seems to have the necessary intellect in large measure.

●

Mr. Thomas, the 27-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, led the orchestra at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night in Mahler's Fifth Symphony. The performance touched the heart of the matter only intermittently, but gave promise of greater Mahler in Mr. Thomas's future.

There were curious things in this reading, one of the most deliberate and yet emotionally uncommitted this listener can recall hearing. Mr. Thomas did not accent heavily in the stomping manner of Bruno Walter, nor set the music flying wildly in the barely controlled style of more recent Mahler exponents. The famous Adagietto —which Visconti's "Death in Venice" tried so hard to make us despise, and failed—went more slowly than necessary, perhaps, but Mr. Thomas conducted it with an almost austere restraint that lent it much aching beauty in an unsentimental vein.

●

Much of the time, in this hall, Mr. Thomas could not make the Boston sound like a really great Mahler orchestra, though it played up to its highest standards, technically. The violins did not bite into their music properly, often sounding oddly muted and refined in a way that worked against Mahler's expressive ideas.

To raise the curtain, Mr. Thomas offered a possibly authentic Haydn Oboe Concerto in C, a work of arid lengths made more than tolerable by Ralph Gomberg's pure-toned excellence in the solo role.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 14,000

JAN 29 1972

Michael Tilson Thomas To Return to Brooklyn

Michael Tilson Thomas, the most exhilerating young conductor in the music world today, will return to the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Feb. 10 at 8:30 p.m. He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final Brooklyn performance this season. Thomas, 27, is Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony as well as Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra. He has made several recordings, both as a conductor and as a pianist. He was recently awarded a Doctor of Fine Arts degree by Hamilton College.

For his appearance at the Academy, Thomas will conduct Gabrieli's Canzoni for Brass, Hindemith's Cello Concerto, with Laurence Lesser, soloist, and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat, "Spring".

The concert is the third in a series of five sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The Symphony Series has been a tradition in Brooklyn for the past 84 years. This year, the Brooklyn Institute is saluting various groups in the community. The February 10th concert will honor Brooklyn's new Medgar Evers College. The Community Council of the college will sponsor a benefit at this performance to establish a scholarship fund.

Students and senior citizens may purchase discount tickets at $2.00 each on the day of the performance. For further ticket information, call the Academy of Music Box Office (ST3-6700).

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000

JAN 22 1972

Calendar of Events

Brooklyn Academy of Music

CHELSEA THEATER CENTER - in the Third Theater of the Academy. Feb. 1-20, Allen Ginsberg's "Kaddish"; March 21-April 9, John Gay's "The Beggar's Opera"; May 9-28, "The Water Hen" by Polish playwright Stanislaw Witkiewicz. Performances - Tues. & Sun. evenings at 7:30 p.m.; Wed., Thurs., Fri. and Sat., at 8:30 p.m. No performances on Mon. Information: 783-6700, ext. 49.

ORCHESTRA SERIES - Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 10, 8:30 p.m. Upcoming events - Feb. 27, 3 p.m., Vienna Symphony; April 20, 8:30 p.m., Minnesota Orchestra. Call 783-6700 for ticket information.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

JAN 27 1972

New Englar Newsc

Friday-Sat. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two conzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

STAR
BRAINTREE, MASS.
W. 10,402

JAN 26 1972

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Announces Friday/Saturday Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the thirteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, January 28 at 2:00 p.m., and Saturday evening, January 29 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts. The program opens with two canzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: Canzon noni toni, and Canzon septimi toni no. 2. Next is a performance of Hindemith's Cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

JAN 27 1972

New England Newsclip

Thomas conducts Boston Symphony concert pair

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Jan. 29 at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two canzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's Cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

A native of Los Angeles, Lesser began performing in public at an early age. After graduating from Harvard University in 1961, he went to Europe to study under a Fulbright Fellowship. In 1966 he won a prize at the Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow, and recorded there for Melodiya records. That same year he was guest artist in the Heifitz-Piatigorsky concerts in Carnegie Hall, and also appeared at the 1968 series in Los Angeles. In 1969 he appeared in a recital in New York's Town Hall with Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,900

JAN 28 1972

New England Newsclip

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

JAN 27 1972

New Englar Newsc

Friday-Sat. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two conzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .

Lillian

John Mandra's "Veglione" (Fiesta of the Italian Carnival) will be held this year on Tuesday, February 15 at 7:30 p.m. -- as usual, Tony Bruno will entertain the many guests gathered for the annual event at Caruso's Diplomat in Saugus and there will be door prizes, dancing and tables replete with Italian delicacies -- ladies, don't wear a girdle!

* * *

On Saturday, February 5 at eleven o'clock, James P. Gilligan and Judith Ann Carlton will exchange vows at St. Pius V Church in Lynn. Mr. Gilligan is attached to the Secretary of State's Office and the number of celebrities in attendance at this lovely wedding will certainly be many.

* * *

Don't forget the opening night for Nicholas and Alexandra is February 2 at the Circle Theatre in Brookline.

* * *

Hank Crivelli's Empire Room in Cambridge is still featuring "The Collectors Item Review" through February 5. Coming are Johnny Puleo and the Harmonica Gang, Old Time Vaudeville Show, Cab Calloway and Al Martino. . .for information call 661-8100.

* * *

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the thirteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, this afternoon, January 28 at 2:00 p.m., and tomorrow evening, January 29 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at the concerts. The program opens with two canzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: Canzon noni toni, and Canzon septimi toni no. 2. Next is a performance of Hindemith's Cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 20 1972

Ne Engl News

Cello, Oboe Soloists for BSO

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the concerts Friday afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Jan. 29 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser. Program opens with two canzoni by Gabrieli, followed by Mr. Lesser in Hindemith's Cello concerto. Following intermission, concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 ("Spring").

A native of Los Angeles, Mr. Lesser began performing in public at an early age. After graduating from Harvard in 1961, he went to Europe to study under a Fulbright Fellowship. In 1966 he won a prize at the Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow and recorded there. That same year he was guest artist in the Heifitz-Piatigorsky concerts in Carnegie Hall, and also appeared at the 1968 series in Los Angeles. In 1969 he appeared in a recital in New York's Town Hall, with Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist.

Mr. Thomas conducts the concerts Friday afternoon, Jan. 22, at 8:30 p.m. Concert opens with Haydn's Oboe concerto in C, with soloist Boston Symphony principal oboeist Ralph Gomberg. Following intermission, concert concludes with Mahler's Symphony no. 5.

Mr. Gomberg is the youngest of seven children, five of whom graduated from the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. At the age of 14 he was the youngest student ever accepted by the renowned oboe teacher, Marcel Tabuteau. Following his studies at Curtis, Gomberg, at 17, was appointed Principal Oboe of the All-American Youth Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Following World War II Navy service, he was Principal Oboe of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, New York City Center Orchestra (under Leonard Bernstein) and Mutual Broadcasting Orchestra. He joined the Boston Symphony in 1949.

Mr. Thomas conducts the sixth concert of the Tuesday "A" series on Jan. 25 at 8:30 p.m. Ralph Gomberg is soloist in Haydn's Oboe concerto in C. Program also includes Mahler's Fifth Symphony. Same program will be given at the opening concert of the Thursday

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

JAN 27 1972

New Englar Newsc

Friday-Sat. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two conzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

JAN 27 1972

New Englar Newsc

Friday-Sat. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 13th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon, Jan. 28 at 2 p.m., and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist is cellist Laurence Lesser who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

The program opens with two conzoni by Giovani Gabrieli: "Canzon noni toni," and "Canzon septimi toni no. 2." Next is a performance of Hindemith's cello concerto with soloist Laurence Lesser. Following intermission, the concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 "Spring."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 27 1972

New England Newsclip

CELLO SOLOIST at this weekend's Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony concerts conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas will be Laurence Lesser. Program opens with two canzoni by Gabrieli, followed by Mr. Lesser in Hindemith's concerto. Following intermission, concert concludes with Schumann's Symphony no. 1 ("Spring"). A native of Los Angeles, Mr. Lesser began performing in public at an early age. After graduating from Harvard in 1961, he went to Europe to study under a Fulbright Fellowship. In 1966 he won a prize at the Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow and recorded there. That same year he was guest artist in the Heifitz-Piatigorsky concerts in Carnegie Hall, and also appeared at the 1968 series in Los Angeles. In 1969 he appeared in a recital in New York's Town Hall, with Michael Tilson Thomas as pianist.

[68]

PASTE OVER

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

FEB 19 1972

MUSICAL EVENTS

Before Strict Construction

DANIEL BARENBOIM's performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony with the Cleveland Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Monday night of last week brought me back to a sort of watershed in the history of ican scene), Klemperer, Mengelberg himself, and several others. On the whole, the influence was a malign one, despite Toscanini's enormous gifts. The old nineteenth-century art of interpretation was lost, and with it went the done. A few flaws in the horn parts can be attributed to the fact that the Clevelanders are at the moment playing under too many conductors. I hope that Mr. Barenboim's performance will set the stage for a revival of nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century methods.

The program also contained Liszt's Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, with Clifford Curzon as the brilliant piano soloist, and again I reis an absolutely deof display music of disappointing com-

avowedly profound
Boulez is trying to

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 27 1972

New England Newsclip

At Boston Symphony

GOMBERG AND MAHLER FIFTH

In announcing its program schedule for last season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra included a performance of Mahler's Fifth Symphony under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas. Before it was due, however, the symphony was put off for a year, presumably because of insufficient rehearsal time but just as likely to give Thomas more opportunity to get this massive score under his belt.

The wisdom of that postponement, whatever its reason, became only too clear over the weekend in Symphony Hall. Thomas' treatment of this complex, introspective, neurotic, yet magnificent work was truly astonishing.

Mahler was never really satisfied with his Fifth Symphony. He completed it in 1902, reorchestrated it again and again on the basis of problems at rehearsal, allowed it to have its premiere under his own baton in Cologne in 1904, and then kept on tinkering with the orchestration, changing it for nearly every performance.

The Fifth marked a point of departure for the composer. It contained neither program nor extra-symphonic apparatus. The First Symphony pursued specific and detailed program. Numbers Two, Three and Four included the human voice in addition to the orchestra, but Number Five was to be taken on its own terms, the music it contained played by a full symphony orchestra, albeit a large one. The music spoke for itself, Mahler believed, and he refused even to permit verbal analysis or description to appear in the printed program.

Over the years the Fifth has had a controversial career. It has been praised as the source of twentieth-century symphonic music, giving inspiration to Schoenberg, Berg and the many who followed them. On the other hand, it has been denigrated as trite and banal, sort of a noisy pastiche, drawing on Wagner, Bruckner and even Richard Strauss. Much of the latter view, I suspect, comes from the sturm und drang and overemotional forcing with which most conductors interpret this score.

That the symphony is a powerful, dramatic influential work becomes evident from the kind of reading Thomas gave it. This was a performance that was big without being bombastic or pretentious. It was wholly faithful to the Mahler score, played the way the composer wrote it, respectful of the guidelines on the printed page. Notes were given a true value, tempos were exact, details were emphasized, accents appeared where they belong, clarity prevailed; all was as it ought to have been. Thus the poignance of the music, the torment of its composer, the elegance of his style, and his brilliant orchestral technique all came through in the best manner possible to show off the Symphony in a favorable light.

The Orchestra, in responding to Thomas ideas, played as only the Boston Symphony can when inspired. Thomas invited all its members, especially Charles Yancich, horn, and Armando Ghitalla, trumpet, who carried some of the difficult solo passages, to share the applause.

Before the Symphony, which lasts over an hour, Thomas conducted the first performance by the Orchestra of an Oboe Concerto in C, attributed to Franz Josef Haydn. Ralph Gomberg was the soloist in this charming cameo which had enough of the spirit of Haydn to warrant the attribution, but which actually may have been composed by someone else who lived at the same time. Some of the ornamental writing for the oboe manifested an ornateness which doesn't seem quite in keeping with Haydn's exquisite taste. But this could have been an emendation by someone else at a later date.

Gomberg, a superb virtuoso, moved through the solo part with grace and sprightliness. And these supported by Thomas' deft direction of a reduced ensemble supplemented by harpsichord provided a jocund prologue to a memorable main piece. The audience loved it.

H.

The Lookout

Thanks for the symphony

By PAUL KENYON

It was exciting to go to Symphony Hall again after four stayaway years starting with a broken shinbone and a six-month long-leg cast.

We were early, not knowning whether the nearby parking lot was still there. It was not; the site was covered with buildings under construction. So we drove into a nearby garage with a parking sign out, and were waved right through the garage into a side street where one attendant collected $2.50 and another drove the car to an adjacent outdoor lot.

Good old Symphony Hall seemed unchanged in appearance, we were glad to see. The audience was changed somewhat; people were dressed less formally. But they enjoyed the music as deeply as ever, judging by their attentiveness and applause.

The biggest change was in the conductor. Instead of short, taut Erich Leinsdorf the podium was occupied by tall, bouncy Michael Tilson Thomas, the associate conductor.

We had seen Thomas on television Channel 2, of course, and admired his apparent abundant vigor and excellent musicianship. Somehow it was a bit unexpected to see him so conventional looking, wearing white tie and tails like the players. The players, incidentally, had changed subtly in appearance; there were at least three women on stage; some of the men were real longhairs; one of two had put on weight; some looked a few years older; there were newcomers.

But these observations are superficial; we were there to hear great music and we were delighted.

For the first part the orchestra played Oboe concerto in C, attributed to Joseph Haydn. The score of this concerto came to light in 1926 and was published 11 years later, said the program notes. On the manuscript somebody wrote in blue pencil the words "Von Haydn?" Judging from the style the work could certainly be by Haydn, but it might well be by a dozen other composers of the period, the notes added.

To my musically naive ear the music was Haydn-quality; satisfying in its spirit and gracefulness, its unabashed beauties of tone and tempo.

Ralph Gomberg, who has been a BSO player since 1949 and is principal oboe, was the soloist, a true virtuoso whose performance was inspiring in its sustained brilliance.

We exchanged glad-to-be-here smiles; for a joint Christmas present we had responded to the orchestra's extra series of three Thursday concerts; the others are Feb. 24 and April 13.

After intermission the music was pure music, great music in my opinion: Symphony no. 5 in C sharp minor, by Gustav Mahler.

Mahler was born in Bohemia in 1860; he completed the Fifth symphony in 1902. The Boston Symphony first played it in 1906. Though that was the year before the year I was born I still regard Mahler as a modern; Haydn was born in Austria in 1732.

The program notes emphasized Mahler's opinion that explanations of this work did more harm than good to listeners. Said the composer, "The audience should be left to its own thoughts over the work that is performed." In other words, he was not representing anything, he was composing music.

Music for music's sake. Music self-sufficient. Enjoy. Enjoy. I absorbed a trumpet fanfare and gloried in recurring trumpeting (my cornet lessons as a teenager did at least prepare me to give more than lip-service to good playing).

The strings of the Boston Symphony came to me again in their admirable strength and expression. The percussions spoke with authority. The woodwinds and the brasses carried on musical conversations.

Exalted, thrilled, ultimately relaxed, I clapped till my hands ached, as did hundreds of others. I returned to the cold night and headlighted highways thankful that such talented people shared their talents so effectively.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 1 1972

New England Newsclip

LAST Wednesday night, another young conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, brought the Boston Symphony to Philharmonic Hall and performed Mahler's Fifth Symphony. Mr. Thomas is not yet quite as sure of himself as Mr. Barenboim is, but his way with this symphony was nevertheless impressive. In a few places I would have welcomed a more vivid pointing up of the bitterness and hysteria that Mahler put into this work. Mr. Thomas's conception of it was rather gentle. But his control of the broad relationships of the score was admirable; he, too, was flexible where tempos were concerned, and the total impression was one of grandeur. Charles Yancich, the orchestra's first horn, was featured in the program, and he deserved to be. His playing in the Scherzo in particular was flawless, and powerful in tone.

The Mahler symphony was preceded by an oboe concerto attributed to Haydn, with Ralph Gomberg as soloist. Mr. Gomberg disclosed a refined tone (a characteristic of the French school of oboe playing to which his teacher, Marcel Tabuteau, belonged) and a technique notable for its fluency. I have heard oboe players with a greater range of dynamics—that is to say, oboists who can play louder and softer than Mr. Gomberg. But a large dynamic range is difficult to achieve on the oboe, and Mr. Gomberg's performance was scrupulous and deft.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

JAN 27 1972

New England Newsclip

In Concert

Ripe for the Playing

By Peter M. Knapp

The symphonies of Gustav Mahler are generally supposed to be the realm of the ripe old men of the podium. But Michael Tilson Thomas demonstrated at Tuesday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that ripe young men can handle them, too.

The subject was Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor — not one of the Viennese composer-conductor's most popular, and just as sprawling, big, eccentric and problematic as most of the others. A test for any orchestra and conductor.

But the test was met. Thomas conducted as if it were all a sure thing, and the music came forth poised and coherent in garlands of magnificent orchestral playing.

It is astonishing how a great symphony orchestra can maintain its vigor and enthusiasm week after week, with the demands of wide-ranging repertoire and adjustments to different styles — and not at all surprising when there is an occasional letdown. But for this program, the orchestra was "up" and it played as if it had been doing nothing but prepare the Mahler for months. There were fine solo contributions from Armando Ghitalla, trumpet, and Charles Yancich, horn.

Fitting It Together

And Thomas, too, directed as if he had done little but prepare this symphony, calculating its components and how they fit together. Mahler's music can sound embarrassing if it doesn't fit together. But Thomas made it all sound right, choosing tempi that seemed logically welded to each other and dodging the temptations to exaggerate in certain episodes, placing his stresses carefully within the melodic lines and keeping the instrumental complexities from becoming muddled. The Fifth, though, does have its share of purple passages, and there is little to do but paint them violet.

Mahler completed his Fifth Symphony in 1902 at his summer home at Maiernigg, on the Woerthersee in the green Austrian province of Carinthia. He had been only a few months married, and the summer was properly idyllic — "a life of utter peace and concentration," his wife Alma recalled in her memoirs.

If out of this contentment came the serene Adagietto, one of Mahler's loveliest melodic creations, and the bucolic strains of the Rondo, so are there later references to Maiernigg in Mahler's symphonies — and the environment hardly explains the undertone of melancholy or the passionate outbursts of the score.

Hayden And Gomberg

Also on the program was an enjoyable Oboe concerto in C, loosely attributed to Haydn and brilliantly played by Ralph Gomberg. The piece was discovered in 1926 and linked to Haydn because someone had pencilled in the words, "Von Haydn?" It could be Haydn, but it might also be Dieter Bockwurst or whomever.

At any rate, the music is 18th century, charming, a bit formal in the salon-and-powdered-wig fashion, and a fine display piece if you're an oboist named Gomberg. He played it elegantly, with impeccable technique (some of the passagework was virtuosic wizardry), fine tone and more control over shading and dynamics than you'd think possible from the instrument. The BSO should be glad to have him.

[69]

PASTE OVER

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

FEB 19 1972

MUSICAL EVENTS

Before Strict Construction

DANIEL BARENBOIM's performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony with the Cleveland Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Monday night of last week brought me back to a sort of watershed in the history of [illegible] ican scene), Klemperer, Mengelberg himself, and several others. On the whole, the influence was a malign one, despite Toscanini's enormous gifts. The old nineteenth-century art of interpretation was lost, and with it went the [illegible] done. A few flaws in the horn parts can be attributed to the fact that the Clevelanders are at the moment playing under too many conductors. I hope that Mr. Barenboim's performance will set the stage for a revival of nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century methods.

The program also contained Liszt's Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, with Clifford Curzon as the [illegible] piano soloist, and again I re- [illegible] is an absolutely de- [illegible] of display music of [illegible] disappointing com- [illegible] avowedly profound [illegible] Boulez is trying to

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JAN 27 1972

New England Newsclip

At Boston Symphony

GOMBERG AND MAHLER FIFTH

In announcing its program schedule for last season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra included a performance of Mahler's Fifth Symphony under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas. Before it was due, however, the symphony was put off for a year, presumably because of insufficient rehearsal time but just as likely to give Thomas more opportunity to get this massive score under his belt.

The wisdom of that postponement, whatever its reason, became only too clear over the weekend in Symphony Hall. Thomas' treatment of this complex, introspective, neurotic, yet magnificent work was truly astonishing.

Mahler was never really satisfied with his Fifth Symphony. He completed it in 1902, reorchestrated it again and again on the basis of problems at rehearsal, allowed it to have its premiere under his own baton in Cologne in 1904, and then kept on tinkering with the orchestration, changing it for nearly every performance.

The Fifth marked a point of departure for the composer. It contained neither program nor extra-symphonic apparatus. The First Symphony pursued specific and detailed program. Numbers Two, Three and Four included the human voice in addition to the orchestra, but Number Five was to be taken on its own terms, the music it contained played by a full symphony orchestra, albeit a large one. The music spoke for itself, Mahler believed, and he refused even to permit verbal analysis or description to appear in the printed program.

Over the years the Fifth has had a controversial career. It has been praised as the source of twentieth-century symphonic music, giving inspiration to Schoenberg, Berg and the many who followed them. On the other hand, it has been denigrated as trite and banal, sort of a noisy pastiche, drawing on Wagner, Bruckner and even Richard Strauss. Much of the latter view, I suspect, comes from the sturm und drang and overemotional forcing with which most conductors interpret this score.

That the symphony is a powerful, dramatic influential work becomes evident from the kind of reading Thomas gave it. This was a performance that was big without being bombastic or pretentious. It was wholly faithful to the Mahler score, played the way the composer wrote it, respectful of the guidelines on the printed page. Notes were given a true value, tempos were exact, details were emphasized, accents appeared where they belong, clarity prevailed; all was as it ought to have been. Thus the poignance of the music, the torment of its composer, the elegance of his style, and his brilliant orchestral technique all came through in the best manner possible to show off the Symphony in a favorable light.

The Orchestra, in responding to Thomas ideas, played as only the Boston Symphony can when inspired. Thomas invited all its members, especially Charles Yancich, horn, and Armando Ghitalla, trumpet, who carried some of the difficult solo passages, to share the applause.

Before the Symphony, which lasts over an hour, Thomas conducted the first performance by the Orchestra of an Oboe Concerto in C, attributed to Franz Josef Haydn. Ralph Gomberg was the soloist in this charming cameo which had enough of the spirit of Haydn to warrant the attribution, but which actually may have been composed by someone else who lived at the same time. Some of the ornamental writing for the oboe manifested an ornateness which doesn't seem quite in keeping with Haydn's exquisite taste. But this could have been an emendation by someone else at a later date.

Gomberg, a superb virtuoso, moved through the solo part with grace and sprightliness. And these supported by Thomas' deft direction of a reduced ensemble supplemented by harpsichord provided a jocund prologue to a memorable main piece. The audience loved it.

H.

The Lookout

Thanks for the symphony

By PAUL KENYON

It was exciting to go to Symphony Hall again after four stayaway years starting with a broken shinbone and a six-month long-leg cast.

We were early, not knowning whether the nearby parking lot was still there. It was not; the site was covered with buildings under construction. So we drove into a nearby garage with a parking sign out, and were waved right through the garage into a side street where one attendant collected $2.50 and another drove the car to an adjacent outdoor lot.

Good old Symphony Hall seemed unchanged in appearance, we were glad to see. The audience was changed somewhat; people were dressed less formally. But they enjoyed the music as deeply as ever, judging by their attentiveness and applause.

The biggest change was in the conductor. Instead of short, taut Erich Leinsdorf the podium was occupied by tall, bouncy Michael Tilson Thomas, the associate conductor.

We had seen Thomas on television Channel 2, of course, and admired his apparent abundant vigor and excellent musicianship. Somehow it was a bit unexpected to see him so conventional looking, wearing white tie and tails like the players. The players, incidentally, had changed subtly in appearance; there were at least three women on stage; some of the men were real longhairs; one of two had put on weight; some looked a few years older; there were newcomers.

But these observations are superficial; we were there to hear great music and we were delighted.

For the first part the orchestra played Oboe concerto in C, attributed to Joseph Haydn. The score of this concerto came to light in 1926 and was published 11 years later, said the program notes. On the manuscript somebody wrote in blue pencil the words "Von Haydn?" Judging from the style the work could certainly be by Haydn, but it might well be by a dozen other composers of the period, the notes added.

To my musically naive ear the music was Haydn-quality; satisfying in its spirit and gracefulness, its unabashed beauties of tone and tempo.

Ralph Gomberg, who has been a BSO player since 1949 and is principal oboe, was the soloist, a true virtuoso whose performance was inspiring in its sustained brilliance.

We exchanged glad-to-be-here smiles; for a joint Christmas present we had responded to the orchestra's extra series of three Thursday concerts; the others are Feb. 24 and April 13.

After intermission the music was pure music, great music in my opinion: Symphony no. 5 in C sharp minor, by Gustav Mahler.

Mahler was born in Bohemia in 1860; he completed the Fifth symphony in 1902. The Boston Symphony first played it in 1906. Though that was the year before the year I was born I still regard Mahler as a modern; Haydn was born in Austria in 1732.

The program notes emphasized Mahler's opinion that explanations of this work did more harm than good to listeners. Said the composer, "The audience should be left to its own thoughts over the work that is performed." In other words, he was not representing anything, he was composing music.

Music for music's sake. Music self-sufficient. Enjoy. Enjoy. I absorbed a trumpet fanfare and gloried in recurring trumpeting (my cornet lessons as a teenager did at least prepare me to give more than lip-service to good playing).

The strings of the Boston Symphony came to me again in their admirable strength and expression. The percussions spoke with authority. The woodwinds and the brasses carried on musical conversations.

Exalted, thrilled, ultimately relaxed, I clapped till my hands ached, as did hundreds of others. I returned to the cold night and headlighted highways thankful that such talented people shared their talents so effectively.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 1 1972

New England Newsclip

LAST Wednesday night, another young conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, brought the Boston Symphony to Philharmonic Hall and performed Mahler's Fifth Symphony. Mr. Thomas is not yet quite as sure of himself as Mr. Barenboim is, but his way with this symphony was nevertheless impressive. In a few places I would have welcomed a more vivid pointing up of the bitterness and hysteria that Mahler put into this work. Mr. Thomas's conception of it was rather gentle. But his control of the broad relationships of the score was admirable; he, too, was flexible where tempos were concerned, and the total impression was one of grandeur. Charles Yancich, the orchestra's first horn, was featured in the program, and he deserved to be. His playing in the Scherzo in particular was flawless, and powerful in tone.

The Mahler symphony was preceded by an oboe concerto attributed to Haydn, with Ralph Gomberg as soloist. Mr. Gomberg disclosed a refined tone (a characteristic of the French school of oboe playing to which his teacher, Marcel Tabuteau, belonged) and a technique notable for its fluency. I have heard oboe players with a greater range of dynamics—that is to say, oboists who can play louder and softer than Mr. Gomberg. But a large dynamic range is difficult to achieve on the oboe, and Mr. Gomberg's performance was scrupulous and deft.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

JAN 27 1972

New England Newsclip

In Concert

Ripe for the Playing

By Peter M. Knapp

The symphonies of Gustav Mahler are generally supposed to be the realm of the ripe old men of the podium. But Michael Tilson Thomas demonstrated at Tuesday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that ripe young men can handle them, too.

The subject was Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor — not one of the Viennese composer-conductor's most popular, and just as sprawling, big, eccentric and problematic as most of the others. A test for any orchestra and conductor.

But the test was met. Thomas conducted as if it were all a sure thing, and the music came forth poised and coherent in garlands of magnificent orchestral playing.

It is astonishing how a great symphony orchestra can maintain its vigor and enthusiasm week after week, with the demands of wide-ranging repertoire and adjustments to different styles — and not at all surprising when there is an occasional letdown. But for this program, the orchestra was "up" and it played as if it had been doing nothing but prepare the Mahler for months. There were fine solo contributions from Armando Ghitalla, trumpet, and Charles Yancich, horn.

Fitting It Together

And Thomas, too, directed as if he had done little but prepare this symphony, calculating its components and how they fit together. Mahler's music can sound embarrassing if it doesn't fit together. But Thomas made it all sound right, choosing tempi that seemed logically welded to each other and dodging the temptations to exaggerate in certain episodes, placing his stresses carefully within the melodic lines and keeping the instrumental complexities from becoming muddled. The Fifth, though, does have its share of purple passages, and there is little to do but paint them violet.

Mahler completed his Fifth Symphony in 1902 at his summer home at Maiernigg, on the Woerthersee in the green Austrian province of Carinthia. He had been only a few months married, and the summer was properly idyllic — "a life of utter peace and concentration," his wife Alma recalled in her memoirs.

If out of this contentment came the serene Adagietto, one of Mahler's loveliest melodic creations, and the bucolic strains of the Rondo, so are there later references to Maiernigg in Mahler's symphonies — and the environment hardly explains the undertone of melancholy or the passionate outbursts of the score.

Hayden And Gomberg

Also on the program was an enjoyable Oboe concerto in C, loosely attributed to Haydn and brilliantly played by Ralph Gomberg. The piece was discovered in 1926 and linked to Haydn because someone had pencilled in the words, "Von Haydn?" It could be Haydn, but it might also be Dieter Bockwurst or whomever.

At any rate, the music is 18th century, charming, a bit formal in the salon-and-powdered-wig fashion, and a fine display piece if you're an oboist named Gomberg. He played it elegantly, with impeccable technique (some of the passagework was virtuosic wizardry), fine tone and more control over shading and dynamics than you'd think possible from the instrument. The BSO should be glad to have him.

[69]

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,981

JAN 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Cellist Laurence Lesser Soloist with BSO

By HARRY NEVILLE

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony yesterday in a concert that featured the young West Coast cellist Laurence Lesser as soloist. Lesser was a prize-winner in the 1960 Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow, where he also recorded for the Melodiya lable. He will be familiar to some U.S. listeners as the soloist on the Columbia recording of Schoenberg's D Major Cello Concerto, and for those who know this work it will be unnecessary to say that he is a commanding technician.

At yesterday's concert, his first appearance iwth the Boston Symphony, he made an excellent impression in Hindemith's Cello Concerto. Hindemith composed this work in Lenox, Mass., during the summer of 1940. It was first performed by the Boston Symphony, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the following year. It got several performances that year, only to disappear completely from BSO programs during the next 30 years.

ALL OF WHICH seems to me a shame, for the Concerto turns out to be a wonderful work, brightly orchestrated, full of contrapuntal ingenuities, and bubbling with good spirits—especially in the witty pianissimo Trio of the Finale. Lesser gave a performance that was generally understated, and this worked particularly well in the gentle melody that opens the middle movement. Solid as his work was in the outer movements, I nevertheless found myself at times wishing for something more assertive, something bolder and more aggressive in the matters of tone and attacks.

Thomas opened yesterday's program with two instrumental canzonas of Giovanni Gabrieli, the 16th century Venetian composer who is perhaps best remembered for the antiphonal works he wrote for use in the basilica of St. Mark's Cathedral. Gabrieli wrote about 50 works for various kinds of instrumental ensembles, from which Thomas chose two for a double quartet of brass instruments.

THEY PROVED to be short pieces, melodious and quite buoyant—in short, a splendid prelude to a program which, besides the sparkling Hindemith Concerto, included Schumann's "Spring" Symphony.

Thomas gave an exhilarating reading of the Schumann, a reading which, though plastic in its tempos, never once gave the impression of straining to make a point. Thomas's springing rhythms seemed exactly right, and the mood of joy and eagerness that pervades the outer movements came across with thrilling effect. Neither was there any lack of tenderness in the slow movement, which was also notable for some exquisite playing by the strings.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Lesser soloist, Thomas conducts

BSO: Hindemith's Concerto

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Laurence Lesser, who was soloist in Hindemith's Cello Concerto at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, is an outstanding example of a peculiarly American phenomenon, the brainy virtuoso. To offer a handful of co-ordinates on him — he is a graduate of Harvard where he did honors work in mathematics, he was a prize-winner at the 1966 Moscow competition, he is the soloist in the only recording of the Schoenberg Concerto, and he teaches at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore.

Hindemith's Concerto, written at Tanglewood during the very first session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, which would be about when Lesser was born, is a temporarily engaging, then easily forgettable piece, very pretty in its lyric moments, quite amusing in its finale (based on the theme of a march by Frederick the Great's sister Amalia — far out!), and with some inclination to be coarse and noisy in the passages for full orchestra. It is not a work to challenge a cellist's intellect; it does, however, want a performance of crackling virtuosity and life, and that is just what Lesser gave it. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted. He and Lesser have on occasion given recitals together with Thomas at the piano; yesterday, too, their ensemble was comfortable, and the orchestra's playing was responsive across the whole range from the rowdy to the delicate.

The concert began with a quartet of trumpets and trombones on each side of an otherwise unpeopled stage (except for the conductor, of course), and with the brilliant playing of two antiphonal Canzone by Giovanni Gabrieli. After intermission, Thomas conducted Schumann's "Spring" Symphony in an orderly, rather prosaic performance.

PAUL HINDEMITH
. . . 1950 photo

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988

JAN 30 1972 New England Newsclip

Hindemith Concerto Brought to Life by Thomas

By SUSAN COOPER MARKELL

Friday's Boston Symphony concert was one of Tilson Thomas' "time-travel" specials. (This is his own appellation for programs which cover a span of 400 years or more.)

Thomas began with two 16th century canzonas for brass instruments, by Giovanni Gabrieli. The first was canzon noni toni which, as the title indicates, is built on and around the ninth note of the modal scale. It sounded quite like a Gregorian chant without the voices, with surprisingly delicate color and fine shading that one does not ordinarily associate with brasses. However, it closed with a rather lengthy and exaggerated retard. The second, canzon septemi toni, involving the seventh note of the scale, is a work of great dignity, well-captured by Thomas. This type of music is not often played today and should be more fixed in the repertoire.

★

This was followed by Hindemith's Cello Concerto (1940) with Lawrence Lesser as soloist. The piece is quite similar, in form and spirit, to Hindemith's Mathis der Mahler and should enjoy the same popularity. This performance was superb.

He gave it the necessary careful treatment, while allowing its warmth and humor to be freely heard. Lesser, a former Harvard mathematician, handles the cello part with much understanding and no exaggeration. He makes the point without overdoing it. His playing is warm but clear and light on vibrato, which suits the work. A more-than-competent and etremely confident soloist. The members of the orchestra showed more than cursory respect for his musicianship. It was a difficult work well played.

The Schumann is another story entirely. It was, I think, the Spring Symphony (No. 1). It was also a rather disjointed performance. The first movement was deadly slow, so much so as to lose the melody. Additionally, the articulation was over-fussy. Towards the end of the movement Thomas moved a little closer to the spirit of the composer and of the period and then came the last chord, grossly out of tune.

★

Thomas, as usual, is to be commended for his unusual and creative programming.

Some vernal m

By Louis Snyder

That was the day the young virtuosos took over Boston's Symphony Hall. On Friday afternoon, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony with his Californian contemporary, Laurence Lesser, as cello soloist. In the evening, there was a full house for a program of Beethoven violin-piano sonatas played by Pinchas Zukerman and Daniel Barenboim, two youthful Israeli musicians who have been prominent in the public eye for so long they almost seem like veterans. Headwaggers bewailing the future state of concert music here, at least, received a setback.

Although there was snow outside, there were vernal sounds within. Mr. Thomas led the orchestra in Schumann's "Spring Symphony" (No. 1 in B flat), so designated by the composer, and the evening's program included the F major Sonata, Op. 24, also called "Spring," not however by Beethoven but, not inappropriately, by someone else along the way.

Symphony's program, like most that Mr. Thomas has provided, was subtly unified and full of rewards of different kinds. To begin with there were two Canzoni by Gabrieli for two brass quartets (two trumpets, two trombones each), the groups of four players seated against the opposite side walls of the stage to enhance antiphonal effect. While the same novel result wasn't achieved as when the second Canzon (Septimi toni) was done in the hall itself from opposite sides of the balcony at the first Spectrum concerts, the rich texture of sound produced by eight expert brassists made this a bracing listening experience for the ear, if not a chilling one for the spine.

Hindemith

The Hindemith Cello Concerto, with which Mr. Lesser made his BSO debut, was returning for the first time since its world premier performances by the orchestra in 1941 under Serge Koussevitzky with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. It had been composed at Tanglewood during the previous summer when Hindemith was also teaching at the initial sessions of the Berkshire Music Center, several years before either the present conductor or cellist was born.

Perhaps the long-absent work has been waiting for two such interpreters to come along, for Mr. Thomas and Mr. Lesser restored it to Symphony Hall with all its attractive craftsmanship and good humor intact. Unfamiliar as it is to most, time and increasing aural sophistication have rounded the edges that must have seemed spiky to 1941 listeners, without making the Concerto sound today like a piece of bygone daring. And despite its large demands on the soloist — met with tremendous technical skill by Mr. Lesser — this is not the usual showpiece for cello with orchestral background. Everyone gets very much involved.

Mr. Lesser's tone, emerging from the diffuse opening tutti, proved to be strong and resilient, made to order for solo passages that are never calculated to take flight in anything resembling a traditional tour de force. His rhythmic sense, complementing Mr. Thomas's, was always evident and sure, a must for interpreting this strongly individualistic, high-spirited musical statement.

Sonata duo

Schumann's First Symphony, in Mr. Thomas's first encounter with it here (its last previous Boston performances were in 1966), revealed much of the fresh, unfettered approach that marked his conducting of the Schumann Third last season at Symphony Hall and on the BSO's European tour. Its pace is flowing rather than skipping, which is all to the good, and no doubt a few tentative moments of difference between musicians and conductor on Friday will have disappeared when the same program is repeated at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,161

JAN 31 1972 Ne

PROMENADE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 125,000

JAN 1972

Right: Raul Julia and Clifton Davis play the title roles in Two Gentlemen of Verona, the boisterous and beautiful musical at the St. James based on Shakespeare's play of the same name. John Guare and Mel Shapiro wrote the book and Galt MacDermot the music.

Below: Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in all-Brahms concerts at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

JAN 17 1972

Critic-at-Large

Moving Experiences

#6

By BYRON BELT

From Wagner's glorious "Die Meistersinger" at the Met to Odetta at Carnegie Hall is really a small step. The one is possibly the most humane and profoundly moving of all operas, and the other is one of the most deeply moving humanitarians.

I recently scolded a young colleague of mine for using too many personal pronouns in his music reviews. But participation is the name of the game in today's arts—and we participated rather wildly and wonderfully between Friday and last night.

In no particular order—we shed tears of authentic joy during Saturday's extraordinarily moving and beautifully performed Met Opera matinee of "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg;" we clapped happily during a solo stint by Odetta as part of last night's "Symphonic Soul" program by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, and really helped tear the house down during an explosion of joyful jazz, gospel and symphony that is Charles Walker's "Requiem for Brother Martin."

* * *

WE ALSO WALKED out on a Hunter College piano recital by Samuel Lipman; laughed uproariously during a sneak visit to the New York City Ballet's riotous production of Jerome Robbins' funniest of all ballets, "The Concert;" smiled idulgently with gracious Carla Pracci, somewhat lost in American Ballet Theatre's corny production of "La Pille Mal Gardee;" and enjoyed portions of soprano Anna Moffo's Carnegie Hall recital, bits of Michael Tilson Thomas's first run-through with the Boston Symphony of the towering Bhrams Fourth Symphony—and thrilled to every moment of Bruno Maderna's first subscription concert with the New York Philharmonic.

Details—such as room permits—are almost irrelevant. What is important is that it is still possible—yea ESSENTIAL—to get involved when it comes to music and dance. A judicious, sitting-on-the-fence posture simply will not do, and this weekend we could not even try!

The important events, perhaps, are the Met "Meistersinger" and the Philharmonic concert. The latter receives its last performance tonight at 7:30, and there will be several performances of the Wagner opera in the weeks to come. Any serious music lover should make every effort to experience each.

Bruno Maderna is obviously one conductor the Philharmonic respects. His debut program was as well played as any in recent seasons, and it is a musical delight all the way. Liszt's "orpheus" is his loveliest symphonic poem, and it and the exquisite Mendelsson "Scotch" Symphony have neither been so beautifully performed since the days of Sir Thomas Beecham.

* * *

SOPRANO HELGA DERNESCH is a statuesque stunner of a soprano, and although her voice turns hard at top volume, she sang portions of the Wagner "Wesendonck Songs" more expressively than any singer within memory. Berg's expressionistic "Der Wein" was wonderfully sung and played to complete a very special and triumphant Philharmonic event.

It is a bit late in the day to rave about the Met's magnificent "Die Meistersinger." Its O'Hearn-Merrill production remain the handsomest in the house, and the current cast, under the absolutely superb musical direction of Thomas Schippers, is among the finest imaginable.

Pilar Lorenjo, enjoying a vintage year in New York—is the most radiant Eva since the days of the young Schwarzkopf and Steber. James King's Walther is surprisingly touching and goldenly heroic, and the Hans Sachs of Theo Adam is a mixture of warm humanity and prophetic mystic. These, and a raft of superb characterizations by Donald Gramm, Beno Kusche and others, plus superior work by the chorus and orchestra all add to a memorable "Meistersinger."

We didn't walk out on Samuel Lipman because he is bad—he revels in loud, fast playing, and since he is very good at each, one should not really complain. Unhappily, Busoni transcriptions of Bach and the List Sonata are not my dish and Mr. Lipman was to play Thirteen Rachmaninoff prelude in addition. Enough was too much. Perhaps he'll come and play music one day.

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000

JAN 24 1972

MUSIC

Misha of the New Breed

He sat there like an unwilling model for the portrait of the pianist as a young man. Waiting impatiently at the piano last week in New York's Philharmonic Hall while the Boston Symphony under Michael Tilson Thomas played the long introduction to Brahms's First Piano Concerto, 26-year-old Misha Dichter, boyish-looking, longhaired, sturdily built, fidgeted eagerly, adjusted and squirmed on his stool, picked imaginary lint from the keys, fingered them anxiously, swayed back and forth in anticipation and, when his cue came, jumped into the music as if it were the cool sea on a hot summer day.

Dichter's probably the best of a new breed of pianists. He was second in Moscow's 1966 Tchaikovsky Competition, while a Russian audience jeered the Russian winner and chanted "Dichter first, Dichter first." The new breed that Dichter embodies rejects the nineteenth-century image of the pianist as star and virtuoso, which, along with the last century's music, continues to dominate this century's concertizing. Dichter takes his stupendous technique for granted. "I avoid playing things that mainly require virtuosity, like Liszt études," he says. "They're like high jumps in ballet. They make me feel like a clown."

Dichter has come to a troublesome crossroads in his short, brilliant career. It's his own fault. He could confine himself to the classic repertory and pursue a flourishing concert career and increasing fame and wealth. Like it or not, he's a child of his century—and of its second half. "I have this nagging suspicion," he says, "that people will look back on this era and regard the distinctions among various interpretations of Beethoven and Brahms as mere hairsplitting. I must move along."

Serious: His recitals are already distinguished by his playing of lesser-known works by well-known composers, such as Schubert's A Major Sonata Opus Posthumous or, instead of "Carnaval," Schumann's F Sharp Minor Sonata. Lately his stack of twentieth-century scores has been growing as he prepares Alban Berg, more and more Bartók and Stravinsky, and both Ives sonatas, including the great "Concord." "I'm ashamed to say," Dichter admits, "that so far for me this newer music is 50 years old." But he is now into the piano works of Messiaen, Elliott Carter and Leon Kirchner. "I must be in time with the sounds of my time," he says.

His wife, Cipa, a Brazilian pianist whom he met at Juilliard when he was studying with Rosina Lhevinne, thinks that Misha is becoming too serious too soon. "If he doesn't play the popular pieces now, he won't later," says the young mother of their five-month-old baby, Gabriel Sviatoslav, named for Russian pianist Sviatoslav Richter, Dichter's favorite.

Wally McNamee—Newsweek

Dichter: Reaching the last row

Dichter is sensitive to audiences. "Apparently," he says, "one of the reasons that Glenn Gould stopped concertizing was that he resented having to magnify his performance to reach the last person in the balcony. I'm just the opposite. I need that. I want to reach the last row. Otherwise I might as well stay home and play. There's a combustibility about a performance that can make what you practice seem like gibberish onstage."

As prodigies go, Dichter is an All-American, earthy, direct, normal, like the kid next door, except for all those noisy bothersome scales. What could be more American than growing up in Beverly Hills? When he's not performing, he's still playing, with toys and games from Scrabble to Monopoly. "I'm making up for all the fun I missed when I was a kid and had to practice the piano."

Dichter's investment in new music does not mean abandoning the classic repertory. Brahms's First Concerto is a young man's work, which he himself first performed when he too was 26 and also at a crossroads in his career. It was to be Brahms's last display of raw power and deep conflict; after this he would settle down to mellow dignity.

Dichter attacked it with directness and clarity, free of the quixotic and the chichi. It's a fiendishly difficult work, all uphill, all steep and sudden curves and yawning abysses, and Dichter took it at full throttle, the piano barely large enough to contain his ferocity. Belonging to the under-30 generation, Dichter tends to hide a fiery musical temperament under a casual, mod exterior. Last week he let himself go, flirted with the danger of abandon, let the inner excitement boil over and brought to pulsating life the turbulent young Brahms, who had far to go and promises to keep. Dichter helped keep those promises, even to the last row of the balcony.

—HUBERT SAAL

PROMENADE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 125,000

JAN 1972

Right: Raul Julia and Clifton Davis play the title roles in Two Gentlemen of Verona, the boisterous and beautiful musical at the St. James based on Shakespeare's play of the same name. John Guare and Mel Shapiro wrote the book and Galt MacDermot the music.

Below: Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in all-Brahms concerts at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

JAN 17 1972

Critic-at-Large

Moving Experiences

By BYRON BELT

From Wagner's glorious "Die Meistersinger" at the Met to Odetta at Carnegie Hall is really a small step. The one is possibly the most humane and profoundly moving of all operas, and the other is one of the most deeply moving humanitarians.

I recently scolded a young colleague of mine for using too many personal pronouns in his music reviews. But participation is the name of the game in today's arts—and we participated rather wildly and wonderfully between Friday and last night.

In no particular order—we shed tears of authentic joy during Saturday's extraordinarily moving and beautifully performed Met Opera matinee of "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg;" we clapped happily during a solo stint by Odetta as part of last night's "Symphonic Soul" program by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, and really helped tear the house down during an explosion of joyful jazz, gospel and symphony that is Charles Walker's "Requiem for Brother Martin."

* * *

WE ALSO WALKED out on a Hunter College piano recital by Samuel Lipman; laughed uproariously during a sneak visit to the New York City Ballet's riotous production of Jerome Robbins' funniest of all ballets, "The Concert;" smiled idulgently with gracious Carla Pracci, somewhat lost in American Ballet Theatre's corny production of "La Pille Mal Gardee;" and enjoyed portions of soprano Anna Moffo's Carnegie Hall recital, bits of Michael Tilson Thomas's first run-through with the Boston Symphony of the towering Bhrams Fourth Symphony—and thrilled to every moment of Bruno Maderna's first subscription concert with the New York Philharmonic.

Details—such as room permits—are almost irrelevant. What is important is that it is still possible—yea ESSENTIAL—to get involved when it comes to music and dance. A judicious, sitting-on-the-fence posture simply will not do, and this weekend we could not even try!

The important events, perhaps, are the Met "Meistersinger" and the Philharmonic concert. The latter receives its last performance tonight at 7:30, and there will be several performances of the Wagner opera in the weeks to come. Any serious music lover should make every effort to experience each.

Bruno Maderna is obviously one conductor the Philharmonic respects. His debut program was as well played as any in recent seasons, and it is a musical delight all the way. Liszt's "orpheus" is his loveliest symphonic poem, and it and the exquisite Mendelsson "Scotch" Symphony have neither been so beautifully performed since the days of Sir Thomas Beecham.

* * *

SOPRANO HELGA DERNESCH is a statuesque stunner of a soprano, and although her voice turns hard at top volume, she sang portions of the Wagner "Wesendonck Songs" more expressively than any singer within memory. Berg's expressionistic "Der Wein" was wonderfully sung and played to complete a very special and triumphant Philharmonic event.

It is a bit late in the day to rave about the Met's magnificent "Die Meistersinger." Its O'Hearn-Merrill production remain the handsomest in the house, and the current cast, under the absolutely superb musical direction of Thomas Schippers, is among the finest imaginable.

Pilar Lorenjov enjoying a vintage year in New York—is the most radiant Eva since the days of the young Schwarzkopf and Steber. James King's Walther is surprisingly touching and goldenly heroic, and the Hans Sachs of Theo Adam is a mixture of warm humanity and prophetic mystic. These, and a raft of superb characterizations by Donald Gramm, Beno Kusche and others, plus superior work by the chorus and orchestra all add to a memorable "Meistersinger."

We didn't walk out on Samuel Lipman because he is bad—he revels in loud, fast playing, and since he is very good at each, one should not really complain. Unhappily, Busoni transcriptions of Bach and the List Sonata are not my dish and Mr. Lipman was to play Thirteen Rachmaninoff prelude in addition. Enough was too much. Perhaps he'll come and play music one day.

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000

JAN 24 1972

MUSIC

Misha of the New Breed

He sat there like an unwilling model for the portrait of the pianist as a young man. Waiting impatiently at the piano last week in New York's Philharmonic Hall while the Boston Symphony under Michael Tilson Thomas played the long introduction to Brahms's First Piano Concerto, 26-year-old Misha Dichter, boyish-looking, longhaired, sturdily built, fidgeted eagerly, adjusted and squirmed on his stool, picked imaginary lint from the keys, fingered them anxiously, swayed back and forth in anticipation and, when his cue came, jumped into the music as if it were the cool sea on a hot summer day.

Dichter's probably the best of a new breed of pianists. He was second in Moscow's 1966 Tchaikovsky Competition, while a Russian audience jeered the Russian winner and chanted "Dichter first, Dichter first." The new breed that Dichter embodies rejects the nineteenth-century image of the pianist as star and virtuoso, which, along with the last century's music, continues to dominate this century's concertizing. Dichter takes his stupendous technique for granted. "I avoid playing things that mainly require virtuosity, like Liszt études," he says. "They're like high jumps in ballet. They make me feel like a clown."

Dichter has come to a troublesome crossroads in his short, brilliant career. It's his own fault. He could confine himself to the classic repertory and pursue a flourishing concert career and increasing fame and wealth. Like it or not, he's a child of his century—and of its second half. "I have this nagging suspicion," he says, "that people will look back on this era and regard the distinctions among various interpretations of Beethoven and Brahms as mere hairsplitting. I must move along."

Serious: His recitals are already distinguished by his playing of lesser-known works by well-known composers, such as Schubert's A Major Sonata Opus Posthumous or, instead of "Carnaval," Schumann's F Sharp Minor Sonata. Lately his stack of twentieth-century scores has been growing as he prepares Alban Berg, more and more Bartók and Stravinsky, and both Ives sonatas, including the great "Concord." "I'm ashamed to say," Dichter admits, "that so far for me this newer music is 50 years old." But he is now into the piano works of Messiaen, Elliott Carter and Leon Kirchner. "I must be in time with the sounds of my time," he says.

His wife, Cipa, a Brazilian pianist whom he met at Juilliard when he was studying with Rosina Lhevinne, thinks that Misha is becoming too serious too soon. "If he doesn't play the popular pieces now, he won't later," says the young mother of their five-month-old baby, Gabriel Sviatoslav, named for Russian pianist Sviatoslav Richter, Dichter's favorite.

Wally McNamee—Newsweek

Dichter: Reaching the last row

Dichter is sensitive to audiences. "Apparently," he says, "one of the reasons that Glenn Gould stopped concertizing was that he resented having to magnify his performance to reach the last person in the balcony. I'm just the opposite. I need that. I want to reach the last row. Otherwise I might as well stay home and play. There's a combustibility about a performance that can make what you practice seem like gibberish onstage."

As prodigies go, Dichter is an All-American, earthy, direct, normal, like the kid next door, except for all those noisy bothersome scales. What could be more American than growing up in Beverly Hills? When he's not performing, he's still playing, with toys and games from Scrabble to Monopoly. "I'm making up for all the fun I missed when I was a kid and had to practice the piano."

Dichter's investment in new music does not mean abandoning the classic repertory. Brahms's First Concerto is a young man's work, which he himself first performed when he too was 26 and also at a crossroads in his career. It was to be Brahms's last display of raw power and deep conflict; after this he would settle down to mellow dignity.

Dichter attacked it with directness and clarity, free of the quixotic and the chichi. It's a fiendishly difficult work, all uphill, all steep and sudden curves and yawning abysses, and Dichter took it at full throttle, the piano barely large enough to contain his ferocity. Belonging to the under-30 generation, Dichter tends to hide a fiery musical temperament under a casual, mod exterior. Last week he let himself go, flirted with the danger of abandon, let the inner excitement boil over and brought to pulsating life the turbulent young Brahms, who had far to go and promises to keep. Dichter helped keep those promises, even to the last row of the balcony.

—HUBERT SAAL

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,549 S. 260,961
FEB 5 1972 New England Newsclip

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,900
FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .

Lillian

Colin Davis, Musical Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, returns to Boston to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday afternoon, February 4 at 2:00 p.m. and Saturday evening, February 5 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Davis opens the concert with the first Boston performance of Sir Michael Tippett's Fantasia Concertante on the theme of Corelli. Soloists are Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, Violins; and Jules Eskin, Principal Cellist of the Orchestra. Next is Mozart's Piano concerto in E-flat, K. 482 with soloist Stephen Bishop. Following intermission, the concert concludes with a performance of Dvorak's Seventh Symphony.

Colin Davis has been guest conductor of the Boston Symphony on several occasions during recent years. His conducting career began in 1949. His early experience was with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra, the Chelsea Opera Group, the Festival Ballet, and the Ballet Russe. In 1957 he became assistant conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra. Two years later he was called at short notice to take the place of Otto Klemperer, who became ill, in a concert performance of "Don Giovanni". This marked the turning point in Davis' career: he was shortly afterwards appointed Musical Director for the Sadler's Wells Opera made his debut with the CBS Symphony in Canada and appeared for the first time in the United States as guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony. He directed the Berlin Philharmonic in the German premiere of Britten's "War Requiem", and in the 1962-1963 season led the London Symphony in a tour of Europe, Japan, and Australia.

In 1967 Colin Davis became Chief Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra. He relinquished this position at the end of last season to take up his duties at Covent Garden.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202
FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Colin Davis, Musical Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first Boston performance of Sir Michael Tippett's "Fantasia Concertante on a theme of Corelli, tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Soloists will be BSO concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, and Jules Eskin, cellist. Stephen Bishop will be soloist in the performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in E-flat, K. 482 and the concert will conclude with Dvorak's Seventh Symphony.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
JAN 26 1972 New England Newsclip

Symphony Performs Michael Tippett's Work

By WESLEY FULLER

An intriguing work, the "Fantasia concertante on a theme of Corelli" by the contemporary English composer Michael Tippett opened Thursday evening's Boston Symphony Concert under the direction of fellow Englishman, Colin Davis.

Taking a theme of two moods from one of Corelli's Concertos, Tippett explores the musical implications of this duality, the "dark and the light" as he calls it.

The result is a musical experience which combines and alternates between the birghtness of the Baroque concertino violin passages, beautifully played by Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, and more intense layers of dissonant, contrapuntal texture in the two string orchestras. The simultaneity of the twentieth century idiom and the tonally controlled, earlier music does not produce anachronisms, because the composer subtly controls the balance between stylistic separation and mood-texture similarity.

"THE "LIGHT," the tonal clearing is often the C Major chord which dominates the last part of the Corelli theme. And how fresh and meaningful is that time honored chord in this music, proving again that the vertical sounding of the first four overtones can still be a powerful expression in the right, contemporary surroundings.

This is music from a fine, inventive musical imagination and, thanks to conductors such as Davis, Tippett's work's are gaining a wider audience. The strings of the Symphony displayed an impressive range of color and techique.

According to the program notes, the performance on Thursday evening of Mozart's Piano Concerto in E Flat, K. 482, was the first by the symphony in Boston in 10 years. It was by no means a completely successful return.

Stephen Bishop, the young American pianist, played with good tone and much intensity. It is difficult, however, to accept some of his interpretive decisions with respect to this work and to the Mozartian style.

For one example, there was a definite inclination to over interpret in an attempt, perhaps, to be expressive. The playing of the theme at the first piano entrance provides an instance. This melody, as with so many of Mozart's, increases in rhythmic excitement and activity in the second phrase. This excitement occurs without a great deal of fussy attention to the governing pulse. Decisions about rubatos and articulations are crucial in Mozart, but the answers are nearly always implied in the music itself. It was hard to discern Bishop's rationale in these matters.

THERE WAS ALSO a tendency to blur melody-accompaniment textures as well as sections of passage-work through the use of too much pedal. Concerning the sections of fast scales and arpeggios, these seemed to be approached as obstacles to be overcome, producing a frequent dynamic and tempo surge to a bumped ending and a sense of relief that it was over. There was often a lack of ease and flow.

Colin Davis is a conductor who can bring much dramatic impact to a score. He did this with the Dvorak Seventh Symphony at the end of the program. But in the Mozart this approach produced too many surges where there might have been repose, too much bombast where there might have been strong authority. From the beginning of the first movement there was a sense of pressing so that, for example, the sequence of falling suspensions were very blurred. There were also some questionable tempi. The overly slow andante section of the last movement, instigated by the conductor and accepted by the pianist provides one instance.

The conductor's dramatic flair worked well for the first movement of the Dvorak. It was an impassioned reading, turbulent, triumphant, lyric. The problem for this listener with this work is that it is so often turbulent, triumphant and lyric in a similar fashion. The last movement comes too close to banality. It was an up and down performance of an up and down symphony.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
FEB 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Davis conducts fascinating work

BSO plays Tippett's Fantasia

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Michael Steinberg's review of the Boston Opera Company's production of Berlioz' "The Trojans" (Part II) will appear in Monday's Globe.

When Colin Davis was guest conductor with the Boston Symphony two years ago, his programs included the extraordinarily interesting Symphony No. 2 by Sir Michael Tippett. When Davis returned to Boston and to the orchestra yesterday afternoon, he conducted Tippett's Fantasia Concertante on a theme of Corelli for string orchestra, a work written in 1953 for the Edinburgh Festival in celebration of Corelli's 300th birthday.

When Fantasia begins it might be a performance some 40 years ago of Corelli's F Major Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 2, played by a huge string orchestra, no harpsichord, but with the keyboard-figured bass accompaniment transcribed for strings. Given that, everything proceeds normally through some nine bars of what Tippett described as a "short contrapuntal adagio of a dark passionate kind," when the rhythm gets stretched a little oddly and the solo violinist offers a couple of flourishes suggestive of the improvisations with which performers in Corelli's day decorated such pieces.

You get then a series of variations of Corelli's adagio and a few measures of contrasting quick music, all seeming to grow from the seed of those initial and rhythmic and virtuosic disturbances. Later, the music emerges into an elaborate and beautiful fugue, quoting part of a Bach fugue on another theme by Corelli, then into a lush slow movement derived from Corelli's bass line, and still later into the metamorphosis of the material in the manner of the pastoral movement in the Corelli Christmas Concerto.

There is always a virtuoso filigree by a trio of two violins and cello, and a contrast of dark and light, of passion and a purely athletic sort of energy, is a constant factor in the Fantasia. I hear the work always as a finely composed translation of a musical dream, one whose surface moves further and futher from the given material, but which reveals more and more about its theme, as all profound variations series do. At the end, Corelli returns plain, with just a couple of tiny virtuosic extravaganzas for the two solo violinists to recall that fantastic world inhabited for the past quarter hour.

To me it is fascinating, a little frightening, deeply mysterious. I love the stubborn individuality of Tibbett's voice speaking through the inelegant thickness of his writing, and I'm always delighted and completely captivated by the combination of imagination and skill that makes the piece sound so marvelous. It is one of the most personal musical statements of recent years, one I find especially beautiful, and I was most grateful for the first chance to hear it in live performance, particularly one so lucid and so completely felt as that given it yesterday by Davis and the Boston Symphony strings.

After Tibbetts, there was the Mozart Piano Concerto in E Flat, K. 482, one of the richest of all those works, in amplitude of form, in the lavishness — in which Mozart scatters themes about, and in its singularly gorgeous clarinet and bassoon-dominated scoring out of the world of the wind serenades and "Cosi Fan Tutte." The soloist was Stephen Bishop, a tasteful pianist of rather placid temperament and less than ideally attentive about counting and keeping his foot off the pedal. The orchestra provided a gratuitous demonstration of the insufficiency of its horns, but apart from that, Davis and the Boston Symphony produced a powerfully stated musical framework which wanted to surround something stronger than anything Bishop seemed to have it in him to offer. Like many of the Mozart piano concerts, this one is filled with great opportunities for solo woodwinds; I was pleased that for once the first team was sent out for a concerto, which is not usually so, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, and particulary Sherman Walt, bassoon, provided playing of an animation and grace that came nowhere near being matched at the keyboard.

Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D Minor completed the program.

Lively Month Ahead For Music Lovers

Another visitor from England will be conductor Colin Davis, music director of Covent Garden opera house, who will lead the Boston Symphony in concerts Feb. 3, 4 and 5 at Symphony Hall. On the program will be the first Boston performance of Sir Michael Tippet's Fantasia Concertante on a theme of Corelli, Mozart's Piano Concerto in E flat, K. 482, with Stephen Bishop, soloist, and the Dvorak Seventh Symphony.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Colin Davis, conductor. Tippett: Fantasia concertante on a Theme of Corelli. Mozart: Piano Concerto No. 22 in E flat, K. 482. Stephen Bishop, piano. Dvorak: Symphony No. 7 in D minor, Op. 70. Carnegie Hall, February 12.

When Colin Davis came onstage to lead the Boston Symphony, he appeared physically tired and even (perhaps?) slightly bored. But there was no evidence of this in the performance he led. The program began with the New York premiere of a 1953 piece by (the now Sir) Michael Tippett. Tippett is a consummate master who has only recently begun to receive the recognition he deserves. The Fantasia concertante is a weighty work which rewards concentrated listening; it is scored for string orchestra with a concertino comprised of two violins and a cello. Davis' performance had clarity of texture (no mean achievement with this score) as well as commitment. The solos were excellent, and the full ensemble achieved a strikingly galvanic impact. Davis was joined by Stephen Bishop for Mozart's E flat Concerto. This is one of the most infrequently played of the mature Mozart's piano concerti, not on account of any flaws of its own. But among the other masterpieces Mozart was writing at this time, the neglect of K. 482 is understandable. Its appeal is not as direct, nor is its civilized course as readily moving as the more overt passion, suffering, and rejoicing of the C minor (K. 491), A major and D minor (K. 488 and K. 466), and C major (K. 467, "Elvira Madigan", and K. 504) concerti. A truly aristocratic aesthetic can never be widely popular. The performance was an outstanding one. Bishop, 31, is one of the most profound of contemporary pianists, with equally impressive technical capabilities. He and Davis never let elegance interfere with spiritedness; this is the truest poise. And the wind players deserved special praise. After intermission, Davis led the BSO in a big performance of Dvorak's D minor Symphony (formerly numbered as 2, but now correctly listed as No. 7). This is one of the finest Romantic symphonies, and Davis' performance has the mixture of discipline and fire that was Toscanini's mark in this repertoire. The second movement was particularly impressive in this regard. Although I enjoy a more Czech interpretation than Davis', there is no gainsaying the transporting excellence of performance.

—M. N. K.

FM GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.
APR 1972

[7A]

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

FEB 10 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

DAVIS, BISHOP, AT BSO

The speculation about Colin Davis is stilled, but the mastery lingers on. Last week he appeared for the first concert in this year's guest - conducting stint, together with Stephen Bishop, pianist, in a program that consisted of Tippett's Fantasia concertante on a theme of Corelli, Mozart's Piano concerto in E. flat K. 482 and Dvorak's Symphony no. 7 in D minor op. 70. Surely the proceedings will be remembered as one of the more heartening occasions of this musical season.

The Tippett piece was composed for the Edinburgh Festival in 1953 to commemorate the 300th anniversary of Archangelo Corelli. It starts off like one of those lush Leopold Stokowski transcriptions of Bach that used to be so popular a generation ago, then startingly tears off into a treatment that sounds as if the musicians were playing together in different keys. Sundry other variations, some of them unbelievably busy, are dispersed among majestic baroque statements. On first listening Tippett's point seems too overstated, but, it has been widely said, greater familiarity with the work will cause it to grow powerfully upon the listener. The trio of soloists, Messrs. Silverstein and Hobart, violins, and Eskin, cello, played with predictable brilliance and assurance.

The concerto followed. If ever there was a form which is the apotheosis of Mozart's art, it was the piano concerto. If ever there was one of them at or near the crown of the Mozart concertos, it is the E flat, K. 482. Joy. melody, by-play, seriousness, simplicity, intricacy — they tumble upon each other in such protean measure as to make the eyes smart from the sheer loveliness of it all. The soloist was yet another of that very long line of young extraordinarily accomplished piano soloists who have been appearing on the symphony scene lately. (Could it be that such talent these days is cheaper by the dozen?)

Stephen Bishop was born in Los Angeles in 1940 of Yugoslav parents, but has worked out of England since going there in 1969 to study with Dame Myra Hess. His playing, controlled and secure, embodies a rather unusual combination of masculinity and tenderness. Apparently, he is a protege of Mr. Davis, because the two had collaborated in making Philips recordings of the Beethoven First and the Schumann Concertos, and the two are scheduled to do the Stravinsky concerto on a different series here. The adjustment of the orchestra to the solo part—a more than ordinarily delicate undertaking here—was superb, with passages flashing out from the wood winds that would have been a credit to a performance of the Mozart quintet for piano and strings.

The Dvorak 7th symphony was the final number. This is the third time in a few seasons that this symphony has been performed after lying fallow on BSO programs for forty years. In its elegance of proportion, warm and abundant native folk material, and vivid orchestral coloration it stands at the pinnacle among the œuvre of Dvorak, a composer who has never quite been recognized for the estate he has reached.

Whatever the line is between just another competent reading and an inspired performance, Mr. Davis crossed it. There was that feeling of tensile strength, of hairline control, of beautifully balanced sound and of a clarity that made the listener feel as if he had a score before him — in short, those ineffable ingredients which are there when composer, conductor, players and audience are very much at one with each other.

Taking perhaps their cue from Sarah Caldwell, with her two-part production of "Les Troyens", Messrs. Davis and Bishop will return next week with the orchestra for the second installment of Mozart, in this case the Piano Concerto in C, K. 503. The all-Mozart program will also include the Kyrie in D minor, K. 341, and the Requiem.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO and 'Trojans'

A Davis and Berlioz weekend

By Louis Snyder

Colin Davis and Hector Berlioz, whose names have been associated musically over the past few years, were both making music in Boston over the weekend, but not together. Mr. Davis, Covent Garden's new musical director, returned to Symphony Hall for the first of two series of concerts with the Boston Symphony, of which he has been designated (with Michael Tilson Thomas) a Principal Guest Conductor next season. Berlioz was represented at the Aquarius Theater, where the Opera Company of Boston was presenting its performances of the first complete American staging of "The Trojans," the composer's two-part opera drawn from the Aeneid.

The Symphony Hall concerts profited from the tremendous and obvious rapport that exists between Mr. Davis and the body of BSO musicians. His presence generates the kind of willing compliance among the stands that immediately translates into keen-edged playing — a great help to any conductor in expressing his ideas about the music at hand.

Tippett premiere

The program began with Sir Michael Tippett's "Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli" in its first performance by the orchestra. Violinists Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart and cellist Jules Eskin formed a Concertino, which, with two divided groups of strings, provided Tippett with facilities for a chiaroscuro treatment of the theme via variations, and fugal and lyric means. It is an agreeable piece, probably as much because of the bow arm of Corelli as the compositional hand of Tippett. Mr. Davis, a Tippett champion, conducted it with relish, and the strings, the trio in particular, made it sound luscious indeed.

Stephen Bishop, a young American pianist whose career has been largely in Europe, and who first played with the orchestra at Tanglewood last summer, made his local debut as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in E flat (K482). It was a straightforward, unostentatious performance, complementing Mr. Davis's classic, understated conception, and on the whole strangely unaffecting. Not that one favors romanticizing Mozart or pummeling his unique melodic line out of shape. But Mozart is almost never without electrical excitement, even at quietest moments, and neither the pianist nor the orchestra seemed, on Friday afternoon, to have sensed this basic feeling in one of the most exhilarating of the concertos.

Dvorak's exuberant Seventh Symphony (D minor, Op. 70) gave Mr. Davis and the orchestra another large opportunity to see eye to eye unimpeded. Resultant bursts of vigorous sound, particularly in the Scherzo, brought the program to a rousing conclusion.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,288

FEB 6 1972 New England Newsclip

Joined by Bishop

Colin Davis Guests at Symphony

By Susan Cooper Markell

Colin Davis, music director at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducted this Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony Concert. Davis, who has guested here on and off over the last few years, led the orchestra with that marvelous vitality which we have come to expect of him. He was joined by Stephen Bishop in a performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in E Flat (K482).

★

Davis ranks as (the late) Sir Thomas Beecham's equal in Mozart interpretation. While Beecham's Mozart was free and full of rubato, Davis' is strict in pulse. Both work equally well.

The first movement of the concerto was spirited, but a bit on the dramatic side, perhaps due to Bishop's nervousness at his first Boston appearance. However, the second movement was a polished gem, played with great dignity, yet bringing to light each subtle nuance. Particularly nice was a passage for flute, oboe and clarinet. This same feeling continue into the last movement. Pure Mozart, both on the podium and at the piano.

★

Bishop's playing was clear and musical. He brings to the piano a certain flair and his rubatos are most convincing. Il in all an excellent reading, but I'm sending my piano tuner in next week.

Prior to the Mozart, Davis conducted the contemporary composer Sir Michael Tippitt's Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli. The work begins with a statement of the Corelli theme. Davis approached it in a broad Ormandy-like fashion. Then into the Tippitt development which, though quite intellectual, one could question for enduring qualities.

★

The concertino consisted of Concert master Joseph Silverstein, Max Hobart (violin) and Jules Eskin, first chair cello. These three played the rather taxing passages assigned them with excellent ensemble.

Last on the program was Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D Minor Op. 70. This, of course, is a work of great melody and bombast: a perfect vehicle to show off that beautiful instrument which is the Boston Symphony. The dynamics were handled well and Colin Davis extracted every bit of sound possible from the orchestra. The performance was typically Davis —full of life—althought at times his relentless drive took just a bit away from Dvorak's lyricism.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 17 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Review

In Concert

Lush and Hearty

By Peter M. Knapp

Colin Davis, a frequent guest conductor here for the last few seasons, is taking his turns on the Boston Symphony podium, and there were some good turns indeed in his appearance with the orchestra Tuesday night.

The British conductor will be more of a regular next season, when he will become one of the two principal guest conductors of the BSO, with Michael Tilson Thomas.

His program Tuesday ranged over the last three centuries: Michael Tippett's Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli; Mozart's Piano Concerto in E-flat, K. 482; and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in d minor.

All were well played and sensibly directed. The Dvorak in particular had its share of fire and iron, firm in outline, nicely arced in those blooming slavonic melodies, with plenty of muscle. Hearty fare.

The Tippett piece is having its first performances in Boston during Davis' series. Davis has been a champion of the 67-year-old English composer whose music has been attracting renewed interest of late. The Fantasia, based on themes of Arcangelo Corelli (1653-1713), was written on commission in 1953. The string orchestra is divided into a concertino of two violins and cello (Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, and Jules Eskin, cello) a concerto grosso of half of the orchestra, and a concerto terzo of the remaining players.

The work is an attractive one which generally captures the essence of Corelli's music while presenting its own substance. There is a good deal of polyphony, intricate and densely woven at times, overlapping sound, and brilliant flourishes for the concertino group. The Bostonians played it with their characteristically lush string tone under Davis' confident direction.

The late Mozart concerto is one of three written for the Vienna season of 1786, using a good-sized orchestra (strings, flute, winds in pairs with clarinets but without oboes, trumpets, timpani). It is by turns majestic, intense, cheerful, each movement having a distinct characteristic.

The pianist was the young Californian Stephen Bishop who made his debut with the orchestra last summer at Tanglewood. He made a better impression in Symphony Hall during this hearty performance, displaying well-articulated passagework and a classical objectivity without fussiness. At times, though, one would have appreciated more nuance, and personal expression.

[73]

Ted: good news for the young ones! — Hodgkinson

YALE DAILY NEWS, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1972

Baton-Shattering Boston Symphony Play Magnificent Woolsey Concert

By THEODORE LIBBEY

The Boston Symphony came to New Haven on Tuesday night and played with such baton-shattering brilliancy that it led one to believe that it mattered to them to be here. This may have been due to the fact that the orchestra was hosted by members of the Yale Symphony during its brief evening stay, with the result that the musicians felt more involved with the concert than might otherwise have been, and usually is, the case.

Colin Davis guest-conducted the Bostonians in a program which reflected both their versatility and the extent of their expressive potential in performance.

The concert opened with the Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli by the English composer Michael Tippet. The work, scored for strings only, suggests, without literally adhering to it, the style of Baroque concerti grossi in its reliance upon the dialogue between a concertino section and the full string complement. There is not, however, a strong sense of the ritornello in the structure of the work, which accounts for the composer's description of it as a fantasia.

After a tenuous first few measures the orchestra and soloists, placed in an unusual theoretically antiphonal seating, got underway with Tippet's neo-classical experiment. The brief coloristic flourishes assigned to the concertino group--two violins and a cello--were handled with finesse by the trio of Joseph Silverstein, Max Hobart, and Jules Eskin.

One particularly effective part of the work involved the buildup of section entrances under ostinati in violins' high tessitura, which the Boston players were able to sustain brilliantly.

The first half of the program came to a conclusion with Mozart's E-flat major Piano Concerto, K. 482, composed in 1785 and scored as many of his orchestral works in that key, for strings, horns, trumpets and drums, clarinets, bassoons, and a single flute. The piano soloist was Stephen Bishop, an American who has worked extensively with Davis in England.

His approach was highly objective, marked by an unassuming, unmannered sensitivity to dynamics and phrasing, and by complete technical surety. Davis, brisk and energetic in his interpretation of the work, succeeded in achieving a finely balanced orchestral accompaniment. The winds displayed an excellent sonority in a Serenade-like episode of the Andante, a variation movement in the minor.

To conclude, the orchestra gave a performance of Dvorak's Symphony number Seven in D minor which was thoroughly fresh and inspired. Davis' relaxed yet energetic way with the music, which he conveyed by means of a fluid baton technique and close expressive communication with the orchestra, was perfectly suited to the dramatic and lyrical qualities of the score.

Tempi were excellent, and the orchestral balance was beautifully controlled. What characterized the response of the orchestra might be described as a spirit of mounting involvement, which, by the end of the symphony, had produced an intensity that was striking and tremendously exciting. The sonority of the brass section, the unique balance and richness of the woodwinds (particularly the clarinets), and the superb playing of tympanist Vic Firth deserve to be singled out of the whole effort for special praise.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000
FEB 1 1972 New England Newsc

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
S. 137,000
FEB 6 1972 New England Newslip

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 34,000
FEB 9 1972 New England Newslip

New Haven and Middlesex Counties

MUSIC

Feb. 1 — JANET BAKER, mezzo soprano. Yale University, New Haven. Woolsey Hall Concert Series. 8:30 p.m. (776-1444)
xFeb. 3 — RICHARD DONOHUE AND RAYMOND KENDALL, tenor and piano. Wesleyan University, Middletown. The Chapel. 8 p.m. (347-9411)
Thru Feb. — NEW HAVEN FOLK MUSIC SOCIETY, New Haven. The New Enormous Room. Apple Country String Band every Thurs. 8:30 p.m. (777-9933)
Feb. 4 — Rich & Lorraine Lee & Tom Hayes, piano, guitar, dulcimer.
Feb. 25 — Larry Johnson, blues singer.
Feb. 4 — YALE COMPOSERS AND PERFORMERS. New Haven. Sprague Hall. 8:30 p.m. (436-8740)
Feb. 5 — NEW HAVEN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CHILDREN'S CONCERT; Leroy Anderson, conductor, New Haven. Southern Connecticut State College, Lyman Auditorium, 1 p.m. & 3 p.m. (776-1444)
Feb. 6 — "THE UNICORN, THE GORGON AND THE MANTICORE" by Menotti. New Haven. Presented by the Yale Chamber Singers and the New Haven Dance Ensemble. Sprague Hall. 3 p.m. & 8 p.m. (432-4487)
Feb. 8 — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Colin Davis, conductor. Yale University, New Haven. Woolsey Hall Concert Series. 8:30 p.m. (776-1444)

Pianist Stephen Bishop

Boston Symphony Superb

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual visit to Woolsey Hall Tuesday night to present the fifth concert in the current series. Its conductor was Colin Davis, sensational conductor of the BBC Symphony, and conductor of famous music organizations throughout the world.

His program included an array of beautiful music performed with distinction. Young Stephen Bishop, American, 32, and a wizard on the piano keys, gained new honors for his performance in the Mozart Piano Concerto in E flat, K.482, a brilliantly developed piano work which fairly captivated the audience.

However, the sharply defined piano does not submerge the other instruments, and there is considerable dialogue between the strings and piano and the flutes and solo instrument. This was particularly true in the allegro with its graceful moments for the flute and strings which gave way to the sparkling cadenza so beautifully executed by young Bishop. The delicate elaborations of the andante were followed by the scintilating rondo, with orchestra and soloist responding to the exuberant direction of Davis.

Music In Review

The program opened with Davis favoring a compatriot, Sir Michael Tippett, whose Fantasia Concertante on a theme of Corelli, was an interesting and expressive work. Three principals, Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violinists and Jules Eskin, cello principal, projected the main theme with the orchestra forming a subtle background of varying moods.

The concert concluded with a memorable reading by Davis of Dvorak's dramatic Symphony No. 7, in D minor, Op.70, filled with magnificent sweeps of harmonies and romantic and passionate bursts of melody. The audience begged for more, but that was really the end; a magnificent work given a spectaculiar performance.

FLORENCE JOHNSON

Bostonians Due Here

The Boston Symphony will present pianist Stephen Bishop in a performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto in E flat K. 482 and the English Conductor Colin Davis for their concert in Woolsey Hall Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. sharp.

Stephen Bishop who appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time at the 1971 Berkshire Festival was born in 1940 in Los Angeles. He made his solo and orchestral debuts at the age of eleven and two years later played with the San Francisco Symphony. In 1959 he moved to London to study with Dame Myra Hess. After his debut at the Wigmore Hall he spent several years performing in London and touring th British Isles. In July of 1965 he played concerts in California, then made his New York debut at Town Hall the following year.

Colin Davis has chosen the Seventh Symphony in D Minor, Opus 70 by Dvorak, and the British composer Tippett's Fatansia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli, with three principal players in the orchestra doing the solo portions—Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violin and Jules Eskin, cello.

Tickets are available at the Symphony Office, 254 College St., (Roger Sherman Building) Room 412, Monday through Friday, 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Box Office will open at 7:30 p.m. the night of the concert.

[74]

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
D. 84,000
FEB 9 1972 New England Newslip

Woolsey Concert Is Marred By Theatrics, Unsuitable Styles

Dull is not a term applicable to the British conductor Colin Davis; neither is great. Showmanly and exciting definitely characterize the interpretations of Mr. Davis, under whose baton the venerable Boston Symphony orchestra played a concert last night in Woolsey hall in New Haven.

Tall on the podium, and much given to visually arresting conductorial methods, Mr. Davis immediately revealed a penchant for sharply contrasting sound levels, almost invariably energetic tempi, a dramatic flair and lush sounds. No doubt, to the reader these proclivities spell excitement, and those of that persuasion who attended were not disappointed.

Still Fine Orchestra

The band from "the home of the bean and the cod" continues to merit the sobriquet "aristocrat of orchestras" with its rich, cohesive, polished strings, immediacy of attack, generally warm, full tones and the versatility of an ensemble which has endured a near plethora of guest conductors since the departure of Erich Leinsdorf and the illness and lessened activity of his successor, William Steinberg.

Yet, as in the even more lamentable case of the Cleveland orchestra following the death of George Szell, all is not the same or as well. A number of small errors did occur in choirs other than the strings, and whether they stemmed from inadequate rehearsal and lack of familiarity with those methods favored by Mr. Davis, or possibly personal reasons on the parts of individual instrumentalists, they were certainly present, although not sufficient to prevent appreciation of the concert.

The principal shortcoming was of an origin other than that already noted, proceeding directly from the stylistic similarity with which Mr. Davis read each composition. The piece de resistance, Mozart's regal Piano Concerto in E flat, K. 482, is an advanced work for its time, with grace and lyric flow combined with strength and an exuberant close in the Allegro and the Finale. The centrally placed Andante opens with a pensive, muted string subject, followed by variations largely in a light vein.

Soloist Excellent

Stephen Bishop, the english pianist traveling with the orchestra as soloist on the present tour, imparted a silvery, clear tone, facile technique and exemplary phrasing and vivacity to the animated and complex solo line. In addition, the soloist played aristocratically, no matter whether the moment required dances, runs or trills. In short, the music, whatever characteristic or figuration appeared was always easily identifiable as that of Mozart.

Mr. Davis, on the other hand, while lending exact, lively orchestral accompaniments, consistently favored a sound entirely too Beethovenesque for my taste. No matter how facile and lyric his accompaniments, the weight and ensemble tone spoke more of Ludwig than Wolfgang, and when opportunity offered, as in the Finale's climax, the orchestral portion of the score bore a distinct resemblance to Beethoven's middle period of composition not to mention spirit.

Also on the program were Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 (not No. 7 as was incorrectly stated in the program) in D minor, Op. 70, an impressive and awesomely proportioned score, placed by Sir Donald Tovey in a class shared only by Brahms and Schubert's C major symphonic utterances (therefore just below Beethoven's contributions to the form), and obviously influenced by the German romantics despite Dvorak's desire to compose in a Bohemian nationalistic vein, and Sir Michael Tippett's pleasant, if not overly distinguished Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli.

In the Dvorak, the situation was much as before, with Mr. Davis giving an heroic, impassioned reading that fairly [illegible]ted its debt to the German romantics. However, to be fair to Mr. Davis, his all-stops-out reading did tend to make one overlook the matter of style and give ear to the depth, powerful lyricism and drama of the music. Whatever the conductor's interpretive bent, this was an exciting occasion appreciated (if reluctantly) even by those who did notice such Beethovenesque features as the agitated outbursts and tragedy of the Allegro maestoso.

Mr. Davis began the concert with the Tippett score, with its initial exploration of the violin's brilliance a la Corelli, variations on a theme from Corelli's Concerto grosso in F, Op. 6, No. 2, alternating light and darkness, growing complexity, and passage from fugue to a Pastorale based on Corelli's Christmas Concerto.

Joseph Silverstein (the ensemble's concertmaster) and Max Hobart were the violin soloists, with Jules Eskin the cello soloist. All are accomplished musicians, and Tippett's music seemed not to lend itself to the sort of heroics and showmanship which Mr. Davis imposed so thoroughly on the Dvorak and Mozart.

RICHARD DAY

NEWS
STRATFORD, CONN.
W. 12,586
FEB 8 1972

Feb. 8 - Boston Symphony Orchestra; Colin Davis, conductor. Yale University, New Haven. Woolsey Hall ConcertSeries. 8:30 p.m.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 114,000
FEB 9 1972 New England Newslip

At The Concert

Just As Good In Person

Until last night at Woolsey Hall my only image of British conductor Colin Davis had been formed via that marvel of our technicological age, the stereo recording. And while I was impressed with his command of a wide range of styles—in some cases deeply so—I have also learned to be professionally suspicious of musical acquaintances built on electronics for the simple reason that the medium can do too much of the work. And modify its impact too, positively as well as negatively.

Miking, mixing and, in particular, tape splicing have become minor arts in themselves, with the result that one's ability to make music come to life in front of an audience is frequently disappointing compared to his expertise in the milieu of the recording studio.

But in Mr. Davis' case any suspicion about musical limitations turned out to be totally unfounded as he guided the Boston Symphony Orchestra through distinguished performances of Sir Michael Tippett's "Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli," Mozart's "Piano Concerto in Eb, K.482" featuring pianist Stephen Biship, and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 7 in D minor, Opus 70" (which used to be known as No. 2 when the "New World" was still considered No. 5.)

How a conductor looks when he works is generally considered trivia by music critics, particularly when compared to what he does with the score and how successfully he draws forth the best efforts of the players. But in Mr. Davis' case they are very closely intertwined. His motions are generally large and extroverted, however he exerts incredible control over an orchestra through a veritable thesaurus of subtle gestures within the flamboyance, drawing forth all manner of shading and nuance from what can be the most inflexible instrument of all—100 other human beings.

His accord of the Mozart concert— and I had the distinct feeling that it was mostly his accord even though he was at one with the soloist at every juncture— placed appropriate stress on transparency of texture and clarity of line, but it probed much deeper than that. This was Mozart that had all the gentility and grace one could ask for, but contained notable strength and character as well without falsifying in any way what can be gleaned from the printed score. Only a listener with ice water in his veins could quibble about the sensuous use of string sound, the personal shaping of phrases or the touches of rubato that flickered in and out.

Stephen Bishop, at 32, is a highly skilled pianist who kept his approach well within the stylistic bounds of the work. Technically he was up to the task in every respect but I found his realization of the solo part to be less than memorable. I appreciated the control, the scaling down of piano sound and the general intelligence of his playing, but seldom found myself caught up in what he was doing.

Last night's performance of Sir Michael Tippett's "Fantasia Concertante" constituted a local premiere and the work has probably been little performed elsewhere in America and remains unrecorded. The potential effectiveness of the composer's three-part division of the orchestra, further contrasting with a three-member concertino group consisting of concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violist Max Hobart and principal cellist Jules Eskin, was greatly diluted by Woolsey's ambiance, though I doubt if a more sympathetic setting would have significantly altered by first impression. The music in which a theme from one of Corelli's concert grossi, Opus 6 is germinal, is sumptuously conceived, though there are moments of hauting austerity too—particularly during the opening section and in the material immediately following the short interior fugue. Decidedly contrapuntal, the profile of the baroque concerto grosso is nonetheless only hinted at and Tippett's language makes use of both tonal and modal progressions and a free but rather conservative treatment of dissonance. With all its sturm I found the work curiously detached but I also found it beautifully crafted, and was compelled by its logic sense of direction and artistic integrity. I would like to hear it again.

Dvorak's Seventh is a big bear hug of a work that holds minimal intellectual appeal, and Mr. Davis gave it a big bear hug of a reading. Architecture was always apparent, and within its framework phrases were sculpted with loving care but always with a concern for the long line. This concern added up to a performance that was at once rich in detail and expansively conceived, containing the further good fortune of being bathed in the timbral opulence provided by the Boston players, the latter was unfortunately diminished by Woolsey's built-in distortion.

But nothing happened last evening to diminish the fact that Colin Davis is a sensitive and gifted musician whose talents have already entrenched him solidly in that small and select handful of great conductors that any generation produces.

GORDON EMERSON

Ted: good news for the young people! — Hodgkinson

YALE DAILY NEWS, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1972

Baton-Shattering Boston Symphony Play Magnificent Woolsey Concert

By THEODORE LIBBEY

The Boston Symphony came to New Haven on Tuesday night and played with such baton-shattering brilliancy that it led one to believe that it mattered to them to be here. This may have been due to the fact that the orchestra was hosted by members of the Yale Symphony during its brief evening stay, with the result that the musicians felt more involved with the concert than might otherwise have been, and usually is, the case.

Colin Davis guest-conducted the Bostonians in a program which reflected both their versatility and the extent of their expressive potential in performance.

The concert opened with the Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli by the English composer Michael Tippet. The work, scored for strings only, suggests, without literally adhering to it, the style of Baroque concerti grossi in its reliance upon the dialogue between a concertino section and the full string complement. There is not, however, a strong sense of the ritornello in the structure of the work, which accounts for the composer's description of it as a fantasia.

After a tenuous first few measures the orchestra and soloists, placed in an unusual theoretically antiphonal seating, got underway with Tippet's neo-classical experiment. The brief coloristic flourishes assigned to the concertino group--two violins and a cello--were handled with finesse by the trio of Joseph Silverstein, Max Hobart, and Jules Eskin.

One particularly effective part of the work involved the buildup of section entrances under ostinati in violins' high tessitura, which the Boston players were able to sustain brilliantly.

The first half of the program came to a conclusion with Mozart's E-flat major Piano Concerto, K. 482, composed in 1785 and scored as many of his orchestral works in that key, for strings, horns, trumpets and drums, clarinets, bassoons, and a single flute. The piano soloist was Stephen Bishop, an American who has worked extensively with Davis in England.

His approach was highly objective, marked by an unassuming, unmannered sensitivity to dynamics and phrasing, and by complete technical surety. Davis, brisk and energetic in his interpretation of the work, succeeded in achieving a finely balanced orchestral accompaniment. The winds displayed an excellent sonority in a Serenade-like episode of the Andante, a variation movement in the minor.

To conclude, the orchestra gave a performance of Dvorak's Symphony number Seven in D minor which was thoroughly fresh and inspired. Davis' relaxed yet energetic way with the music, which he conveyed by means of a fluid baton technique and close expressive communication with the orchestra, was perfectly suited to the dramatic and lyrical qualities of the score.

Tempi were excellent, and the orchestral balance was beautifully controlled. What characterized the response of the orchestra might be described as a spirit of mounting involvement, which, by the end of the symphony, had produced an intensity that was striking and tremendously exciting. The sonority of the brass section, the unique balance and richness of the woodwinds (particularly the clarinets), and the superb playing of tympanist Vic Firth deserve to be singled out of the whole effort for special praise.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000
FEB 1 1972 New England Newsc

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
S. 137,000
FEB 6 1972 New England Newslip

New Haven and Middlesex Counties

MUSIC

Feb. 1 — JANET BAKER, mezzo soprano, Yale University, New Haven. Woolsey Hall Concert Series. 8:30 p.m. (776-1444)
xFeb. 3 — RICHARD DONOHUE AND RAYMOND KENDALL, tenor and piano, Wesleyan University, Middletown. The Chapel. 8 p.m. (347-9411)
Thru Feb. — NEW HAVEN FOLK MUSIC SOCIETY, New Haven. The New Enormous Room. Apple Country String Band every Thurs. 8:30 p.m. (777-9933)
Feb. 4 — Rich & Lorraine Lee & Tom Hayes, piano, guitar, dulcimer.
Feb. 25 — Larry Johnson, blues singer.
Feb. 4 — YALE COMPOSERS AND PERFORMERS. New Haven. Sprague Hall. 8:30 p.m. (436-8740)
Feb. 5 — NEW HAVEN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CHILDREN'S CONCERT; Leroy Anderson, conductor, New Haven. Southern Connecticut State College, Lyman Auditorium, 1 p.m. & 3 p.m. (776-1444)
Feb. 6 — "THE UNICORN, THE GORGON AND THE MANTICORE" by Menotti. New Haven. Presented by the Yale Chamber Singers and the New Haven Dance Ensemble. Sprague Hall. 3 p.m. & 8 p.m. (432-4457)
Feb. 8 — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Colin Davis, conductor. Yale University, New Haven. Woolsey Hall Concert Series. 8:30 p.m. (776-1444)

Pianist Stephen Bishop

Bostonians Due Here

The Boston Symphony will present pianist Stephen Bishop in a performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto in E flat K. 482 and the English Conductor Colin Davis for their concert in Woolsey Hall Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. sharp.

Stephen Bishop who appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time at the 1971 Berkshire Festival was born in 1940 in Los Angeles. He made his solo and orchestral debuts at the age of eleven and two years later played with the San Francisco Symphony. In 1959 he moved to London to study with Dame Myra Hess. After his debut at the Wigmore Hall he spent several years performing in London and touring th British Isles. In July of 1965 he played concerts in California, then made his New York debut at Town Hall the following year.

Colin Davis has chosen the Seventh Symphony in D Minor, Opus 70 by Dvorak, and the British composer Tippett's Fatansia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli, with three principal players in the orchestra doing the solo portions—Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violin and Jules Eskin, cello.

Tickets are available at the Symphony Office, 254 College St., (Roger Sherman Building) Room 412, Monday through Friday, 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Box Office will open at 7:30 p.m. the night of the concert.

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 34,000
FEB 9 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Superb

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual visit to Woolsey Hall Tuesday night to present the fifth concert in the current series. Its conductor was Colin Davis, sensational conductor of the BBC Symphony, and conductor of famous music organizations throughout the world.

His program included an array of beautiful music performed with distinction. Young Stephen Bishop, American, 32, and a wizard on the piano keys, gained new honors for his performance in the Mozart Piano Concerto in E flat, K.482, a brilliantly developed piano work which fairly captivated the audience.

However, the sharply defined piano does not submerge the other instruments, and there is considerable dialogue between the strings and piano and the flutes and solo instrument. This was particularly true in the allegro with its graceful moments for the flute and strings which gave way to the sparkling cadenza so beautifully executed by young Bishop. The delicate elaborations of the andante were followed by the scintilating rondo, with orchestra and soloist responding to the exuberant direction of Davis.

Music In Review

The program opened with Davis favoring a compatriot, Sir Michael Tippett, whose Fantasia Concertante on a theme of Corelli, was an interesting and expressive work. Three principals, Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violinists and Jules Eskin, cello principal, projected the main theme with the orchestra forming a subtle background of varying moods.

The concert concluded with a memorable reading by Davis of Dvorak's dramatic Symphony No. 7, in D minor, Op.70, filled with magnificent sweeps of harmonies and romantic and passionate bursts of melody. The audience begged for more, but that was really the end; a magnificent work given a spectaculiar performance.

FLORENCE JOHNSON

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
D. 84,000
FEB 9 1972 New England Newsclip

Woolsey Concert Is Marred By Theatrics, Unsuitable Styles

Dull is not a term applicable to the British conductor Colin Davis; neither is great. Showmanly and exciting definitely characterize the interpretations of Mr. Davis, under whose baton the venerable Boston Symphony orchestra played a concert last night in Woolsey hall in New Haven.

Tall on the podium, and much given to visually arresting conductorial methods, Mr. Davis immediately revealed a penchant for sharply contrasting sound levels, almost invariably energetic tempi, a dramatic flair and lush sounds. No doubt, to the reader these proclivities spell excitement, and those of that persuasion who attended were not disappointed.

Still Fine Orchestra

The band from "the home of the bean and the cod" continues to merit the sobriquet "aristocrat of orchestras" with its rich, cohesive, polished strings, immediacy of attack, generally warm, full tones and the versatility of an ensemble which has endured a near plethora of guest conductors since the departure of Erich Leinsdorf and the illness and lessened activity of his successor, William Steinberg.

Yet, as in the even more lamentable case of the Cleveland orchestra following the death of George Szell, all is not the same or as well. A number of small errors did occur in choirs other than the strings, and whether they stemmed from inadequate rehearsal and lack of familiarity with those methods favored by Mr. Davis, or possibly personal reasons on the parts of individual instrumentalists, they were certainly present, although not sufficient to prevent appreciation of the concert.

The principal shortcoming was of an origin other than that already noted, proceeding directly from the stylistic similarity with which Mr. Davis read each composition. The piece de resistance, Mozart's regal Piano Concerto in E flat, K. 482, is an advanced work for its time, with grace and lyric flow combined with strength and an exuberant close in the Allegro and the Finale. The centrally placed Andante opens with a pensive, muted string subject, followed by variations largely in a light vein.

Soloist Excellent

Stephen Bishop, the english pianist traveling with the orchestra as soloist on the present tour, imparted a silvery, clear tone, facile technique and exemplary phrasing and vivacity to the animated and complex solo line. In addition, the soloist played aristocratically, no matter whether the moment required dances, runs or trills. In short, the music, whatever characteristic or figuration appeared was always easily identifiable as that of Mozart.

Mr. Davis, on the other hand, while lending exact, lively orchestral accompaniments, consistently favored a sound entirely too Beethovenesque for my taste. No matter how facile and lyric his accompaniments, the weight and ensemble tone spoke more of Ludwig than Wolfgang, and when opportunity offered, as in the Finale's climax, the orchestral portion of the score bore a distinct resemblance to Beethoven's middle period of composition not to mention spirit.

Also on the program were Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 (not No. 7 as was incorrectly stated in the program) in D minor, Op. 70, an impressive and awesomely proportioned score, placed by Sir Donald Tovey in a class shared only by Brahms and Schubert's C major symphonic utterances (therefore just below Beethoven's contributions to the form), and obviously influenced by the German romantics despite Dvorak's desire to compose in a Bohemian nationalistic vein, and Sir Michael Tippett's pleasant, if not overly distinguished Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli.

In the Dvorak, the situation was much as before, with Mr. Davis giving an heroic, impassioned reading that fairly [illegible]uted its debt to the German romantics. However, to be fair to Mr. Davis, his all-stops-out reading did tend to make one overlook the matter of style and give ear to the depth, powerful lyricism and drama of the music. Whatever the conductor's interpretive bent, this was an exciting occasion appreciated (if reluctantly) even by those who did notice such Beethovenesque features as the agitated outbursts and tragedy of the Allegro maestoso.

Mr. Davis began the concert with the Tippett score, with its initial exploration of the violin's brilliance a la Corelli, variations on a theme from Corelli's Concerto grosso in F, Op. 6, No. 2, alternating light and darkness, growing complexity, and passage from fugue to a Pastorale based on Corelli's Christmas Concerto.

Joseph Silverstein (the ensemble's concertmaster) and Max Hobart were the violin soloists, with Jules Eskin the cello soloist. All are accomplished musicians, and Tippett's music seemed not to lend itself to the sort of heroics and showmanship which Mr. Davis imposed so thoroughly on the Dvorak and Mozart.

RICHARD DAY

NEWS
STRATFORD, CONN.
W. 12,586
FEB 8 1972

Feb. 8 - Boston Symphony Orchestra; Colin Davis, conductor. Yale University, New Haven. Woolsey Hall ConcertSeries. 8:30 p.m.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 114,000
FEB 9 1972 New England Newsclip

At The Concert

Just As Good In Person

Until last night at Woolsey Hall my only image of British conductor Colin Davis had been formed via that marvel of our technicological age, the stereo recording. And while I was impressed with his command of a wide range of styles—in some cases deeply so—I have also learned to be professionally suspicious of musical acquaintances built on electronics for the simple reason that the medium can do too much of the work. And modify its impact too, positively as well as negatively.

Miking, mixing and, in particular, tape splicing have become minor arts in themselves, with the result that one's ability to make music come to life in front of an audience is frequently disappointing compared to his expertise in the milieu of the recording studio.

But in Mr. Davis' case any suspicion about musical limitations turned out to be totally unfounded as he guided the Boston Symphony Orchestra through distinguished performances of Sir Michael Tippett's "Fantasia Concertante on a Theme of Corelli," Mozart's "Piano Concerto in Eb, K.482" featuring pianist Stephen Biship, and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 7 in D minor, Opus 70" (which used to be known as No. 2 when the "New World" was still considered No. 5.)

How a conductor looks when he works is generally considered trivia by music critics, particularly when compared to what he does with the score and how successfully he draws forth the best efforts of the players. But in Mr. Davis' case they are very closely intertwined. His motions are generally large and extroverted, however he exerts incredible control over an orchestra through a veritable thesaurus of subtle gestures within the flamboyance, drawing forth all manner of shading and nuance from what can be the most inflexible instrument of a 1—100 other human beings.

His accord of the Mozart concert— and I had the distinct feeling that it was mostly his accord even though he was at one with the soloist at every juncture— placed appropriate stress on transparency of texture and clarity of line, but it probed much deeper than that. This was Mozart that had all the gentility and grace one could ask for, but contained notable strength and character as well without falsifying in any way what can be gleaned from the printed score. Only a listener with ice water in his veins could quibble about the sensuous use of string sound, the personal shaping of phrases or the touches of rubato that flickered in and out.

Stephen Bishop, at 32, is a highly skilled pianist who kept his approach well within the stylistic bounds of the work. Technically he was up to the task in every respect but I found his realization of the solo part to be less than memorable. I appreciated the control, the scaling down of piano sound and the general intelligence of his playing, but seldom found myself caught up in what he was doing.

Last night's performance of Sir Michael Tippett's "Fantasia Concertante" constituted a local premiere and the work has probably been little performed elsewhere in America and remains unrecorded. The potential effectiveness of the composer's three-part division of the orchestra, further contrasting with a three-member concertino group consisting of concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violist Max Hobart and principal cellist Jules Eskin, was greatly diluted by Woolsey's ambiance, though I doubt if a more sympathetic setting would have significantly altered by first impression. The music in which a theme from one of Corelli's concert grossi, Opus 6 is germinal, is sumptuously conceived, though there are moments of hauting austerity too—particularly during the opening section and in the material immediately following the short interior fugue. Decidedly contrapuntal, the profile of the baroque concerto grosso is nonetheless only hinted at and Tippett's language makes use of both tonal and modal progressions and a free but rather conservative treatment of dissonance. With all its sturm I found the work curiously detached but I also found it beautifully crafted, and was compelled by its logic sense of direction and artistic integrity. I would like to hear it again.

Dvorak's Seventh is a big bear hug of a work that holds minimal intellectual appeal, and Mr. Davis gave it a big bear hug of a reading. Architecture was always apparent, and within its framework phrases were sculpted with loving care but always with a concern for the long line. This concern added up to a performance that was at once rich in detail and expansively conceived, containing the further good fortune of being bathed in the timbral opulence provided by the Boston players, the latter was, unfortunately diminished by Woolsey's built-in distortion.

But nothing happened last evening to diminish the fact that Colin Davis is a sensitive and gifted musician whose talents have already entrenched him solidly in that small and select handful of great conductors that any generation produces.

GORDON EMERSON

[74]

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

FEB 8 1972

New England Newsclip

Concert Peregrinations

BY RICHARD BUELL

'Twere a rough week, me hearties, to be driven, as by the lash, from Symphony Hall to Gardner Museum to Sanders Theater. Five concerts in a week's time, with the interstices filled by long sessions at the turntable, and a lot. It leaves one crapulous and unplugged. Bear with me, reader, as I give an account of the excesses of concert-going, the moral at the end left for you to draw.

It all began chastely enough on the 25th with a concert by the Camerata, which was hitting the big time by playing Sanders Theatre. This aggregation, which is a contemporary of New York's Pro Musica, takes as its province the musical past from Monteverdi on back, and it has two distinct assets: the Mason collection of old instruments at the Museum of Fine Arts, and Joel Cohen, an enthusiastic A&R man for the Renaissance and Middle Ages. It was a worthy affair, all in all, when you consider that there were over thirty pieces performed, none of them written for so modern a construct as the conventional concert, which asks people to sit in one place for an hour and a half without fidgeting, much less eating or drinking. These contraints did not exist, I am sure, for the people at the Burgundy court and the Loire Valley garden parties, who were hearing these Dufay and Jannequin pieces four and five centuries ago. The high points that lodged in my memory were, in no special order, Claude Goudimel's haunting Psalm settings from the Reformation, the purposeful undulations of the Josquin des Pres "Salve Regina," and some completely delightful Provencal carols from Avignon Cathedral around 1600. I do not have the keenest standards for judging performances on the sackbut, rebec and krumhorn, but there seemed to much less of the earnest wheezing from them that I feared, and the vocal soloists (Jane Bryden, Mark Baker, Frank Hoffmeister, Katherine Edmonds) were fine. Susie Almasi was a phenomenally accurate percussionist throughout. Right on, Camerata.

Next evening, back to Sanders and its noisy radiators for the winter concert of John Harbison's Cantata Singers. (This was one of those times when I would have liked to be in two places at once, for at the same hour, Margaret Price, the young Welsh soprano, was giving a recital at Hopkins Center, Dartmouth. By all accounts, she is all the things you have liked about Elly Ameling, Benita Valente and the early Irmgard Seefried. Watch for her.) As usual with the Cantata Singers, there was first-rate music set in an intelligently planned program. If Mr. Harbison is campaigning for Heinrich Schuetz, as seems to be the case, here's my vote. What astoundingly beautiful music he wrote for massed voices, and what a sense of color he brought to "orchestrating" for a chorus! "Die Himmel erzaehlen" (SW 386), "Selig sind die Toten" (SWV 391), and "Ich bin ein richter Weinstock" (SWV 389) brought all this to mind, and, by comparison, made Schoenberg's treatment of the same forces, in "Mond und Menschen," seem gray and turgid. The two Bach cantatas, "Brich dem Hungrigen dein Brot (BWV 39) and "Schmuecke dich" (BWV 180), were transparently delivered, but with some roughnesses that needn't have been. Examples: the grievously out of tune playing from cellist Jay Humeston behind Jane Bryden's lovely singing of "Ach, wie hungert" in the second cantata; and the insane pursuit of daintiness engaged in by tenor Karl Dan Sorenson and some highly fallible accompanists in the aria "Ermunt're dich." The result was grossly trivial, no mean accomplishment with Bach. Though some of the instrumental work fumbled, the chorus remains a fine, robust one, with good intonation and plenty of dynamic nuance. Jane Bryden, soprano, and Mark Baker, bass (hello again!), were up to standard, but mezzo D'Anna Fortunato ran into some acoustical bad luck; the instruments covered part of her range.

Friday, January 28: the beat goes on; some trembling of extremities and signs of degeneration of the pineal body, but the lurgies held at bay so far.

I realized that, to our mutual loss, I had not attended a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for some time, so I thought I would indulge in a bit of reverse slumming with the Friday afternoon ladies at Symphony Hall. (A friend I took to one of these seances remarked, "I've never seen so many Gentiles in my life!") Friday afternoon is a good time to catch the BSO freshly rehearsed, though, and the evidence indicates that their standards are up. Honest Injun. Michael Tilson Thomas, who had been with the orchestra for the whole month, was conducting.

To begin, two Gabrieli Canzoni were brightly (how otherwise with those trumpets?) played by two groups of trombones and trumpets placed at either end of the stage; in vain, for little of their antiphonal quality reached my seat. Hindemith's Cello Concerto (1940), which followed, deserves, like everything Hindemith wrote, the epithet "well-made", but it also contains a larger helping of the old fellow's lyricism (dour) and humor (dour) and less of the outright dourness than is customary with his music of this period. It's notable, too, for the avoidance of combat between soloist and orchestra; for the most part, they behave like a mongoose and cobra who have come to terms. Very strange. The finale finds Hindemith happily playing with triangle, celesta and glockenspiel, and some bright, clean Bauhaus wind sonorities. Coming from Lawrence Lesser, the solo part, which is a bitch, didn't sound exactly effortless, but he has the manner, certainly, and also the dreamy, asthenic appearance that is obligatory for cellists nowadays.

I thought that Thomas led the Schumann Spring Symphony very sensibly, and that the men of the orchestra executed it neatly, but you know how hopeless Schumann was with the orchestra. By assigning certain melodic shapes to the violins, they have no choice but to screech, which they do. The finale is a clumsy frolic which would sound much better in a piano reduction, but oh well, he tried. In sum, I'd say the concert was one you could safely take your mother to. (Thomas has a gift for this. I have tested my mother on him before.)

By the way, the recent BSO performances of the Mahler 5th, conducted by Thomas, were the best Mahler this orchestra has ever done — passionate, detailed, beautiful in sound.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Hindemith Concerto

BSO, Conductor Thomas, Cellist Lesser

Paul Hindemith was a faculty member of the Berkshire Music Center during its first year in 1940 and even with a full load of teaching managed to find time to compose a cello concerto between June and September. The work was performed the following season in Boston, Cambridge and New York, and at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitzky conducting and Piatigorsky as soloist. Then it disappeared from the orchestra's repertoire until resurrected at last weekend's concerts.

The concerto was brought back to Boston by a pair of Los Angeles-born "kids" who probably were just about to become gleams in their fathers' eyes while Hindemith toiled over his score. Michael Tilson Thomas, the conductor, is 27 years old. Laurence Lesser, the soloist, is his senior by only a few years. Nevertheless, the two "youngsters" presented a mature, driving performance of the work that could only have delighted the composer.

Actually the concerto is not Hindemith at his best. It sports the Hindemith imprint clearly: the interchange of quartal chords based on the interval of a fourth with the more conventional triads; the use of polytonality; the vivid orchestration. It is neatly put together and the structure is sound. And yet, the Concerto does not quite come off as forcefully as other music which Hindemith has written for large orchestra. One is more impressed by its architecture than moved by its expressiveness.

Lesser's talent is admirably suited to this essentially dry music. He produces a rich, full tone from his cello where sonority or sensuousness is required. More important, he has the intellectual insight needed to cope with the linear demands of the music in its more intellectually rigorous moments.

A 1961 graduate of Harvard and winner of a Fulbright Fellowship, he proved his gifts by taking the cello prize at Siena the following year and a prize at the Tchaikowsky International Competition in Moscow in 1966. He has recorded Schoenberg's Cello Concerto but his style and command suggest he would do equally well in the warhorses, too.

Since Thomas and Lesser have appeared in recital together, it is only natural to expect them to work in close rapport. And this they all did throughout the three-movement Hindemith score.

The program opened with a pair of novelties, two sixteenth-century Canzoni by Giovanni Gabrieli. Thomas had previously performed the second of these at the opening Spectrum concerts. They are written for any combination of instruments that achieves an antiphonal effect, and Thomas chose that which calls for two quartets of brass instruments, each composed of two trumpets and two trombones.

This music was written for performance in a basilica or some cathedral - like edifice where the sound can reverberate to one's heart's content. Thomas placed his forces in a manner calculated to realize that result. Each quartet was seated on a high riser, at opposite sides of the stage with the vast space between them occupied only by the conductor. The playing was clean and precise, both quartets complementing each other fittingly, and the two pieces, both based on Medieval church modes, sounded eloquent though solemn.

The concert closed with a competent if uninspiring reading of Schumann's rather weak Spring Symphony. More and more, I begin to wonder if Thomas' forte is conducting the usual piece. He tends to the pedestrian with the best and poorest of the standard fare.

H.

BSO, Bishop (Davis)

Muscular Mozart and dashing Dvořák were the orders of the day in Carnegie Hall on February 12. It was all part of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Colin Davis conducting and pianist Stephen Bishop as soloist, and together they managed to generate and sustain an extraordinarily high level of excitement.

Where has Bishop been all our lives? Although only thirty-one years old, he has been performing in public from the age of eleven, apparently mostly in Britain and on the continent. He was born in Los Angeles, studied for several years in London with Myra Hess, has an established reputation abroad, and returns now to New York as a fully formed artist. As soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in E flat (K.482) he demonstrated the imagination, sensitivity, strength, and control which should assure him a large and devoted audience. It was a vigorous performance, perhaps too much so in the first movement, but one filled with character and insight. Since the conductor's approach was in complete agreement with the pianist's, the result was an outstanding musical experience.

Dvořák's Symphony No. 7 in D minor was the orchestra's major offering, and once again there were the sweep and momentum which seem so much a part of Colin Davis' style. They gave new life to the music's somewhat self-conscious sense of importance, and drew from Boston's musicians a greater animation than their earlier concerts here this season have demonstrated. New to New York, and totally delightful, was the concert's opening work, Michael Tippett's Fantasia concertante on a Theme of Corelli. With rich textures and florid figurations, it managed to sound both Italian baroque and English. Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, and Jules Eskin, cello, were the concertino soloists. Together with conductor and orchestra, they began what went on to be a most satisfactory evening.

ARTHUR SATZ

FM GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY (CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1972

During February . . .

The Fiftieth Anniversary of the Eastman School of Music will be celebrated in Carnegie Hall on the 15th. Walter Hendl will conduct the Eastman Philharmonia in a program featuring the NYC premiere of Penderecki's Piano Concerto . . . On the 12th, the Paper Bag Players, a leading children's theater group, will play the first of twelve consecutive Saturday performances at the Brooklyn Academy of Music; curtain is 3PM . . . On the 2nd, baritone Hermann Prey will join Frederic Waldman and the Musica Aeterna group in songs by Strauss and Bach's Cantata "Ich habe genug"; Handel's Op. 6, No. 5 and Stravinsky will also be performed . . . Yehudi Menuhin and his sister Hepzibah make their only NY appearance this season in the Great Performers series at Philharmonic Hall on the 6th at 3PM . . . The Juilliard School gives free concerts on the 9th, 15th, 16th, 18th, 23rd, 26th and 29th at Tully Hall . . . On the 12th, the Boston Symphony will be conducted by Colin Davis in Carnegie Hall. Stephen Bishop will be the piano soloist in a program of Tippett, Stravinsky, and Dvorak. Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the BSO in Philharmonic Hall on the 9th and 11th. Haydn's Oboe Concerto will be played by Ralph Gomberg (first chair of the orchestra, brother of the NY Philharmonic's first oboe). Mahler's Fifth Symphony is the main offering . . .

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

FEB 12 1972

Weekend Music & Dance

DAVIS ARNER PERLMAN SIEPI

No. 6 TODAY

Metropolitan Opera: At 2, "La Forza del Destino." Pierre Boulez, conductor; Christa Ludwig, mezzo-soprano; Schubert's "Symphony No. 4, C minor ('Tragic')", Liszt's "Three Songs," Bartok's "Dance Suite," Berg's "Symphonic Fragments, Opus 7, from 'Wozzeck'"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30. Boston Symphony Orchestra: Colin Davis, conductor; Stephen Bishop, pianist; Tippetts "Fantasie Concertante" (N. Y. premiere), Mozart's Piano Concerto in C" (K. 503), Dvorak's "Symphony No. 7; Carnegie Hall, 8.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

MAY 1972

HOST
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 5 1972

This Week in New York

February 5th - 12th

• ART

Dali (Phyllis Lucas Gallery, 52nd St. & 2nd Ave.) . . . Picasso paintings, sculpture, drawings to May 1 (Museum of Modern Art, 11 W. 53rd St. Adm. $1.75) . . . William Kienbusch thru Feb. 19 (Kraushaar, 1055 Madison Av. at 80th) . . . John Singer Sargeant to Feb. 15th (Metropolitan Museum of Art, 82nd & 5th Ave. Contribution required for admission) . . . Charles Levier to Feb. 26 (Wally F, 17 E. 57th St.) . . . 19th Century Americans to Apr. 30th (Berry Hill, 743 5th Ave. 58th St.) . . . Robert Goodnough thru Feb. 16, (Emmerich, 41 E. 57th) . . . French Impressionists, Americana thru Feb. 29 (Hammer, 51 E. 57th St.) . . . Bruce Dorfman to Feb. 16 (Kennedy, 20 E. 56th) . . . Currier & Ives in Winter (Museum of the City of N.Y., 103rd & 5th Ave.) . . . John Chamberlain thru Feb. 27th (Guggenheim, 88th & 5th Ave. Adm. $1).

• BALLET

Folklorico of Mexico Ballet, City Center Theater, 131 W. 55th St. 246-8989. Eves. 8:00, Mats. Sat. & Sun. 2:00. Adm. from $2. Through Feb. 13th.

New York City Ballet, N.Y. State Theater, Lincoln Center, Bway at 64th St. 877-4727. Eves. 8:00, Mats. Sat. 2:00, Sun. 1:00. Adm fr. $1.50. Thru Feb. 20.

• MUSIC

Carnegie Hall, 57th & 7th Ave. (247-7459). Eves. 8, Feb. 7, Cleveland Orchestra, Barenboim cond.; Feb. 11, 8:30, Artur Rubinstein; Feb. 12, Boston Symphony, Colin Davis cond.

WHERE MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 15,000

FEB 5 1972

music and dance

ALICE TULLY HALL

Mon., Feb. 7, at 8: Music from Marlboro, with mezzo-soprano Betty Allen, pianist Cristina Ortiz, violinists Hiroko Yajima and Rainer Moog, cellist Madeline Foley and flutist Paula Robison; Tues., Feb. 8, at 8:30: Clarion Concerts, Newell Jenkins, music director; Wed., Feb. 9, at 8: Oscar Shumsky, violinist; Thurs., Feb. 10, at 8: Dwight Teltzer, pianist; Fri., Feb. 11, at 8:30 and Sat., Feb. 12, at 9: Chamber Music Society concerts. Lincoln Center, B'way at 65th St., 362-1911

THE AMATO OPERA

Operas are presented on the weekends. Sun., Feb. 6, at 3, Fri., Feb. 11 and Sat., Feb. 12 at 8:15: Andrea Chenier. The Amato Theatre, 319 Bowery St. at 2nd St., 228-8200

BALLET FOLKLORICO OF MEXICO

The famous company of seventy-five, singers, dancers and musicians will perform nine colorful ballets, including five which have never before been presented. Sun., Feb. 6 and Feb. 13 at 7:30; Tues., Feb. 7, through Sat., Feb. 12, at 8; Sat. & Sun. matinee at 2. City Center, 55th St. Theatre, 131 W. 55th St., 246-8989

CARNEGIE HALL

Mon., Feb. 7: Cleveland Orchestra, Daniel Barenboim, conducting, Clifford Curzon, pianist; Thurs., Feb. 10: Benefit concert for Martin Luther King, Jr. Afro-American Student Center; Fri., Feb. 11, at 8:30: pianist Artur Rubinstein; Sat., Feb. 12: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis, guest conductor, Stephen Bishop, pianist. Evening performances at 8 unless otherwise noted. Carnegie Hall, 154 W. 57th St., 247-7459

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

FEB 8 1972

New England Newsclip

Concert Peregrinations

BY RICHARD BUELL

'Twere a rough week, me hearties, to be driven, as by the lash, from Symphony Hall to Gardner Museum to Sanders Theater. Five concerts in a week's time, with the interstices filled by long sessions at the turntable, are a lot. It leaves one crapulous and unplugged. Bear with me, reader, as I give an account of the excesses of concert-going, the moral at the end left for you to draw.

It all began chastely enough on the 25th with a concert by the Camerata, which was hitting the big time by playing Sanders Theatre. This aggregation, which is a contemporary of New York's Pro Musica, takes as its province the musical past from Monteverdi on back, and it has two distinct assets: the Mason collection of old instruments at the Museum of Fine Arts, and Joel Cohen, an enthusiastic A&R man for the Renaissance and Middle Ages. It was a worthy affair, all in all, when you consider that there were over thirty pieces performed, none of them written for so modern a construct as the conventional concert, which asks people to sit in one place for an hour and a half without fidgeting, much less eating or drinking. These contraints did not exist, I am sure, for the people at the Burgundy court and the Loire Valley garden parties, who were hearing these Dufay and Jannequin pieces four and five centuries ago. The high points that lodged in my memory were, in no special order, Claude Goudimel's haunting Psalm settings from the Reformation, the purposeful undulations of the Josquin des Pres "Salve Regina," and some completely delightful Provencal carols from Avignon Cathedral around 1600. I do not have the keenest standards for judging performances on the sackbut, rebec and krumhorn, but there seemed to much less of the earnest wheezing from them that I feared, and the vocal soloists (Jane Bryden, Mark Baker, Frank Hoffmeister, Katherine Edmonds) were fine. Susie Almasi was a phenomenally accurate percussionist throughout. Right on, Camerata.

Next evening, back to Sanders and its noisy radiators for the winter concert of John Harbison's Cantata Singers. (This was one of those times when I would have liked to be in two places at once, for at the same hour, Margaret Price, the young Welsh soprano, was giving a recital at Hopkins Center, Dartmouth. By all accounts, she is all the things you have liked about Elly Ameling, Benita Valente and the early Irmgard Seefried. Watch for her.) As usual with the Cantata Singers, there was first-rate music set in an intelligently planned program. If Mr. Harbison is campaigning for Heinrich Schuetz, as seems to be the case, here's my vote. What astoundingly beautiful music he wrote for massed voices, and what a sense of color he brought to "orchestrating" for a chorus! "Die Himmel erzaehlen" (SW 386), "Selig sind die Toten" (SWV 391), and "Ich bin ein richter Weinstock" (SWV 389) brought all this to mind, and, by comparison, made Schoenberg's treatment of the same forces, in "Mond und Menschen," seem gray and turgid. The two Bach cantatas, "Brich dem Hungrigen dein Brot (BWV 39) and "Schmuecke dich" (BWV 180), were transparently delivered, but with some roughnesses that needn't have been. Examples: the grievously out of tune playing from cellist Jay Humeston behind Jane Bryden's lovely singing of "Ach, wie hungert" in the second cantata; and the insane pursuit of daintiness engaged in by tenor Karl Dan Sorenson and some highly fallible accompanists in the aria "Ermunt're dich." The result was grossly trivial, no mean accomplishment with Bach. Though some of the instrumental work fumbled, the chorus remains a fine, robust one, with good intonation and plenty of dynamic nuance. Jane Bryden, soprano, and Mark Baker, bass (hello again!), were up to standard, but mezzo D'Anna Fortunato ran into some acoustical bad luck; the instruments covered part of her range.

Friday, January 28: the beat goes on; some trembling of extremities and signs of degeneration of the pineal body, but the lurgies held at bay so far.

I realized that, to our mutual loss, I had not attended a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for some time, so I thought I would indulge in a bit of reverse slumming with the Friday afternoon ladies at Symphony Hall. (A friend I took to one of these seances remarked, "I've never seen so many Gentiles in my life!") Friday afternoon is a good time to catch the BSO freshly rehearsed, though, and the evidence indicates that their standards are up. Honest Injun. Michael Tilson Thomas, who had been with the orchestra for the whole month, was conducting.

To begin, two Gabrieli Canzoni were brightly (how otherwise with those trumpets?) played by two groups of trombones and trumpets placed at either end of the stage; in vain, for little of their antiphonal quality reached my seat. Hindemith's Cello Concerto (1940), which followed, deserves, like everything Hindemith wrote, the epithet "well-made", but it also contains a larger helping of the old fellow's lyricism (dour) and humor (dour) and less of the outright dourness than is customary with his music of this period. It's notable, too, for the avoidance of combat between soloist and orchestra; for the most part, they behave like a mongoose and cobra who have come to terms. Very strange. The finale finds Hindemith happily playing with triangle, celesta and glockenspiel, and some bright, clean Bauhaus wind sonorities. Coming from Lawrence Lesser, the solo part, which is a bitch, didn't sound exactly effortless, but he has the manner, certainly, and also the dreamy, asthenic appearance that is obligatory for cellists nowadays.

I thought that Thomas led the Schumann Spring Symphony very sensibly, and that the men of the orchestra executed it neatly, but you know how hopeless Schumann was with the orchestra. By assigning certain melodic shapes to the violins, they have no choice but to screech, which they do. The finale is a clumsy frolic which would sound much better in a piano reduction, but oh well, he tried. In sum, I'd say the concert was one you could safely take your mother to. (Thomas has a gift for this. I have tested my mother on him before.)

By the way, the recent BSO performances of the Mahler 5th, conducted by Thomas, were the best Mahler this orchestra has ever done -- passionate, detailed, beautiful in sound.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Hindemith Concerto

BSO, Conductor Thomas, Cellist Lesser

Paul Hindemith was a faculty member of the Berkshire Music Center during its first year in 1940 and even with a full load of teaching managed to find time to compose a cello concerto between June and September. The work was performed the following season in Boston, Cambridge and New York, and at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitzky conducting ~~and~~ Piatigorsky as soloist. Then it disappeared from the orchestra's repertoire until resurrected at last weekend's concerts.

The concerto was brought back to Boston by a pair of Los Angeles-born "kids" who probably were just about to become gleams in their fathers' eyes while Hindemith toiled over his score. Michael Tilson Thomas, the conductor, is 27 years old. Laurence Lesser, the soloist, is his senior by only a few years. Nevertheless, the two "youngsters" presented a mature, driving performance of the work that could only have delighted the composer.

Actually the concerto is not Hindemith at his best. It sports the Hindemith imprint clearly: the interchange of quartal chords based on the interval of a fourth with the more conventional triads; the use of polytonality; the vivid orchestration. It is neatly put together and the structure is sound. And yet, the Concerto does not quite come off as forcefully as other music which Hindemith has written for large orchestra. One is more impressed by its architecture than moved by its expressiveness.

Lesser's talent is admirably suited to this essentially dry music. He produces a rich, full tone from his cello where sonority or sensuousness is required. More important, he has the intellectual insight needed to cope with the linear demands of the music in its more intellectually rigorous moments.

A 1961 graduate of Harvard and winner of a Fulbright Fellowship, he proved his gifts by taking the cello prize at Siena the following year and a prize at the Tchaikowsky International Competition in Moscow in 1966. He has recorded Schoenberg's Cello Concerto but his style and command suggest he would do equally well in the warhorses, too.

Since Thomas and Lesser have appeared in recital together, it is only natural to expect them to work in close rapport. And this they all did throughout the three-movement Hindemith score.

The program opened with a pair of novelties, two sixteenth-century Canzoni by Giovanni Gabrieli. Thomas had previously performed the second of these at the opening Spectrum concerts. They are written for any combination of instruments that achieves an antiphonal effect, and Thomas chose that which calls for two quartets of brass instruments, each composed of two trumpets and two trombones.

This music was written for performance in a basilica or some cathedral - like edifice where the sound can reverberate to one's heart's content. Thomas placed his forces in a manner calculated to realize that result. Each quartet was seated on a high riser at opposite sides of the stage with the vast space between them occupied only by the conductor. The playing was clean and precise, both quartets complementing each other fittingly, and the two pieces, both based on Medieval church modes, sounded eloquent though solemn.

The concert closed with a competent if uninspiring reading of Schumann's rather weak Spring Symphony. More and more, I begin to wonder if Thomas' forte is conducting the usual piece. He tends to the pedestrian with the best and poorest of the standard fare.

H.

BSO, Bishop (Davis)

Muscular Mozart and dashing Dvořák were the orders of the day in Carnegie Hall on February 12. It was all part of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Colin Davis conducting and pianist Stephen Bishop as soloist, and together they managed to generate and sustain an extraordinarily high level of excitement.

Where has Bishop been all our lives? Although only thirty-one years old, he has been performing in public from the age of eleven, apparently mostly in Britain and on the continent. He was born in Los Angeles, studied for several years in London with Myra Hess, has an established reputation abroad, and returns now to New York as a fully formed artist. As soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in E flat (K.482) he demonstrated the imagination, sensitivity, strength, and control which should assure him a large and devoted audience. It was a vigorous performance, perhaps too much so in the first movement, but one filled with character and insight. Since the conductor's approach was in complete agreement with the pianist's, the result was an outstanding musical experience.

Dvořák's Symphony No. 7 in D minor was the orchestra's major offering, and once again there were the sweep and momentum which seem so much a part of Colin Davis' style. They gave new life to the music's somewhat self-conscious sense of importance, and drew from Boston's musicians a greater animation than their earlier concerts here this season have demonstrated. New to New York, and totally delightful, was the concert's opening work, Michael Tippett's Fantasia concertante on a Theme of Corelli. With rich textures and florid figurations, it managed to sound both Italian baroque and English. Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins, and Jules Eskin, cello, were the concertino soloists. Together with conductor and orchestra, they began what went on to be a most satisfactory evening.

ARTHUR SATZ

FM GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1972

During February . . .

The Fiftieth Anniversary of the Eastman School of Music will be celebrated in Carnegie Hall on the 15th. Walter Hendl will conduct the Eastman Philharmonia in a program featuring the NYC premiere of Penderecki's Piano Concerto . . . On the 12th, the Paper Bag Players, a leading children's theater group, will play the first of twelve consecutive Saturday performances at the Brooklyn Academy of Music; curtain is 3PM . . . On the 2nd, baritone Hermann Prey will join Frederic Waldman and the Musica Aeterna group in songs by Strauss and Bach's Cantata "Ich habe genug"; Handel's Op. 6, No. 5 and Stravinsky will also be performed . . . Yehudi Menuhin and his sister Hepzibah make their only NY appearance this season in the Great Performers series at Philharmonic Hall on the 6th at 3PM . . . The Juilliard School gives free concerts on the 9th, 15th, 16th, 18th, 23rd, 26th and 29th at Tully Hall . . . On the 12th, the Boston Symphony will be conducted by Colin Davis in Carnegie Hall. Stephen Bishop will be the piano soloist in a program of Tippett, Stravinsky, and Dvorak. Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the BSO in Philharmonic Hall on the 9th and 11th. Haydn's Oboe Concerto will be played by Ralph Gomberg (first chair of the orchestra, brother of the NY Philharmonic's first oboe). Mahler's Fifth Symphony is the main offering . . .

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

FEB 12 1972

Weekend Music & Dance

DAVIS ARNER PERLMAN SIEPI

NO. 6

TODAY

Metropolitan Opera: At 2, "La Forza del Destino."

Pierre Boulez, conductor; Christa Ludwig, mezzo-soprano; Schubert's "Symony No. 4, C minor Tragic')", Liszt's "Three ngs," Bartok's "Dance ite," Berg's "Symphonic agments, Opus 7, from ozzeck'"; Philharmonic ll, 8:30.

Boston Symphony Orestra: Colin Davis, conctor; Stephen Bishop, anist; Tippetts "Fansie Concertante" (N. Y. emiere), Mozart's Piano oncerto in C" (K. 503), orak's "Symphony No. ; Carnegie Hall, 8.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

MAY 1972

HOST
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 5 1972

'his Week in New York

February 5th - 12th

• ART

)ali (Phyllis Lucas Gallery, 52nd St. & 2nd Ave.) . . . Picasso paintings, sculpture, drawings to May 1 (Museum of Modern Art, 11 W. 53rd St. Adm. $1.75) . . . William Kienbusch thru Feb. 19 (Kraushaar, 1055 Madison Av. at 80th) . . . John Singer Sargeant to Feb. 15th (Metropolitan Museum of Art, 82nd & 5th Ave. Contribution required for admission) . . . Charles Levier to Feb. 26 (Wally F, 17 E. 57th St.) . . . 19th Century Americans to Apr. 30th (Berry Hill, 743 5th Ave. 58th St.) . . . Robert Goodnough thru Feb. 16, (Emmerich, 41 E. 57th) . . . French Impressionists, Americana thru Feb. 29 (Hammer, 51 E. 57th St.) . . . Bruce Dorfman to Feb. 16 (Kennedy, 20 E. 56th) . . . Currier & Ives in Winter (Museum of the City of N.Y., 103rd & 5th Ave.) . . . John Chamberlain thru Feb. 27th (Guggenheim, 88th & 5th Ave. Adm. $1).

• BALLET

Folklorico of Mexico Ballet, City Center Theater, 131 W. 55th St. 246-8989. Eves. 8:00, Mats. Sat. & Sun. 2:00. Adm. from $2. Through Feb. 13th.

New York City Ballet, N.Y. State Theater, Lincoln Center, Bway at 64th St. 877-4727. Eves. 8:00, Mats. Sat. 2:00, Sun. 1:00. Adm fr. $1.50. Thru Feb. 20.

• MUSIC

Carnegie Hall, 57th & 7th Ave. (247-7459). Eves. 8, Feb. 7, Cleveland Orchestra, Barenboim cond.; Feb. 11, 8:30, Artur Rubinstein; Feb. 12, Boston Symphony, Colin Davis cond.

WHERE MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 15,000

FEB 5 1972

music and dance

ALICE TULLY HALL

Mon., Feb. 7, at 8: Music from Marlboro, with mezzo-soprano Betty Allen, pianist Cristina Ortiz, violinists Hiroko Yajima and Rainer Moog, cellist Madeline Foley and flutist Paula Robison; Tues., Feb. 8, at 8:30: Clarion Concerts, Newell Jenkins, music director; Wed., Feb. 9, at 8: Oscar Shumsky, violinist; Thurs., Feb. 10, at 8: Dwight Teltzer, pianist; Fri., Feb. 11, at 8:30 and Sat., Feb. 12, at 9: Chamber Music Society concerts. Lincoln Center, B'way at 65th St., 362-1911

THE AMATO OPERA

Operas are presented on the weekends. Sun., Feb. 6, at 3, Fri., Feb. 11 and Sat., Feb. 12 at 8:15: Andrea Chenier. The Amato Theatre, 319 Bowery St. at 2nd St., 228-8200

BALLET FOLKLORICO OF MEXICO

The famous company of seventy-five, singers, dancers and musicians will perform nine colorful ballets, including five which have never before been presented. Sun., Feb. 6 and Feb. 13 at 7:30; Tues., Feb. 7, through Sat., Feb. 12, at 8; Sat. & Sun. matinee at 2. City Center, 55th St. Theatre, 131 W. 55th St., 246-8989

CARNEGIE HALL

Mon., Feb. 7: Cleveland Orchestra, Daniel Barenboim, conducting, Clifford Curzon, pianist; Thurs., Feb. 10: Benefit concert for Martin Luther King, Jr. Afro-American Student Center; Fri., Feb. 11, at 8:30: pianist Artur Rubinstein; Sat., Feb. 12: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis, guest conductor, Stephen Bishop, pianist. Evening performances at 8 unless otherwise noted. Carnegie Hall, 154 W. 57th St., 247-7459

Colin Davis Conducts BSO in All-Mozart Program

By HARRY NEVILLE

Colin Davis is a conductor who nearly always succeeds in bringing out the very best in the Boston Symphony, and the all-Mozart program he conducted Thursday afternoon in Symphony Hall proved no exception to this general rule. Not only was there exemplary playing by the orchestra, but there was a good performance, too, pianist Stephen Bishop. And the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, prepared by John Oliver, gave one of the finest choral performances this writer has heard in Symphony Hall.

BISHOP'S contribution was to perform the solo part of the Piano Concerto in C, K. 503, a work which the orchestra had not performed locally since 1883, when Georg Henschel was the conductor and Carl Baermann the soloist. The BSO's neglect of this work is not unusual, for nowhere is the concerto programmed with the regularly one would expect of so attractive a piece. It is the most joyous and extroverted of all the great Mozart piano concertos, a fact which somehow works against it with performers, who seem to prefer the tenderness and introspection of its companion works.

Bishop gave a full-blooded performance, one that had a nice mixture of dash and expressiveness about it and one that avoided the fragility that often passes for Mozartean style. More than most of the concertos, K. 503 can withstand a degree of romanticization, and the only question about this particular performance was whether or not Bishop overstepped permissible bounds.

ENJOYABLE as his performance was. I think that ideally I would prefer quite a bit less pedalling than Bishop used. Also quite a bit less striving for long-line phrasing at the expense of articulative details. It was also bothersome that Bishop did not pay more attention to what the orchestra was doing. Flute, oboe and bassoon passages were sometimes obscured by his overzealous execution of what should have been discreet filigree work.

Opening the program was the Kyrie in D Minor, K. 341, a work of such striking beauty that one can only regret, along with program annotator Andrew Raeburn, that Mozart did not follow it with the other movements that make up the Roman Mass.

THE PERFORMANCE of the concluding work — the D Minor Requiem, K. 626 — was dedicated to the memory of Noah Bielski, a member of the BSO violin section since 1955. Bielski's death early Thursday morning came as a shock to all who had experienced the extraordinary personal warmth of the man.

The Requiem was a fitting tribute, for its performance combined dramatic eloquence with a rare sensitivity to such details as phrasing, balances and textures. Soprano Benita Valente, contralto's D'Anna Fortunato, tenor Kenneth Riegel and bass Robert Hale sang the solos with exquisite tone and musicianship.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 40,0[illegible]

FEB 19 1972 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

FEB 17 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO Conc

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all-Mozart concert at the fifteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra on Thursday afternoon. Feb. 17 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Feb. 19 at 8:30 p.m.

THE JERSEY JOURNAL
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
D. 86,224 SAT. 79,666

FEB 14 1972

Critic-at-Large

Sad Concert Weekend

By Byron Belt

Weekend activities were considerably saddened by news from Budapest of the passing of pianist-accompanist-coach Arpad Sandor. Mr. Sandor, whose American concert career spanned associations with such greats as Jascha Helfetz, Grace Moore, Lily Pons and Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, was perhaps best known for a collaboration of many years with the incomparable Dorothy Maynor. His last recording, of Strauss Lieder, with Lisa Della Casa, was warmly praised by critics here and in Europe. The special fire and flair Arpad Sandor brought to music will be sorely missed.

There was little to cheer about in concerts by the New York Philaharmonic or the Boston Symphony this weekend either.

Pierre Moulez, whose philaharmonic program will be repeated tonight at 7:30 for the curious, finally led the sort of concert his detractors insist reflects the "real" Boulezx. In music of Schubert, Liszt and Bartok, the philaharmonic sounded as though in the hands of a clinical diagnostician.

Franz Schubert's rarely performed Fourth Symphony is anything but "tragic" as it title seems to indicate, but it is filled with a songful, soulful lilt and warmth that were utterly absent in the cold, mechanical reading Boulez provided. In previous performances of Berlioz and and Haydn the music director Haydn the music director has indicated he has very little sense of humor where music is concerned, and in the Schubert he demonstrated that grace and style can also be lacking where the music fails to engage his incredible intellectual powers.

Bartok's "Dance Suite" has caused many a conductor to fall on his face. Boulez failed to join [illegible]

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089

FEB 14 1972

Death mars concert scene for weekend

By BYRON BELT

enough, however, to rescue an immaculately played but prechilled concert.

There was warmth aplenty in the Saturday concert Colin Davis conducted for the Boston Symponhy in Carnegie Hall. The problem was that of being both too loud and-dificient in subtle underlining of the music at hand.

The Dvorak Seventh Symphony lacked those rhythmic inflections which transform the score from second-rate Brahms to firstrate Czech music. The Mozart K. 482 Piano Concerto gloried in the Bostoy Symphony winds and Davis' firm but gracious conducting. Alas, only in the finale did soloist Stephen Bishop relent, stop pounding, and permit one of Mozart's most delightful scores to make a reasonable impression.

It should be noted that Bishop's melodramatic swooning and breathy noises seem to constitute high art for the audience, for he was warmly recieved.

The novelty on the BSO program was a "Fantasia Concertanic on a Theme of Corelli" by Sir Michael Tippett. Filled with gorgeous string sonorities, the music was a diluted version of Benjamin Britten's Variation on a Theme of Frank Bridge, with none of its somber beauties or raucous fun.

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

FEB 17 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO Concert

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all-Mozart concert at the fifteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra on Thursday afternoon. Feb. 17 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Feb. 19 at 8:30 p.m.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

FEB 17 1972 New Engle News

BSO Concert

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all-Mozart concert at the fifteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra on Thursday afternoon. Feb. 17 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Feb. 19 at 8:30 p.m.

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

FEB 17 1972 New Englan Newscl

BSO Concert

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all-Mozart concert at the fifteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra on Thursday afternoon. Feb. 17 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, Feb. 19 at 8:30 p.m.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 211,[illegible]

FEB 19 1972 New England Newsclip

Mozart by Davis

Recalling Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

The second program of Colin Davis's two-week stint as guest conductor this season of the Boston Symphony was all Mozart—the Kyrie in D minor (K.341), the Piano Concerto in C (K.503), and the Requiem in D minor (K.626). It was, in fact, a repetition of one of Mr. Davis's festival programs at Tanglewood last summer, with Stephen Bishop again the pianist, and contralto D'Anna Fortunato joining Benita Valente, Kenneth Riegel, and Robert Hale as a new and worthy soloist in the Requiem at Symphony Hall. The Mozart performances will be repeated there tonight.

Not the least of the features of Thursday afternoon's concert (this week in place of the usual Friday) was the impressive part contributed by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, which, under John Oliver's direction, has within a year, become a vital and important adjunct to the orchestra's programming potential. Theirs were the eloquent voices for the Kyrie (its first performance by the BSO in Boston), and of course the chorus shared equally with orchestra and soloists the monumental exposition of the Requiem, in an interpretation beautifully molded by Mr. Davis.

Bielski tribute

Added solemnity was occasioned by the dedication of the Requiem's performance to Noah Bielski, a violinist with the orchestra since 1955, who had passed away on Thursday morning. Therefore there was no applause before or after the singing and playing of the mass—proof in this case, that deeply felt appreciation doesn't require clamorous expression.

Mr. Bishop, playing his second Mozart concerto in successive appearances with the orchestra, reaffirmed first impressions of his facility and affinity for this music. Also, however, he showed the same tendency he had with the earlier concerto (K.482), aided and abetted by Mr. Davis, to dress it up neatly (and just a little quaintly) so that its warmth and high spirits hardly had a chance to emerge naturally. Somehow, Mozart on good behavior isn't really Mozart at his swinging best.

As a whole, however, the program was a felicitous example of the mutual regard that exists between Mr. Davis and the BSO's musicians, a circumstance that augurs well for his return for a longer period next season as one of the orchestra's two (with Michael Tilson Thomas) newly designated principal guest conductors.

[76]

Conductor Davis in Fine Form

Symphony's Mozart Program Tops

By JOHN RICHARDSON

At Thursday's Boston Symphony concert, Colin Davis, to be one of two principal guest conductors here next year, closed an all-Mozart program with a deeply moving performance of the "Requiem." His close-to-perfect rendering of a highly individual interpretation fortifies the opinion that Davis is the best Mozart conductor around today.

There is much controversy surrounding the composition of the "Requiem." How Mozart himself wrote and how much is by his student Sussmayr is still a matter of debate. In the end, the basic genius is Mozart's, and his last work is a striking testament to his profound faith.

● Music Review

At the heart of Colin Davis' excellence is an extraordinary sense of rhythm that provides the basis for a keen sense of architecture and line. Especially fine Thursday were a hair-raising "Dies Irae" and "Rex Tremendae," and a touchingly sensitive "Voca Me."

It was very much a turned-on performance, partly due, perhaps, to the sudden death of Noah Bielski, a member of the Symphony's first violin section.

★

The orchestra was in top form, polished and sensitive; Ronald Barron's playing of treacherous trombone solo in the "Tuba Mirum" was outstanding.

The quartet of soloists (Benita alente, D'Anna Fortunato, Kenneth Riegel and Robert Hale) were exceptional, as was the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, though the chorus could use a little beefing-up in the soprano section.

The program opened with a Kyrie for chorus and orchestra and continued with the piano concerto in C. K.. 503. Davis and the orchestra provided a gorgeous accompanlment for a distressingly hacked at performance by Stephen Bishop.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,000

FEB 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Colin Davis, Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all-Mozart concert on Thursday afternoon. The concert will be repeated tomorrow evening, February 19, at 8:30 p.m. The concert opened with a performance of the Kyrie in D minor with the Tanglewood Festival Chrous, John Oliver, Director, followed by the Piano concerto in C, K. 503 with soloist Stephen Bishop. Following intermission, the concert concluded with a performance of the Requiem with soloists soprano Benita Valente, alto D'Anna Fortunato, tenor Kenneth Riegel, and bass Robert Hale with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .
Lillian

Sunday Advertiser
pictorial
Living
June 18, 1972

COVER STORY

They Have Orchestra, Will Travel

•

The Incredible Elizabeth Taylor

•

Who Is the Sleepy Driver?

BOSTON
Sunday Advertiser
pictorial
Living
June 18, 1972

COVER STORY

They Have Orchestra Will Travel

The Incredible Elizabeth Taylor

Who Is the Sleepy Driver?

Trumpeter Roger Voisin, oboist John Holmes and violinist William Waterhouse entertain (left, front to rear) Dr. Kenneth Graham, Laurie diMare, Mrs. Max Winder, Edmund Winder. At right are Caitlin Waterhouse, William Gibson, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Clifford Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Andre Come.

Sean Hearne, son of bass player Joseph Hearne, celebrates birthday with hamburger.

Percussionist Arthur Press teaches symphony's favorite game to Mrs. Anita Andrews (left), Mrs. Philip K. Allen and William K. Walters.

New York Council of Friends members, Mr. and Mrs. John Hoyt Stookey, welcome Mrs. Harris Fahnestock (right) into their Fifth Avenue apartment, where Bostonians were entertained before a performance.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the symphony's late musical director, chats with Mrs. George Lee Sargent (center), chairman of Boston Council of Friends, and Talcott M. Banks, president and trustee of the orchestra.

William Steinberg conducts the orchestra during a recent performance in New York City, where concerts were given at both Philharmonic Hall and Carnegie Hall.

Photos by Bob Howard

COVER STORY

Have orchestra, will travel

By PEGGY SAUNDERS

HOW MANY symphony orchestras pack up their instruments and traipse off to New York, Paris, London and Rome with a ready-made cheering section in tow?

Last year, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra went on European tour, some 50 hometown fans tagged along. There were as many aboard when the orchestra sped to New York this season on a special train for a weekend of concerts and parties and the New York debut of the Boston Pops Orchestra under the baton of Arthur Fiedler.

Most of the Friends—with a capital 'F'—of the Boston Symphony are Brahmins who have the time and money to travel. So where the orchestra goes, they go.

On the New York trip, Talcott M. Banks, president and board member, ignored a fever of 102 degrees in order to make the four-day mini tour. And the music was good medicine. He returned fit as a fiddle.

Bob and Harriet Parrish traveled the greatest distance of any of the Friends—all the way from Fort Wayne, Ind. They were introduced to the symphony a few summers ago at Tanglewood, joined the Friends and were in the orchestra's European entourage.

★

Suffolk University professor Charles Kimbell commuted between New York and Boston so as not to miss his classes or any performances of the symphony.

The dynamo behind both the European tour and the New York mini tour was Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, a trustee of the orchestra. A cocktail party, receptions at Philharmonic Hall and Carnegie Hall, and a luncheon at New York's posh Colony Club were "extras" engineered by Mrs. Fahnestock.

"No other orchestra in the country has this kind of relationship with its supporters," contends Mrs. Fahnestock.

During the return trip to Boston, the party tempo increased. With a bar that never closed and a luncheon of chicken Kiev, asparagus vinaigrette, beans almandine and cheesecake, the traditional reserve of New Englanders was sorely tested.

Percussionists Tom Gauger and Arthur Press taught Republican State Committeeman Philip K. Allen, Mrs. George (Hessie) Sargent, sister-in-law of the governor, Mrs. Angelica Russell, a native Bostonian who has lived many years abroad, and Mrs. J. Denny May, who splits her time between Cleveland and Boston, the symphony's favorite pastime: a French version of bridge.

Second violinist William Waterhouse, who more often plays Brahms, Beethoven or Bach, fiddled away at "I've Been Working on the Railroad."

Where to next? Well, with Manchurian-born Seiji Ozawa as its new artistic director, the orchestra and the Friends are looking to the East and the parting of the Bamboo Curtain. There's talk of a China tour.

Peggy Saunders is a staff writer.

[78]

BLANK PAGE

BSO 'aristocrats' play

CS Monitor Nov. 9, 1971

By Louis Snyder
Cambridge, Mass.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, regarded by some as the aristocrats' Marlboro, gave the first of a series of three concerts, cosponsored by Harvard's Department of Music, on Sunday afternoon in Sanders Theater. There was an almost capacity audience to hear these top-flight first desk players of the BSO in works by four live-and-well composers—Wolfgang A. Mozart, Arthur Berger, Mel Powell, and Johannes Brahms—and to become reacquainted with principal players' individual sounds, often swallowed up in the context of a full symphonic performance.

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and first violist Burton Fine began the afternoon with Mozart's Duo in B flat — a suave, congenial partnership — and were joined by Jules Eskin, cello, and Gilbert Kalish as guest pianist, in the Brahms C minor Piano Quartet, to put a richly upholstered end to the concert.

In between, there were two delectable opportunities for winds — Arthur Berger's charming Quartet in C major (1946), and Mel Powell's Divertimento for Five Winds (1957). Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; and Sherman Walt, bassoon, did eloquent justice to the breezy, well-knit structure of the first, and with Armando Ghitalla's clarion trumpet added, made a swinging fun exercise of Powell's persuasive four-movement piece.

Everything before the intermission was done with élan and esprit — an informal release from the strictures of Symphony Hall—but the Brahms took on the status of a heavy passenger, chamber music with a capital C and a capital M, tolerable but doctrinaire. The audience, which comprised all age groups, was enthusiastic about the first and patient with the second, rewarding the artists with hard-palmed, satisfying applause, more and less in each case.

Next program, to be announced, is in the same place on Feb. 27.

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

FEB 1 1972 New Engl News

Sunday Concert

HANOVER —An innovation in the Dartmouth Concert Series will be a Sunday afternoon program on Feb. 6 at 3 o'clock i n Spaulding Auditorium. It will mark the first concert here by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and second concert on the current Dartmouth Series.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players concert are now on sale at the Hopkins Center Box Office. Reserved seats may be obtained by calling (603) 646-2422.

Music

Classical

TODAY

Boston Symphony Chamber Players in works of Mozart, Berger, Powell and Brahms; Sanders Theater, 4 p.m.

THE BOSTON HERALD Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

NOV 7 1971 New

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

NOV 11 1971 New England Newsclip

COURIER
LITTLETON, N. H.
W. 6,200

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Highlights At Hopkins Center, Dartmouth

An innovation in the Dartmouth Concert Series will be a Sunday afternoon program on Feb. 6 at 3 o'clock in Spaulding Auditorium. It will mark the first local concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and second concert on the current Dartmouth Series.

Made up of principal players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this internationally-known ensemble has performed in Europe and throughout the United States and reached untold numbers of listeners through their award-winning recording.

GRANITE STATE
VACATIONER
LACONIA, N. H.
W. 30,000

SEP 17 1971

DARTMOUTH—Lake SUNAPEE REGION

Winter Music Season Set at Hopkins Center

By MARION BRATESMAN

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra and George Solti, the Vienna Concentus Musicus, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Clifford Curzon, Tom Krause, the Amadeus String Quartet, the Strasbourg Percussion in their United States debut, Cathy Berberian, the Early Music Quartet, Frans Brueggen, Murray Perahia: these are among the many top ranking artists scheduled in a full 1971-72 concert season at the Hopkins Center of Dartmouth College, details of which are contained in a recently issued folder.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

NOV 8 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO concert fluctuates violently

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

Sunday's concert by the BSO Chamber Players in Sanders Theatre came off as an unevenly played group of very oddly juxtaposed pieces. The programming was so strange as to produce a situation where each piece seemed almost to destroy the one preceding it — each one either violently shifted the existing mood into something else, or got better by somehow negating good qualities of ones previously heard.

The Mozart B-flat Duo for violin and viola was played well, with the exception of the variation movement, which began at several points to sound rather like a lot of scales. Also there were occasional differences of styles between the players. It was impressive for absence of intramovement page-turns, which intrude constantly during most performances of this piece.

Following this rather nice beginning we were immediately jarred into another world by Arthur Berger's C major Quartet for woodwinds, a not very interesting and almost silly piece, which seemed in this performance to suffer from a lack of rehearsal time.

But then these same people added one player (Armando Ghitalla, who when playing trumpet with woodwinds, sounds like a beautiful soft brass woodwind) and came back onstage with the Divertimento of Mel Powel, music in very much the same vein, only better and better played. But relative to the Berger piece, which now in memory appeared even worse, and by this time what was Mozart doing back there anyway? Odd.

After intermission came the Brahms C minor piano Quartet, good music, really fine and sensitive chamber playing, and a whole different concert. In letters Brahms wrote about this piece he spoke of suicide, and that was exactly the sense one got from this performance — so heavy and weighted without being merely ponderous, so depressed and filled with pain.

There was also in it a quality of something close to real bitterness that one isn't used to hearing in this music, and I'm not sure what it was in their playing that conveyed such a feeling, but it was there and very definitely belongs there. Incredibly moving, this Brahms piece, and one of the most beautiful offerings to come from these players.

At Sanders

Boston Symphony Chamber Players

The fair-sized audience which braved Sunday's heavy gusts was richly rewarded by the opening concert in the Sanders Theater Series by The Boston Symphony Chamber Players. These Sunday afternoons at four by the orchestra's principals dip deeply into a delightful repertoire and offer some of the most satisfying musical experiences around town, both in terms of the works presented and the general level of the playing.

Last Sunday's inaugural drew on music from three centuries performed by two different groups of instruments, the strings and the winds. But it was the culminating work, Brahms Piano Quartet in C Minor, opus 60, which marked the crest of the afternoon. Gilbert Kalish, guest pianist, joined Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello, for a finely balanced, exquisitely proportioned reading of the quartet.

Here was chamber music at its best—warm, intimate, styled in a manner to convey the music's strong sentiment without plunging into sentimentality. Very likely it was the self-discipline of the players which kept the performance moving and eloquent, for this is music that tempts the players to overdo, turning poetry into doggerel, pathos into bathos. That they did not made for an expressive presentation of a masterful work.

The other work for strings opened the program. Silverstein and Fine teamed up for a suave reading of Mozart's Duo in B flat for violin and viola, K. 424. I thought that perhaps the violin dominated a bit too much but maybe that is because it tends to carry the melody while the viola fills in either with harmonic support or minor countermelody. Yet in the third movement, an andante with variations, the viola managed to make its own case and when it did, it was a most effective spokesman for itself. Messrs. Silverstein and Fine are performers of distinction whose playing showed it at all times.

Between the eighteenth and nineteenth century string pieces, came two twentieth-century compositions for winds. The first was Arthur Berger's Quartet in C major for Woodwinds, the other Mel Powell's Divertimento for Five Winds. Doritt Anthony Dwyer, flute, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Harold Wright, clarinet, and Sherman Walt, bassoon, performed the Berger Quartet. They were joined by Armando Ghitalla, trumpet, for the Powell.

Berger, who is now Naumberg Professor of Music at Brandeis, wrote this Quartet, one of his best known works, thirty-one years ago. If it was considered unconventional in any way then, time has worn down its novelty. As played last Sunday, it was tame, easily assimilable, witty, charming music, in its lively movements suggesting some of the fresh jauntiness of Francaix and Poulenc, and in its middle lyrical movement presenting a haunting simple melody. Throughout the Quartet the writing for the instruments is most skillful and appropriate. It is a work that can justify many repeated hearings.

The same may be said for Powell's Divertimento. It, too, is jaunty and witty, sometimes saucy, with rhythms that are particularly strong. One would expect this from a composer who first made his fame as a jazzman before moving on to teaching composition, first at Yale and now at the California Institute of the Arts.

If the next concert in the series on February 27 keeps up the standard established by this one, put the date on your calendar. You won't regret it.

H.

GRANITE STATE
VACATIONER
LACONIA, N. H.
W. 30,000

FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Hopkins Center Music

Dartmouth & Milton Gill Series & Encounters

Feb 6—Boston Symphony Chamber Players, 3 p.m.

PETERBOROUGH LEDGER
JAFFREY, N. H.
W. 2,925

FEB 1 1972 N

BSO Chamber Players

HANOVER – An innovation in the Dartmouth Concert Series will be a Sunday afternoon program on Feb. 6 at 3 o'clock in Spaulding Auditorium. It will mark the first concert here by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and second concert on the current Dartmouth Series.

Make up of prinicpal players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this internationally known ensemble has performed in Europe and throughout the United States and reached untold numbers of listeners through their award-winning recordings.

The Chamber Players group varies from concert to concert, making it possible for the musicians to present virtuoso performances in a great variety of programs. In their Sunday afternoon performance here the members are concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violinist; principal violist Burton Fine; the four solo woodwind players: flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, clarinetist Harold Wright, bassoonist Sherman Walt, and oboist Ralph Gomberg.

Mr. Gomberg was singled out in headlines by all of the Boston critics for his performance of Haydn's Oboe Concerto with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra last weekend.

Their program begins with Walter Piston's "Three Pieces" for flute, clarinet and bassoon, followed by Beethoven's light-hearted "Serenade in D major" for flute, violin and viola.

After intermission the ensemble will perform Mozart's "Duo in B flat major" for violin and viola, and conclude with "Quartet" by the Brazilian Heitor Villa-Lobos.

In addition to playing with the Boston Symphony and on tour, members of the ensemble are also active asteachers, serving on the faculties of the New England Conservatory of Music, the Berkshire Music Center and others. With few exceptions they have had long associations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, who joined it in 1952, was the first woman to be engaged by the Boston Symphony as a principal.

Harold Wright, the most recent member, joined the Orchestra two years ago. He formerly played with the Houston and Dallas Symphonies, was principal clarinetist of the Washington National Symphony Orchestra, and participated in the Casals Festival for five years.

Among other awards, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein in 1959 was the only American to place in the top ten of the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition, and in 1960 he won the Walter W. Naumburg Award. He said recently, "I enjoy solo work, conducting and playing with the Orchestra, but most I enjoy working with the Chamber Players."

A former scientist, Burton Fine, violist, worked for nine years as a chemist before joining the Boston Orchestra in 1963, where his accomplishments soon placed him in the ranks of its principal players.

Ralph Gomberg, who was principal oboist in the Baltimore Symphony under Stokowski and in the New York City Center Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein, joined the Boston Symphony in 1949. Bassoonist Sherman Walt, who received his musical education at the University of Minnesota and the Curtis Institute, played as a principal in the Chicago Symphony before joining the Boston Orchestra in this role in 1952.

Tichets for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players concert are now on sale at the Hopkins Center Box Office. Reserved seats may be obtained by calling 646-2422.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 29 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players Popular

Variety Pleases Audiences

By HARRY NEVILLE

Judged on the evidence of their most recent concerts, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players have found a real home in Sanders Theater. Not only is their every concert there sold-out, but the people who attend make up as lively, affectionate and demonstrative an audience as an artist could wish.

A large part of this success comes no doubt from a "rush" ticket policy, a very sensible idea which provides for the last-minute sale of unbought seats at an extremely cheap price. All of which leads one to suspect that the much discussed "death" of the classical concert is a matter of over-pricing rather than under-appreciation.

WITH THE RESOURCES of 12 instrumentalists at their disposal, the Chamber Players can and generally do present an extremely diversified kind of programming. No doubt this diversity proves unsettling to listeners who insist that a program be logical, organic and integrated, but the people who show up at Sanders seem not to mind at all. They seem, in fact, to revel in the variety of the offerings.

Sunday afternoon's program was a good example: Mozart's "Kegelstatt" Trio (clarinet, viola and piano) and Schubert's "Trout" Quintet violin, viola, cello, double bass and piano), between which were sandwiched Donald Erb's Diversion for Two (percussion and trumpet) and Villa-Lobos' Quartet for Woodwinds (oboe, clarinet, flute and bassoon).

WHAT ERB'S DIVERSION had to do with the rest of the program I don't know, by which I mean that it didn't complement or illuminate the other works in a way that would satisfy purists. It did entertain, however, and that was justification enough for most people present. Its humor was broad and rather obvious, involving, for example, the visual joke of the executants' usurping of each other's musical territory: a brief slide - whistle performance by the percussionist, a solitary drum-tap delivered with improbable elegance by the trumpeter. All good-natured and all played with immense skill and zest by Everett Firth and Armando Ghitalla.

Slightly less exotic was the 1928 Woodwind Quartet of Villa-Lobos, a work which manages to be colorful and voluptuous despite its rather tight formal scheme. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Ralph Gomberg, Harold Wright and Sherman Walt took excellent advantage of the work's opportunities for solo display.

The "Trout" got an unhurried yet sparkling performance. Mozart's E-flat Trio, K. 498, was unhurried too but not very sparkling, mostly because of rather blurry articulation from pianist Gilbert Kalish.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 29 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO chamber group performs wide range

Bos Symphony

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

BSO Chamber Players did their next-to-last concert of the season Sunday afternoon in Sanders Theatre, and it was to my mind a more successful one than some I've heard from this group. This was due partly to better programming, and partly to better playing.

The Mozart Trio for clarinet, viola, and piano is a hard work to put across to an audience — a quiet, unflashy piece, technically difficult in ways not obvious to the average listener. It's not at all one of Mozart's witty pieces, easily enjoyable on that level, that some of the audience seemed to expect. (A lady near me whispered to her husband after the first movement, "That's awful.") But it wasn't awful, just perhaps more subdued even than it was intended to be, and in some spots a bit empty for my taste. Burton Fine's playing was adequate, though not terribly moving and also simply not loud enough — he was buried sometimes by the pianist, Gilbert Kalish. Harold Wright has an enormous dynamic range and a beautiful sound — his pianissimos are almost so soft as not to be heard, but still amazingly warm and vibrant.

The Mozart was followed by what must be its opposite, a piece by Donald Erb called "Diversion for Two," the two here being Everett Firth on percussion and Armando Ghitalla on trumpet. I didn't really take to it at first, but it soon began to be a great lot of fun — Firth danced wildly among all those different things to beat on, and that was exciting not only for the sounds that came out, but also visually. The last movement (trumpet and tympani) required from him some very fancy footwork (and earwork) in fast tuning.

A woodwind quartet of Villa-Lobos came next, one of those pieces made out of little rhythmic figures overlapping and alternating, lots of speedy scales and arpeggios. The group sounded a lot tighter than it has on other occasions, with more care and attention given to entrances and exits. There were some quite lovely moments in the slow movement — Sherman Walt's bassoon solo for one, beginning high and with very long lines, over a sort of watery moving accompaniment.

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 38,589

MAR 15 1972

Boston Chamber Players Exciting

By Donald Sosin
(News Music Reviewer)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform in Hill Auditorium tonight, and if the concert in Rackham last night by the group's first-chair players is any indication, it should be an exciting evening.

The University Musical Society is sponsoring both concerts. Last evening we heard the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in two quartets and two trios. Danzi's Quartet for Bassoon and Strings in B flat, Op. 40 opened the program. It is an 18th century trifle, but sounded more substantial in the expert hands of Sherman Walt, Joseph Silverstein, Burton Fine and Jules Eskin.

This was followed by Schoenberg's String Trio, Op. 45, dating from 1946. As Schoenberg's 12-tone style grew more complex, he began to look for ways to keep his music comprehensible. Thus one hears in the trio echoes of earlier works, even more surprisingly lush harmonies along with the terse phrases and jagged lines that make up much of the piece. Repetition, which Schoenberg had so painstakingly avoided in earlier works like "Erwartung," give the listener something to hang on to here. The trio is in three parts with two episodes between. The first part and episode are repeated in the last part with some changes; other than this, though, sections seem arranged in a haphazard fashion; Schoenberg knew how to handle pitches all right, but in creating new forms he was no match for Webern, his disciple. Still, the work has drama and expressivity, and progresses in slow stages to the tranquil ending. The musicians had hardly finished when someone up front shouted, "Bravo!" Could it be the same connoisseum who, last year at the Guarneri Quartet recital, began the applause within a split second of the conclusion of Webern's Six Bagatelles?"

The trio returned to perform Beethoven's String Trio in C minor, Op. 9, No. 3. Coming halfway between the piano trios of Op. 1 and the quartets of Op. 18, this trio seems to contain elements of both, as far as rhythmic and melodic ideas go. Beethoven is at his best in the Scherzo and Finale, with lightning interplay among the instruments, but the Adagio is not without its charm. It was somewhat marred by the sound of woodwinds which drifted up from beneath the stage, as the other members of the ensemble warmed up for the concluding work.

Although this did not carry back to where I was sitting, those up front and those onstage heard it well enough; the group was about to begin the Scherzo when Mr. Eskin suggested that something be done. Mr. Silverstein rose and walked offstage, and the audience clearly heard him shout, "This is a string trio." Amid much laughter, he regained his seat, shrugged his shoulders and the trio lashed into the next movement, playing better than they had all evening.

Finally, the woodwinds had their turn, as they did their best with Villa-Lobos' "Quatuor for Woodwinds." But the work is rather dull and academic, and lacks the Brazilian flavor that makes his Quintette so appealing, and the lines that distinguish the Bachianas Brasileras. Like works of other self-taught composers, the quartet quickly develops its own cliches, and cannot break away from them.

Doriot Dwyer, Ralph Gomberg, Harold Wright and Sherman Walt were the performers.

Throughout the evening, the playing was characterized by great attention to details, and never lacked in exuberance. One could quibble about a few notes, and some rather imprecise rhythms in the Schoenberg, but in general the group lived up to its reputation as one of the finest chamber ensembles around. For those that missed the concert (why were there any empty seats, are people afraid of Schoenberg?) there are a number of excellent recordings on RCA and DGG.

And of course, there is another chance to hear the musicians as they join their colleagues in a program of Wagner, Hindemith anl Brahms under the direction of William Steinberg. Admittedly there is a lot to do in Ann Arbor this week, but the BSO is among the world's best orchestras, and should not be missed.

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373

MAR 15 1972

Full Orchestra Concert Tonight

Boston Symphony Principals Draw Music Critic's Praise

By JAMES E. HARVEY
Journal Music Critic

ANN ARBOR — It was not the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was the principals of the thing.

The orchestra's turn will come tonight in Hill Auditorium. Tuesday evening in Rackham hall seven of the orchestra's first-chair virtuosos performed quartets and trios by Danzi, Schoenberg, Beethoven, and Villa-Lobos.

The largest part of the program was occupied by a string trio which flanked the intermission with Schoenberg's string trio, op. 45, and Beethoven's Op 9, no. 3.

It consisted of Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello.

The works it played may be thought of as lying at opposite ends of romanticism. The difficult Schoenberg seems to throw disparate elements together in rapid succession, yet the Viennese heritage of sentimental waltzes and rhapsodic invention may be glimpsed.

The Beethoven is an early work that shows the composer confidently emerging from the classical style which preceded romanticism. Its rich texture is woven from a very sensible development of its themes.

The Bostonians, led by that silken Silverstein tone, made the work as spacious and lively as possible, with parts of the scherzo darting like tongues of flame. Silverstein's refined playing worked special magic with the graceful adagio movement.

The trio was joined by bassoonist Sherman Walt in Danzi's quartet for basoon and strings in B flat, Op. 40. The musicians were almost carefree in their interpretation of the light-hearted work. They took the final allegretto rather fast to emphasize the playfulness of its nursery-tune-like theme, for instance.

Walt, whose warm, steady playing enlivened the Danzi, was heard in the concert's final work, Villa-Lobos's quartet for woodwinds. He was joined by Doriot Dwyer, flute, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Harold Wright, clarinet.

The composer's typically nimble rhythmic writing got precise, robust treatment from the quartet. The rippling texture of the first movement was complemented by the contrapuntal dancing of the last. The slow middle movement seemed to be searching for a good melody, but it was sweetly played nonetheless.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 29 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players Popular

Variety Pleases Audiences

By HARRY NEVILLE

Judged on the evidence of their most recent concerts, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players have found a real home in Sanders Theater. Not only is their every concert there sold-out, but the people who attend make up as lively, affectionate and demonstrative an audience as an artist could wish.

A large part of this success comes no doubt from a "rush" ticket policy, a very sensible idea which provides for the last-minute sale of unbought seats at an extremely cheap price. All of which leads one to suspect that the much discussed "death" of the classical concert is a matter of over-pricing rather than under-appreciation.

WITH THE RESOURCES of 12 instrumentalists at their disposal, the Chamber Players can and generally do present an extremely diversified kind of programming. No doubt this diversity proves unsettling to listeners who insist that a program be logical, organic and integrated, but the people who show up at Sanders seem not to mind at all. They seem, in fact, to revel in the variety of the offerings.

Sunday afternoon's program was a good example: Mozart's "Kegelstatt" Trio (clarinet, viola and piano) and Schubert's "Trout" Quintet violin, viola, cello, double bass and piano), between which were sandwiched Donald Erb's Diversion for Two (percussion and trumpet) and Villa-Lobos' Quartet for Woodwinds (oboe, clarinet, flute and bassoon).

WHAT ERB'S DIVERSION had to do with the rest of the program I don't know, by which I mean that it didn't complement or illuminate the other works in a way that would satisfy purists. It did entertain, however, and that was justification enough for most people present. Its humor was broad and rather obvious, involving, for example, the visual joke of the executants' usurping of each other's musical territory: a brief slide - whistle performance by the percussionist, a solitary drum-tap delivered with improbable elegance by the trumpeter. All good-natured and all played with immense skill and zest by Everett Firth and Armando Ghitalla.

Slightly less exotic was the 1928 Woodwind Quartet of Villa-Lobos, a work which manages to be colorful and voluptuous despite its rather tight formal scheme. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Ralph Gomberg, Harold Wright and Sherman Walt took excellent advantage of the work's opportunities for solo display.

The "Trout" got an unhurried yet sparkling performance. Mozart's E-flat Trio, K. 498, was unhurried too but not very sparkling, mostly because of rather blurry articulation from pianist Gilbert Kalish.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 29 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO chamber group performs wide range

Bos Symphony

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

BSO Chamber Players did their next-to-last concert of the season Sunday afternoon in Sanders Theatre, and it was to my mind a more successful one than some I've heard from this group. This was due partly to better programming, and partly to better playing.

The Mozart Trio for clarinet, viola, and piano is a hard work to put across to an audience — a quiet, unflashy piece, technically difficult in ways not obvious to the average listener. It's not at all one of Mozart's witty pieces, easily enjoyable on that level, that some of the audience seemed to expect. (A lady near me whispered to her husband after the first movement, "That's awful.") But it wasn't awful, just perhaps more subdued even than it was intended to be, and in some spots a bit empty for my taste. Burton Fine's playing was adequate, though not terribly moving and also simply not loud enough — he was buried sometimes by the pianist, Gilbert Kalish. Harold Wright has an enormous dynamic range and a beautiful sound — his pianissimos are almost so soft as not to be heard, but still amazingly warm and vibrant.

The Mozart was followed by what must be its opposite, a piece by Donald Erb called "Diversion for Two," the two here being Everett Firth on percussion and Armando Ghitalla on trumpet. I didn't really take to it at first, but it soon began to be a great lot of fun — Firth danced wildly among all those different things to beat on, and that was exciting not only for the sounds that came out, but also visually. The last movement (trumpet and tympani) required from him some very fancy footwork (and earwork) in fast tuning.

A woodwind quartet of Villa-Lobos came next, one of those pieces made out of little rhythmic figures overlapping and alternating, lots of speedy scales and arpeggios. The group sounded a lot tighter than it has on other occasions, with more care and attention given to entrances and exits. There were some quite lovely moments in the slow movement — Sherman Walt's bassoon solo for one, beginning high and with very long lines, over a sort of watery moving accompaniment.

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 33,589

MAR 15 1972

Boston Chamber Players Exciting

By Donald Sosin
(News Music Reviewer)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform in Hill Auditorium tonight, and if the concert in Rackham last night by the group's first-chair players is any indication, it should be an exciting evening.

The University Musical Society is sponsoring both concerts. Last evening we heard the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in two quartets and two trios. Danzi's Quartet for Bassoon and Strings in B flat, Op. 40 opened the program. It is an 18th century trifle, but sounded more substantial in the expert hands of Sherman Walt, Joseph Silverstein, Burton Fine and Jules Eskin.

This was followed by Schoenberg's String Trio, Op. 45, dating from 1946. As Schoenberg's 12-tone style grew more complex, he began to look for ways to keep his music comprehensible. Thus one hears in the trio echoes of earlier works, even more surprisingly lush harmonies along with the terse phrases and jagged lines that make up much of the piece. Repetition, which Schoenberg had so painstakingly avoided in earlier works like "Erwartung," give the listener something to hang on to here. The trio is in three parts with two episodes between. The first part and episode are repeated in the last part with some changes; other than this, though, sections seem arranged in a haphazard fashion; Schoenberg knew how to handle pitches all right, but in creating new forms he was no match for Webern, his disciple. Still, the work has drama and expressivity, and progresses in slow stages to the tranquil ending. The musicians had hardly finished when someone up front shouted, "Bravo!" Could it be the same connoisseum who, last year at the Guarneri Quartet recital, began the applause within a split second of the conclusion of Webern's Six Bagatelles?"

The trio returned to perform Beethoven's String Trio in C minor, Op. 9, No. 3. Coming halfway between the piano trios of Op. 1 and the quartets of Op. 18, this trio seems to contain elements of both, as far as rhythmic and melodic ideas go. Beethoven is at his best in the Scherzo and Finale, with lightning interplay among the instruments, but the Adagio is not without its charm. It was somewhat marred by the sound of woodwinds which drifted up from beneath the stage, as the other members of the ensemble warmed up for the concluding work.

Although this did not carry back to where I was sitting, those up front and those onstage heard it well enough; the group was about to begin the Scherzo when Mr. Eskin suggested that something be done. Mr. Silverstein rose and walked offstage, and the audience clearly heard him shout, "This is a string trio." Amid much laughter, he regained his seat, shrugged his shoulders and the trio lashed into the next movement, playing better than they had all evening.

Finally, the woodwinds had their turn, as they did their best with Villa-Lobos' "Quatuor for Woodwinds." But the work is rather dull and academic, and lacks the Brazilian flavor that makes his Quintette so appealing, and the lines that distinguish the Bachianas Brasileras. Like works of other self-taught composers, the quartet quickly develops its own cliches, and cannot break away from them.

Doriot Dwyer, Ralph Gomberg, Harold Wright and Sherman Walt were the performers.

Throughout the evening, the playing was characterized by great attention to details, and never lacked in exuberance. One could quibble about a few notes, and some rather imprecise rhythms in the Schoenberg, but in general the group lived up to its reputation as one of the finest chamber ensembles around. For those that missed the concert (why were there any empty seats, are people afraid of Schoenberg?) there are a number of excellent recordings on RCA and DGG.

And of course, there is another chance to hear the musicians as they join their colleagues in a program of Wagner, Hindemith anl Brahms under the direction of William Steinberg. Admittedly there is a lot to do in Ann Arbor this week, but the BSO is among the world's best orchestras, and should not be missed.

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373

MAR 15 1972

Full Orchestra Concert Tonight

Boston Symphony Principals Draw Music Critic's Praise

By JAMES E. HARVEY
Journal Music Critic

ANN ARBOR — It was not the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was the principals of the thing.

The orchestra's turn will come tonight in Hill Auditorium. Tuesday evening in Rackham hall seven of the orchestra's first-chair virtuosos performed quartets and trios by Danzi, Schoenberg, Beethoven, and Villa-Lobos.

The largest part of the program was occupied by a string trio which flanked the intermission with Schoenberg's string trio, op. 45, and Beethoven's Op 9, no. 3.

It consisted of Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello.

The works it played may be thought of as lying at opposite ends of romanticism. The difficult Schoenberg seems to throw disparate elements together in rapid succession, yet the Viennese heritage of sentimental waltzes and rhapsodic invention may be glimpsed.

The Beethoven is an early work that shows the composer confidently emerging from the classical style which preceded romanticism. Its rich texture is woven from a very sensible development of its themes.

The Bostonians, led by that silken Silverstein tone, made the work as spacious and lively as possible, with parts of the scherzo darting like tongues of flame. Silverstein's refined playing worked special magic with the graceful adagio movement.

The trio was joined by bassoonist Sherman Walt in Danzi's quartet for basoon and strings in B flat, Op. 40. The musicians were almost carefree in their interpretation of the light-hearted work. They took the final allegretto rather fast to emphasize the playfulness of its nursery-tune-like theme, for instance.

Walt, whose warm, steady playing enlivened the Danzi, was heard in the concert's final work, Villa-Lobos's quartet for woodwinds. He was joined by Doriot Dwyer, flute, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Harold Wright, clarinet.

The composer's typically nimble rhythmic writing got precise, robust treatment from the quartet. The rippling texture of the first movement was complemented by the contrapuntal dancing of the last. The slow middle movement seemed to be searching for a good melody, but it was sweetly played nonetheless.

a 20th century masterpiece...
Olivier Messiaen's
QUARTET FOR THE END OF TIME

"I saw a mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud, and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as if it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire. He lifted up his hand to heaven, saying: THERE SHALL BE TIME NO LONGER: but in the days of the trumpet of the seventh angel, the mystery of God shall be finished."
The Revelation of St. John, X 1-7

the boston symphony Chamber Players
Principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
Gilbert Kalish, guest pianist
Sanders Theatre Series
April 16
4:00 pm
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Michael Haydn Divertimento for oboe, bassoon, violin, viola and bass
Boris Blacher Trio for trumpet, trombone and piano
Ingolf Dahl Duettino Concertante for flute and percussion
Olivier Messiaen Quartet for the end of time, for clarinet, violin, cello and piano
Tickets: $1.50, $2.50, $3.50
Available at Symphony Hall (266-0150) or (266-1492), Harvard Coop, and B.U. Ticket Office; and at Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on the day of the concert.

Sunday
april 16
4 p.m.

A limited number of rush seats at 50¢ will be available at Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, from 2:30 to 3:30 on the day of the concert

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032

APR 17 1972

New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

BSO chamber group plays Messiaen

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

When people who are basically orchestra musicians sit down to play an afternoon of chamber music, there are probably two possible outcomes. First they may be tired of playing orchestra concerts for weeks and finally enjoy a couple of hours of music that's maybe a little more rewarding than orchestral parts.

Secondly, they may treat it like just another job. Too often, I've gotten this second feeling at concerts given by Boston Symphony Orchestra, (BSO) Chamber Players, and I think it's a shame.

The big piece on yesterday's program, and the one that may have brought most of the small audience there in the first place, was Oliver Messiaen's "Quartet for the End of Time," scored for violin, clarinet, cello, and piano. What a weird piece, birdsongs and the Angel of the Apolcalypse, full of mysticism and fevered dreams — some of its strangeness and fantasy must have come from the fact that Messiaen wrote it while in a prison camp.

The quartet is a long and very beautiful piece, divided into eight parts related by similar rhythms, harmonies, and moods. Much of the music is very slow, painfully slow, "Infinitely Slow," the notes incredibly long and sustained. Yes, it's tough and sometimes very near impossible to glue them into an understandable line, but it can be done without sounding like a strangled exercise in bow control. This is one of the two things that bothered me most in the porformance — much more than the ragged ensemble, imprecise rhythms and frazzled ends on notes and phrases — this tiredness and unwillingness to work at making those incredibly long notes into a shape that means something, instead of letting them drag in heavy endless chains.

The other was the sense of timing throughout the piece. The among the silence required between movements is a very delicate problem: some movements want to come almost immediately after the one before, and some need time to set them off (time that carries tension) — but there just aren't any that need relaxed intermissions like the length of the ones we were offered. What can sustain a piece that ends seven times before it ends?

Joseph Silverstein, Harold Wright, Jules Eskin, and Gilbert Kalish were the players.

The first half of the program was fairly uninspired: a trumpet, trombone, and piano trio by Boris Blacher; Duettino Concertante for flute and percussion, by Ingolf Dahl; and a mildly interesting Divertimento written for pairs of strings and winds and double-bass. This funny little piece by Michael Haydn began the concert, and the Trio of its Menuett was one of the few passages the musicians seemed to enjoy playing.

24 A BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER, TUESDAY, APRIL 18,

Quartet Performs Messiaen Concert

By HARRY NEVILLE

Student vacations deprived the Boston Symphony Chamber Players of the group's customary full-house Sunday afternoon in Sanders Theater. The vacations also deprived the students of the pleasure of hearing what must have been one of the finest performances this group has given—that of Messiaen's "Quartet for the End of Time" as played by violinist Joseph Silverstein, clarinetist Harold Wright, cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Gilbert Kalish.

THE QUARTET was conceived and written during the early 1940s, when the composer was imprisoned in a German concentration camp. In describing the painful circumstances of its composition, Messiaen has said that it was a time when, as a result of lack of nourishment, he was much given to dreaming in color; hence the vivid colors he cites as the inspiration of some of the music.

But the principal image in the composer's mind was the figure of the angel who announces the end of time, from the Apocalypse of St. JoJan. Messiaen has noted that he was concerned not so much with the cataclysmic as with the serene aspects of Apocalypse, with the "silences of adoration and marvelous visions of peace."

THE PARTS of the quartet that deal with these tranquil visions are altogether extraordinary in their power to suggest a mystical quiet and serenity—at least they were so as performed by these artists. I have in mind the long solo movements for cello, clarinet and violin, of which Eskin, Wright and Silverstein gave as moving and sensitive accounts as this listener has heard.

The quartet suffered somewhat from the works played during the first half of the program: a rather tedious and banal divertimento by Michael Haydn and an exceedingly perfunctory trio for trumphet, trombone and piano by Boris Blacher. Ingolf Dahl's Duettino Concertante for flute (Doriot Anthony Dwyer) and percussion (Everett Firth), however, was a delight—droll, witty and excellently played as well.

[82]

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JUN 4 1972

New England Newsclip

Selection of BSO performers not really secret assignment

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Once the wife of a conductor who had been unable to land a guest engagement with the Boston Symphony complained to me about what she saw as the exceedingly cabalistic way in which such arrangements were made in Symphony Hall: "You can't even find out who is responsible. All I know is that it's somebody who operates under the cover name of Mary Smith."

The person in Symphony Hall who operates under the name of Mary Smith is in fact Mary Smith, and her title is Assistant Manager for Concerts and Artists. This is her third Symphony Hall incarnation, the series, interspersed with posts in music management in New York, having begun in 1949, when she was fresh out of Radcliffe and went to work as assistant to the late John Burk, best remembered as writer of program notes, but then also in charge of the orchestra's press office.

Her present post, about which she says that it is "like being a producer," evolved from a later position in the office of the orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr. She found herself more and more involved in problems related to schedule-making, and one day Perry, to her shock, took her up on her suggestion that what she was doing was enough of a job to warrant being a separate one.

The central piece of Miss Smith's job as the Boston Symphony's "producer" is the calendar. She starts from a blank year from the end of September, when the Boston season starts, to August 20-something, which is when Tanglewood ends, and into that blank she has to fill all of the orchestra's dates. It begins with the regular Friday-Saturday subscription series, allowing the proper spaces for the orchestra's five trips to New York, for the new Spectrum series, and for a Christmas vacation. Then come the various shorter series on Tuesdays and Thursdays, which go from three to ten concerts, and which must be placed so that there is a reasonable semblance of regularity for subscribers. Pops (whose details are managed not by Miss Smith, but directly out of Arthur Fiedler's office) and Tanglewood are plain blocks of time, in themselves quite simple to drop into the calendar.

'You can't even find out who is responsible. All I know is that it's somebody who operates under cover name of Mary Smith'

Disappointed wife of unselected conductor.

Next, the calendar must be populated. First, the Music Director: how many weeks will he conduct, and how are they to be distributed (the first of the questions is of course part of his contractual arrangement with the trustees, the second involves the assumption that he will open and close the season). Then (with the same questions), Associate Conductor, Principal Guest Conductors, or whatever. Finally the other guest conductors.

How are guest conductors chosen? That, according to Miss Smith, is a fluid, fairly complex process. The trustees have people they are interested in, whom they have heard with the BSO or elsewhere, have read or heard about, and they communicate their wishes to the manager, perhaps with some priorities suggested. How much say the Music Director has on that subject depends on how strong a boss he is and on the state of repair of his relations with the trustees. Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, with whom the BSO now has an exclusive recording contract, is interested in having some of its other conductors like Abbado and Kubelik make records with the orchestra, and will accordingly also "make suggestions" as they also do about soloists. Miss Smith points out that the whole guest conductor scene will be somewhat different now that for the first time in some years the BSO is not shopping for a Music Director: in the past few years, most of the guests who have passed across the Symphony Hall podium (with obvious exceptions, like retired Music Directors) have done so as potential candidates.

Miss Smith gets the news from Perry, and then, armed with her list, starts to work with managers to determine which of the desired conductors are available for which of the open dates. Her job is not easy because the BSO is notoriously slow — "we're a very conservative organization" — making up its mind late, booking conductors for 1972-73 when most comparable institutions have already got their 1973-74 schedules drawn up. For that reason, some conductors — Mehta and Solti were two names mentioned here — are in effect permanently unavailable to the BSO, and Miss Smith, hopes that some day the pace will be not quite so conservative.

Occasionally the trustees will express interest in engaging a particular soloist - the young Jamaican pianist, Nerine Barrett, is an example — but generally soloists are chosen by the conductors. The BSO's policy on soloists is unlike that of other top orchestras: it allocates a far smaller percentage of the budget to them, has not nearly so many of them, and, by and large, very few big names. The assumption — musically it is exceedingly questionable — is that what the orchestra does in a concerto is "accompany," that an orchestra's participation in a concerto is to some degree a degrading activity (subscribers have sometimes offered the same complaint about choral works like Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and the Verdi Requiem). "Also," added Miss Smith, "when we tour, People don't want to hear a soloist, they want to hear the Boston Symphony." "A combination of snobbery and avarice?" I asked. "Yes," said Miss Smith.

"If it can be worked out, we give conductors the soloists they want," she continued — even if the request is as unusual as Colin Davis's last season to have the pianist Stephen Bishop on two consecutive Friday-Saturday pairs. Most often, the conductor asks for a soloist, then chooses from whatever repertory he or she offers for that season. If, like Andre Watts, he travels wtih only one concerto each season, the choice becomes easier, but the program-building harder. Occasionally, though, a conductor will start with a work, then try to find the appropriate soloist for it, which may take the form of a specific "see if X is available, and if not, Y," or a vaguer "find me a big-name violinist for the Beethoven," which was more or less the message from William Steinberg that Miss Smith was dealing with the day of our conversation (see adjoining story for the outcome).

Miss Smith is careful to dispel the idea that she is in a position of power. Keeping informed by going to concerts, through professional contacts all over the country, "even reading some critics," she makes suggestions to the Manager, rarely if ever directly to a conductor, but neither pursues nor insists. The closest she comes to making choices of her own is when someone drops out and a substitute needs to be quickly engaged: then she will report back with "K is free, is that all right?" Vocal music is what she knows most about, and singers are the performers about whom she is most apt to trust her own judgment.

As for programs, they must be not only cleared with the Music Director but also coordinated through Miss Smith's office in case of duplication. "We get runs on things. Last season three conductors wanted to do the Mahler 6th, and four Stravinsky's 'Sacre.'" Both problems were automatically resolved because one of the conductors was the Music Director.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JUN 4 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO's '73 guests, programs

The 1972-73 Boston Symphony season is still in the works. Here, however, is a list of conductors (in order of their appearance) and some advance program information:

Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductor, opens the season with an American program including Ives's "Robert Browning Overture," the world premiere of Piston's Flute Concerto (Doriot Anthony Dwyer), and Copland's Symphony No.3.

William Steinberg, retired Music Director, will have programs including the Verdi, Requiem, Mahler's Symphony No. 2 (Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum), Piano Concerto No. 2 in G minor by Saint-Saens (Theodore Letvin), and the Beethoven Violin Concerto (Ruggiero Ricci).

Colin Davis, Principal Guest Condustor: Berlioz's "Te Deum" (Tanglewood Festival Chorus) and "Nuits d'ete" (Janet Baker), Elgar's Violin Concerto (Joseph Silverstein), and Wagner's Wesendonk Songs (Jessye Norman).

Daniel Barenboim: Bruckner's 9th Symphony.

Leonard Bernstein: Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet", Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta, and Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex."

Claudio Abbado: no program information available.

Seiji Ozawa, Music Adviser, Music Director-elect: his single program will consist of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" and its rarely heard sequel, "Lelio."

Lorin Maazel: Beethoven's Piano Concerto No.4 (Vladimir Ashkenazy) and Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No.3 (Israela Margalit, who is Mrs. Maazel).

Bernard Haitink: a Mozart Piano Concerto (Nerine Barrett).

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

JUN 8 1972

New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA, 36, conductor of the Boston and San Francisco symphonies, started officials at the imperial court in Japan by interrupting a formal ceremony to ask the emperor to save the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra from bankruptcy.

EMPEROR HIROHITO, 72, who speaks only to persons only when arrangements are made in advance by chamberlains, nodded and smiled but gave Ozawa no reply. The event, front-page news in Tokyo newspapers today, took place during a ceremony in which Ozawa and nine other artists received awards from the Japan Art Academy in a hall in Ueno, Tokyo's largest park.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032

JUN 8 1972

New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JUN 9 1972

New England Newsclip

Asks Hirohito for funds

Ozawa hits sour note on protocol

United Press International

TOKYO—Japan's best known symphony conductor broke imperial court protocol Wednesday by appearing before Emperor Hirohito in mod dress and asking the Mikado for financial help.

Seiji Ozawa, 36, conductor of the Boston and San Francisco symphonies, startled court officials by interrupting a formal ceremony to ask the emperor to save the Japan Philharmonic Symphony orchestra from bankruptcy.

(Ozawa was appointed to the BSO musical post last February. He has had a close feeling for the BSO ever since he first heard it in Japan in 1957 under Charles Munch.

(Along with Gunther Schuller, Ozawa has served as artistic director of the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood program since 1970. He will open the season there again this year on June 30.

(Munch first brought Ozawa to America in 1960 to attend the 1960 session of the Berkshire Music Center and in that year he won the Koussevitzky Prize.

(When his appointment with the BSO was announced last February, Ozawa told newsmen he was "very excited and very happy at the prospect of making music on the highest level in the musical world.")

Hirohito, 72, who speaks only to persons arranged in advance by chamberlains, nodded and smiled but gave Ozawa no reply.

The happening, front page news in Tokyo newspapers today, took place during a ceremony in which Ozawa and nine other artists received awards from the Japan Art Academy in a hall in Ueno, Tokyo's biggest park.

Ozawa attended the ceremony wearing a white turtleneck sweater, rehearsal jacket, tight trousers and oversized sunglasses. The other winners dressed according to court tradition in cutaway coats and striped trousers or formal kimono.

After receiving his award and with Prime Minister E Isaku Sato watching, Ozawa suddenly turned towards the emperor, who was seated alone on a low platform behind a table, bowed and said:

"Your Majesty, a sad thing has happened in the realm of music. The Japan Philharmonic Orchestra has gone bankrupt. I think it is time that a government-backed orchestra be formed. Could you tell someone to save the orchestra, your Majesty?"

Ozawa conducts the Japan Symphony as well as orchestras in the United States. Fuki Television Co., sponsors of the Japan Philharmonic, has announced withdrawal of financial support.

Protocol in Japan's Chrysanthemum Court prescribes that no commoner should address the Mikado unless he speaks to them first with a question.

The Japanese court, which traces its history back to 660 B.C., keeps the emperor far more aloof than European royalty.

Japanese newsmen asked Ozawa later why he spoke to Hirohito without invitation.

"I have heard that the emperor is an art-minded person," the conductor said. "Why should we not ask him to help us solve our problems? We should try to understand the emperor. It is not good to let him stand alone away from the public."

TIMES
WOBURN, MASS.

JUN 8 1972

New England Newscli

Conductor Appears Before Emperor In Mod Dress

TOKYO (UPI) — Japan's best known symphony conductor broke imperial court protocol Wednesday by appearing before Emperor Hirohito in mod dress and asking the Mikado for financial help.

Seiji Ozawa, 36, conductor of the Boston and San Francisco symphonies, startled court officials by interupting a formal ceremony to ask the emperor to save the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra from bankruptcy.

Hirohito, 72, who speaks only to persons aranged in advance by chamberlains, nodded and smiled but gave Ozawa no reply.

The happening, frontpage news in Tokyo newspapers today, took place during a ceremony in which Ozawa and nine other artists received awards from the Japan Art Academy in a hall in Ueno, Tokyo's biggest park.

Ozawa attended the ceremony wearing a white turtleneck sweater, rehearsal jacket, tight trousers and oversized sunglasses. The other winners dressed according to court tradition in cutaway coats and striped trousers or formal kimono.

After receiving his award and with Prime Minister Eisaku Sato watching, Ozawa suddenly turned towards the emperor, who was seated alone on a low platform behind a table, bowed and said:

"Your Majesty, a sad thing has happened in the realm of music. The Japan Philharmonic Orchestra has gone bankrupt. I think it is time that a government - backed orchestra be formed. Could you tell someone to save the orchestra, your majesty?"

Ozawa conducts the Japan Symphony as well as orchestras in the United States. Fuki Television Co., sponsors of the Japan Philharmonic, has announced withdrawal of financial support.

Protocol in Japan's Chrysanthemum Court prescribes that no commoner should address the Mikado unless he speaks to them first with a question.

The Japanese court, which traces its history back to 660 B.C., keeps the emperor far more aloof than European royalty.

Japanese newsmen asked Ozawa later why he spoke to Hirohito without invitation.

"I have heard that the emperor is an art - minded person," the conductor said. 'Why should we not ask him to help us solve our problems? We should try to understand the emperor. It is not good to let him stand alone away from the public."

SEIJA OZAWA
. . . broke protocol

EMPEROR HIROHITO
. . . no reply

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUN 9 1972

New England Newsclip

UPI

MOD CONDUCTOR Seiji Ozawa walks past Hirohito with award.

Hirohito Misses Cue By Off-Key Ozawa

TOKYO—A mod symphony conductor tried a mod approach to imperial protocol yesterday in an attempt to save his orchestra from bankruptcy.

The jarring note in Emperor Hirohito's court had distant overtones in Boston and Lenox, Mass.

Seiji Ozawa, 36, conductor of the Boston and San Francisco symphonies, startled court officials by asking the Mikado to save the Japan Philharmonic Symphony from financial distress. In mod dress, he broke court protocol by interrupting a ceremony during which the emperor was presiding over the presentation of awards to 10 Japanese artists, including Ozawa.

* * * *

Ozawa in February was appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective in fall 1973. He has had a close feeling for the BSO ever since he first heard it in Japan in 1957 under Charles Munch.

Along with Gunther Schuller, Ozawa has served as artistic director of the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood program in Lenox since 1970. He will open the season there again June 30.

Munch first brought Ozawa to America to attend the 1960 session of the Berkshire Music Center and in that year he won the Koussevitzky prize.

Hirohito, 72, who speaks only to persons arranged in advance by chamberlains, nodded and smiled but gave Ozawa no reply.

The happening, front-page news in Tokyo newspapers yesterday, took place during a ceremony in which Ozawa and the nine other artists received awards from the Japan Art Academy in a hall in Ueno, Tokyo's biggest park.

Ozawa attended the ceremony wearing a white turtleneck sweater, rehearsal jacket, tight trousers and oversized sunglasses—attire in which he commonly appears on the Tanglewood podium. The other winners dressed according to court tradition in cutaway coats and striped trousers or formal kimono.

After receiving his award and with Prime Minister Eisaku Sato watching, Ozawa suddenly turned toward the emperor, who was seated alone on a low platform behind a table. He bowed and said:

"Your Majesty, a sad thing has happened in the realm of music. The Japan Philharmonic Orchestra has gone bankrupt. I think it is time that a government-backed orchestra be formed. Could you tell someone to save the orchestra, your Majesty?"

Ozawa conducts the Japan Symphony as well as orchestras in the United States. Fuki Television Co., sponsors of the Japan Philharmonic, has announced withdrawal of financial support.

* * * *

Protocol in Japan's Chrysanthemum Court prescribes that no commoner should address the Mikado unless he speaks first with a question.

The Japanese court, which traces its history back to 660 B.C., keeps the emperor far more aloof than European royalty.

Japanese newsmen asked Ozawa later why he spoke to Hirohito without invitation.

"I have heard that the emperor is an art-minded person," the conductor said. "Why should we not ask him to help us solve our problems? We should try to understand the emperor. It is not good to let him stand alone away from the public."

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 149,649

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Two Symphony Posts?

San Francisco — (UPI) — Maestro SEIJI OZAWA has been offered a rare arrangement to head two of the country's most prominent symphonies.

Ozawa, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, was offered the helm of the Boston Symphony in an arrangement to be negotiated if he accepts.

Philip S. Boone, president of the San Francisco Symphony Association, said Ozawa appears for 14 weeks annually here in a contract that runs through the 1975-76 concert season.

"The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical, and a proper working arrangement could certainly be negotiated," Boone said.

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
D. 13,000

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,000

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.
D. 10,037

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Buffalo Evening News
D. 281,382 SAT. 297,247

FEB 2 1972

Hub Symphony Wants Ozawa

Boston Symphony offers baton to Seiji Ozawa

Ozawa Heads 2 Prominent Symphonies

Ozawa Offered Helm Of Two Symphonies

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 2 (UPI) — Maestro Seijo Ozawa has been offered a chance to head two of the country's most prominent symphonies.

Mr. Ozawa, popular conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, was offered the helm of the Boston Symphony in an arrangement to be negotiated if he accepts.

Philip S. Boone, president of the San Francisco Symphony Association, said: "The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical, and a proper working arrangement could certainly be negotiated."

He said Mr. Ozawa, currently conductor and musical director of the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo, was considering the proposal.

Mr. Ozawa

HAMILTON, CANADA
SPECTATOR
D. 127,922

FEB 2 1972

LONDON, CANADA
FREE PRESS
W. 71,428

FEB 2 1972

Boston offers Ozawa musical directorship

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — The president of the San Francisco Symphony Association said yesterday that Seiji Ozawa has been offered the musical directorship of the Boston Symphony in a plan that would put him at the helm of both orchestras.

Association president Philip Boone said Ozawa has made no decision on the Boston proposal.

OZAWA WAS for four years conductor of the Toronto Symphony, leaving in 1969.

Boone said San Francisco would not suffer if Ozawa decides to accept the Boston offer.

"Ozawa now appears for 14 weeks annually in San Francisco by contract, and the extent of this commitment would not diminish. The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical and a proper working arrangement could be negotiated.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 97,539

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Conductor Ozawa Is Offered Helm in Boston, San Francisco

Ozawa Offered Helm Of Two Symphonies

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Maestro Seiji Ozawa has been offered a rare arrangement — to head two of the country's most prominent symphonies.

Ozawa, popular conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, was offered the helm of the Boston Symphony in an arrangement to be negotiated if he accepts.

Philip S. Boone, president of the San Francisco Symphony Association, said Ozawa appears for 14 weeks annually here in a contract which runs through the 1975-76 concert season.

"The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical, and a proper working arrangement could certainly be negotiated," said Boone.

He said Ozawa, currently conductor and musical director of the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo, was considering the proposal.

laestro Seijo Ozawa has been to head two of the country's the San Francisco Symphony n of the Boston Symphony in negotiated if he accepts.

the San Francisco Symphony 's for 14 weeks annually here ugh the 1975-76 concert sea-sco symphony seasons are not identical, and a proper working arrangement could certainly be negotiated," Boone said.

He said Ozawa, currently conductor and musical director of the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo, was considering the proposal.

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
D. 8,500

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 90,000

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

CAPE COD STANDARD TIMES
HYANNIS, MASS.
D. 25,776

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Around the nation

Conductor offered new job

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Association, said Ozawa appears for 14 weeks annually here in a contract which runs through the 1975-76 concert season.

"The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical, and a proper working arrangement could certainly be negotiated," said Boone.

He said Ozawa, currently conductor and musical director of the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo, was considering the proposal.

Japanese Conductor May Head Hub And Frisco Symphonies

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Association, said Ozawa appears for 14 weeks annually here in a contract which runs through the 1975-76 concert season.

"The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical, and a proper working arrangement could certainly be negotiated," said Boone.

He said Ozawa, currently conductor and musical director of the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo, was considering the proposal.

Ozawa joins Boston Symphony

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — helm of the Boston Symphony which runs through the 1975-76

Calif. conductor Ozawa would have Boston post

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Maestro Seiji Ozawa has been offered a rare arrangement — to head two of the country's most prominent symphonies.

Ozawa, popular conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, was offered the helm of the Boston Symphony in an arrangement to be negotiated if he accepts.

Philip S. Boone, president of the San Francisco Symphony Association, said Ozawa appears for 14 weeks annually here in a contract which runs through the 1975-76 concert season.

"The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical, and a proper working arrangement could certainly be negotiated," said Boone.

He said Ozawa, currently conductor and musical director of the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo, was considering the proposal.

DAILY NEWS RECORD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 25,000

JAN 24 1972

PART-TIME JOB?: Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old wunderkind of musical world, will get at least piece of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor's post. Word Reaching BTL is that long search for successor to interim-conductor William Steinberg will hit on all-out unique solution: Several men, including Thomas, will share conductor's job. There is no official word on subject yet from BSO, which promises "important announcement" in few days Thomas was mum on subject. However, in recent interview with BTL he may have been alluding to conductor solution in works when he indicated he would remain in Boston for some time. He's currently associate conductor of orchestra.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

FEB 2 1972

New England Newsclip

'Frisco Symphony Conductor Offered Boston Baton, Too

SAN FRANCISCO — Seigi Ozawa, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been offered the Boston Symphony Orchestra job as well. The rare arrangement would put him at the helm of two of the country's most prominent orchestras.

Ozawa has been co-director, with Gunther Schuller, of the Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for two seasons.

Philip S. Boone, president of the San Francisco Symphony Association, said Ozawa is considering the proposal but has not made up his mind.

"At no time has there been a thought of Ozawa leaving San Francisco" even if he takes the Boston offer, Boone said.

Ozawa's San Francisco contract runs through the 1975-76 concert season.

The arrangement being discussed is not unknown in the musical world and Ozawa currently is conductor and musical director of the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo in addition to his San Francisco duties.

Boone said if Ozawa accepts the Boston proposal he might give up all other guest conducting assignments in North America.

"The discussions have been in complete harmony and San Francisco would hardly suffer by such an arrangement," Boone said.

"Ozawa now appears for 14 weeks annually in San Francisco by contract and the extent of this commitment would not diminish. The Boston and San Francisco Symphony seasons are not identical, and a proper working arrangement could certainly be negotiated," Boone said. "It would be a distinguished and honored opportunity for maestro Ozawa to lead two of America's greatest orchestras."

SEIJI OZAWA

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 2 1972

New Engla Newsc

Boston Symphony Ready To Make Offer To Ozawa

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra was scheduled to announce today the details of an arrangement by which conductor Seiji Ozawa will serve both the Boston orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony, of which he is currently music director.

No Details

A spokesman for the Boston organization confirmed today that the orchestra has made an offer to the 35-year-old Ozawa which would become effective on the resignation of 72-year-old William Steinberg as the orchestra's leader at the end of the present season.

The spokesman declined to give details of the offer until a press conference scheduled for 4 p.m. today. Ozawa, who has headed the San Francisco orchestra for the past two years and has been co-director of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood during the same period, was scheduled to make an announcement to the members of the San Francisco orchestra today.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 767,793 SUN. 1,016,275

FEB 2 1972

Seiji Ozawa, who will be named Boston music director today, conducts Chicago Symphony at Ravinia in 1968.

Mr. Ozawa to Be Boston Director

BY THOMAS WILLIS

● SEIJI OZAWA, the Japanese-born conductor who was a favorite of Ravinia Festival Chicago Symphony Orchestra audiences during his five years there as artistic director, will be named music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a press conference there today.

The appointment will take effect at the beginning of the 1973-74 season, and, according to an orchestra spokesman will be of "indefinite duration."

Ozawa will remain as music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra during the four and one half remaining years of his contract there. Next season, he also will hold the title of music advisor in Boston, and artistic director of the Berkshire Music Festival, summer residence of the Boston symphony.

Rumors that Ozawa was about to take the Boston post had been widespread in San Francisco early this week but were denied by the 35-year-old conductor. As the news broke late last night he was en route to San Francisco from New York City where he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra in Lincoln Center.

Ozawa, who served as music director at Ravinia from 1964 thru 1969, signed a contract in 1968 to conduct the San Francisco Orchestra beginning September, 1970, where he succeeded Josef Krips.

Music

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

FEB 2 1972

New England Newsclip

Whitestone

Conductor Ozawa and his wife at Tanglewood this past summer.

BSO Expected To Tap Ozawa as Director

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is expected to announce in a press conference today that 36-year-old Seiji Ozawa has accepted the post of director.

Ozawa, one of the most popular of the BSO guest conductors in recent years and codirector with Gunther Schuller of the Berkshire Music Center, is currently serving as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, and it is expected that he will continue in this capacity until the expiration of his contract in 1976. The seasons of the two orchestras do not coincide.

* * * *

Ozawa will be replacing William Steinberg, conductor of the Boston and Pittsburgh symphonies the past few years since Erich Leinsdorf resigned as BSO director. Steinberg is in his late 70s and has found it necessary to conserve his energies. It is assumed he will continue with the Pittsburgh orchestra, with which he has had a long association.

Ozawa's relationship with the BSO goes back to 1960, when he received a Koussevitzky memorial scholarship at the Berkshire Music Center as the outstanding young conductor of the season. He was then picked by Leonard Bernstein to be an assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and his career was launched.

* * * *

He has long been a favorite of both Boston and Tanglewood audiences, and is known to be liked and respected by the members of the Boston Symphony. He is also most popular in his native Japan. Music critic Jay Rosenfeld of The Eagle has characterized Ozawa's conducting as "exciting and charismatic."

Mr. and Mrs. Ozawa rent a home in Stockbridge for the summer. They recently became the parents of a daughter, their first child.

Ozawa offered new post

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — The president of the San Francisco Symphony Association says Seiji Ozawa has been offered the musical directership of the Boston Symphony in a plan that would put him at the helm of both orchestras.

Philip Boone said Tuesday Mr. Ozawa has made no decision yet on the Boston proposal.

Ozawa was for four years conductor of the Toronto Symphony, leaving it in 1969.

Boone said San Francisco would not suffer if Ozawa decides to accept the Boston offer.

"Ozawa now appears for 14 weeks annually in San Francisco by contract, and the extent of this commitment would not diminish. The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical and a proper working arrangement could be negotiated.

"It is my personal feeling that these negotiations will be consummated."

TORONTO, ONT., CANADA
GLOBE AND MAIL.
D. 267,540

FEB 4 1972

Ozawa may take reins of Boston Symphony

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — The president of the San Francisco Symphony Association said Tuesday that Seiji Ozawa has been offered the musical directorship of the Boston Symphony in a plan that would put him at the helm of both orchestras.

Association president Philip Boone said Ozawa has made no decision yet on the Boston proposal.

Ozawa was for four years conductor of the Toronto Symphony, leaving there in 1969.

Boone said San Francisco would not suffer if Ozawa decides to accept the offer.

"Ozawa now appears for 14 weeks annually in San Francisco by contract, and the extent of this commitment would not diminish. The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical and a proper working arrangement could be negotiated.

"It is my personal feeling that these negotiations will be consummated."

OTTAWA, ONT., CANADA
CITIZEN
D. 97 850

FEB 2 1972

CHICAGO
today
AFTERNOON
Always on Top of the News
D. 429,052 SUN. 434,103

FEB 1 1972

Ozawa to Boston

Conductor Seija Ozawa, well known to Ravinia Park audiences, will become music director of the Boston Symphony next autumn, CHICAGO TODAY has learned.

This will be in addition to his present similar position with the San Francisco Symphony with which he has been associated for the last three years.

Ozawa, 35, was music director of Ravinia from 1964 to 1969.

SEIJI OZAWA

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

NEW BATON FOR BOSTON—Seiji Ozawa, new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stands in garden with his wife, Vera.

BSO appoints Seiji Ozawa music director for 1973-74

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa, 36, as music director beginning with the 1973-74 season.

Boston will share Ozawa's services with the San Francisco Symphony, whose music director he has been since 1970 and where he recently extended his contract until 1976.

Ozawa's initial contract with the Boston Symphony is for the three-year period customary in such arrangements, also therefore until 1976.

He will continue to serve as co-director, with Gunther Schuller, of the Berkshire Music Center and Festival at Tanglewood, a position he has held since 1970.

Because of previous commitments, Ozawa will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony for only one week during the 1972-73 season. It was announced, however, that he will serve as music adviser for that year.

While a music director is principal conductor in charge of planning the season as a whole, including the choosing of guest conductors and soloists, the title of music adviser is somewhere between vague and meaningless, used by orchestras temporarily without a music director to give the impression that someone is in charge.

Boston will be such an orchestra, because the three-year tenure of William Steinberg comes to an end this summer.

4

SYMPHONY, Page 22

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa denies he'll be BSO conductor

NEW YORK—Seiji Ozawa, 34, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, said last night that a report in the Feb. 7 issue of Newsweek that he was quitting his job in San Francisco to become music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was false and based on misinformation.

In November, Ozawa extended his contract with the San Francisco Symphony to run through the end of the 1975-76 season.

Ozawa, co-ordinator with Gunther Schuller of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood since the summer of 1970, said negotiations were going on about the Boston Symphony music directorship which falls vacant at the end of this season with the resignation of 72-year-old William Steinberg.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ronald J. Wilford of Columbia Artists Management Inc. and Ozawa's personal manager, said that they looked forward to a happy outcome of the discussions now going forward, but that there was at the moment no signed contract between Ozawa and the Boston orchestra.

—MICHAEL STEINBERG

Ozawa, 36, named BSO music director

★ SYMPHONY
Continued from Page 1

4

Beginning in 1973, Ozawa will confine his work in North America to the San Francisco and Boston Symphonies. In his first year as Music Director he will conduct the Boston Symphony for ten weeks, and then more in subsequent seasons.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the BSO Trustees, in making the announcement about Ozawa, also said that Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas are designated Principal Guest Conductors. Thomas is now the Boston Symphony's Associate Conductor, a title that falls vacant with his change of status, as well as Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic. Davis, known to have been the Trustees' first choice after Erich Leinsdorf announced his resignation in December 1967, but who could not be persuaded to accept the post, is Music Director of the Covent Garden Opera, London, and is in Boston this week as guest conductor with the Symphony.

Next year's setup for conductors, therefore, is Ozawa, Music Adviser, Davis and Thomas, Principal Guest Conductors, and Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, continuing as Assistant Conductor.

The new series of Spectrum Concerts started by Thomas this year, emphasizing unusual programs in a package more informal than than the customary one, will continue. Banks said that next season's Spectrum concerts were being planned now, and "that they had added so much life and excitement to the musical scene in Boston" that he they would "go on for ever."

Ozawa's association with the Boston Symphony goes back to 1960, when the Manchurian-born Tokyo-trained musician, who switched from piano to conducting because of a soccer injury to his hand, was a student at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, winning the Koussevitzky Prize as that year's most promising student conductor. He had come to Tanglewood at the invitation of Charles Munch, then BSO Muisc Director, who had been a judge when Ozawa had won the International Conductors' Contest at Besancon, France, in 1959.

Ozara's first major guest engagement in North America was with San Francisco in 1962, and the first of his frequent guest appearances with the Boston Symphony was at Tanglewood in summer 1964. In 1964-65, he was Leonard Bernstein's assistant at the New York Philharmonic, and he has also been Music Director of the Ravinia Festival in Chicago, the Toronto Symphony, and the Japan Philharmonic.

In announcing Ozawa's appointment, Banks stressed the evident pleasure of the Boston Symphony players—his announcement to them at a rehearsal earlier Wednesday was warmly applauded—and speaking on behalf of the orchestra, cellist Robert Ripley, chairman of the Players' Committee said: "The members of the Orchestra are delighted . . and are looking forward with keenest anticipation to working with him on a regular basis. The players are especially gratified that the Trustees charged with the responsibility of making the selection did so after consultation with representatives of the orchestra. The decision reached is evidence that the players' views were given full consideration."

HE'S IN COMMAND—Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony as a guest in this photo, but he'll take over as music director for 1973-74 season. He, his wife and new baby will continue to live in San Francisco, where he is also music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

[67]

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa Gets BSO Position

By HARRY NEVILLE

The Boston Symphony yesterday announced that 36-year-old Seiji Ozawa, music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will become the Boston orchestra's music director at the beginning of the 1973-74 season.

He will replace William Steinberg, who is retiring as BOS music director as the end of the current season.

During the coming 1972-73 season Ozawa will serve as music adviser to the orchestra. However, his prior commitments during that period will allow him to be in Boston only briefly. At the present time he is scheduled to conduct only one week of the 1972-73 season.

Ozawa will continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, a post he has held since 1970. He will also retain his position with the San Francisco Symphony. Beginning in 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to the regular season in Boston, and in order to do this he will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco orchestras.

Ozawa made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony during the 1964 Berkshire Festival and since that time he has conducted the orchestra numerous times in Tanglewood, New York and Boston. Born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, he was graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, where he won first prizes in composition and conducting.

In 1959 he won first prize at the International Competition of Conductors at Besancon, as as result of which Charles Munch, one of the judges, invited him to Tanglewood to become a conducting student. There he was awarded the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center.

Ozawa's first major North American guest conducting engagement was with the San Francisco Symphony in 1962. He became music director of that orchestra in 1970, and his contract was recently extended through the 1975-76 season. He will lead the West Coast orchestra on its first European tour in 1973.

Perhaps the most significant statement issued yesterday in connection with Ozawa's appointment was that of Robert Ripley, BSO cellist and chairman of the Players' Committee. "The players are especially gratified," he said, "that the trustees charged with the responsibility of making the selection did so after consultation with representatives of the orchestra. The decision reached is evidence that the players' views were given full consideration."

Yesterday's announcement also included the news that beginning with the 1972-73 season Michael Tilson Thomas and Colin Davis will be named principal guest conductors of the orchestra. Thomas serves as the group's associate conductor. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will continue as assistant conductor.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa for BSO

By Louis Snyder
Music critic of The Christian Science Montor

PAGE ONE Boston

A year of conjectural tuning-up, marked by rumors and denials, preceded the Boston Symphony's choice of Seiji Ozawa as its 13th music director.

The search for a successor to William Steinberg, music director until the end of the current season, had brought up the name of almost every leading conductor in the world not already committed. Mentioned were Colin Davis, Rafael Kubelik, Bernard Haitink, and Claudio Abbado, all of whom subsequently accepted full-time posts with other organizations.

The BSO's own skyrocketing youthful associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, had also just recently been mentioned as a logical contender.

★ Please turn to Page 5

Ozawa to direct Boston Symphony

Continued from Page 1

However, Mr. Ozawa's connection with the orchestra since his student days at Tanglewood in 1960, and his more recent guest appearances in Boston and artistic directorship of the Berkshire Festival in 1970 and 1971, led to the new appointment.

What the orchestra has sorely needed for some time is continuity in its musical leadership—a commodity Mr. Ozawa will hopefully be able to provide.

Since Mr. Ozawa's present commitments as conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony will limit his availability next season, his title in Boston will be music adviser until 1973-74, when he takes over full responsibility for planning the orchestra's future on the basis of a contract extending through 1975-76.

With his assumption of the top conducting and administrative post in 1973 in Boston, as well as in San Francisco, it is understood that Mr. Ozawa will limit his future conducting engagements in this country to these two orchestras. In 1973-74, he will make 10 weeks of appearances with the BSO, in addition to those at Tanglewood, with more in the seasons to follow.

It is expected that Mr. Thomas will play an increasingly important role in his association with the orchestra. He has been allotted a six- to seven-week period of concerts next season.

With Mr. Ozawa available only on a limited basis in 1972-73, other guest conductors including Colin Davis, former music director Erich Leinsdorf, and retiring music director William Steinberg are possibilities for appearances in Boston.

Mr. Ozawa made a flying trip to San Francisco to speak to members of the orchestra there, concurrently with the announcement of his engagement in Boston. Currently guest conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra, he will meet the press at Symphony Hall on Sunday for discussion of his future plans for the orchestra.

Statements regarding the Ozawa appointment have been made by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees ("We welcome this brilliantly gifted and utterly devoted conductor as music director of the orchestra with which so much of his musical life has been identified . . ."); by cellist Robert Ripley, chairman of the BSO's players' committee ("The members of the orchestra are delighted with the appointment . . . and are looking forward with keenest anticipation to working with him on a regular basis . . ."); by Mr. Steinberg, the retiring music director ("Congratulations to everyone and best wishes for continued success of great musicmaking."); and by Mr. Ozawa himself ("I hope we will have a long and happy musical life together").

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Would Become Music Director, Keep Calif. Post

Ozawa Due for Symphony Post

By HARRY NEVILLE

Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are expected to announce today the signing of Seiji Ozawa, director of the San Francisco Symphony, as associate conductor of the Boston orchestra.

Ozawa, whose contract in San Francisco runs through the 1975-76 season, will serve with both orchestras through that period, according to a spokesman for the Boston organization.

At a later date, it is understood he will be made full music director of the Boston Symphony.

In California yesterday, Phili Boone, president of the San Francisco Symphony Association, quoted Ozawa as telling him:

"My emotions, my musical hopes and my life are involved in San Francisco and will continue, hopefully, for a much longer period than my contract now covers." He is in his second season with the San Francisco orchestra.

Boone said San Francisco would not suffer if Ozawa accepts the Boston contract.

"Ozawa now appears for 14 weeks annually in San Francisco by contract," he ex-

(Continued on Page Six)

SEIJI OZAWA

Symphony Post Slated For Ozawa

(Continued from First Page)

plained, "and the extent of this commitment would not diminish. The Boston and San Francisco symphony seasons are not identical and a proper working arrangement could be negotiated."

The popular, 34-year-old conductor left New York last night for the West Coast where he is scheduled to address members of the orchestra there this morning.

Sources there said they believe he will tell the musicians of his contract with Boston and, at the same time, assure them he will lead them through the term of his commitment there.

In Boston, he is slated to replace 72-year-old William Steinberg who will retire as music director at the end of the current season.

Spring Song: Schoenberg Lieder Rag

BY RICHARD BUELL

Even with the B.S.O. season at an end and the last of the Celebrity Series events behind us, there has been no shortage of musical events worth taking in. This seems to be the time of year when out-of-the-way music gets trotted out, when some performer one has been curious about all winter finally makes an appearance, when conservatories and university music departments come forth with projects they've been working up to throughout the academic year. The concertgoer who consults this paper's listings has been in a position to be highly selective. Maybe too selective, or it might have been the fine weather, or that people were busy with exams and papers and suchlike, for the concerts we covered were underattended. We hope people weren't sitting home bored.

It was high time that the young American soprano Benita Valente appeared locally in recital. She has built up a sterling reputation as a specialist in technically difficult contemporary music, without being any the less comfortable with Brahms, Schubert and Mozart. (They certainly like her a lot at Marlboro, which is no hotbed of outrageous avant-garde activity.) Her voice, considered as sheer sound, is one of the most beautiful now before the public. Its clear, true, silvery timbre reminds one of Rita Streich, except for its greater vibrancy and weight; it has unusual mobility, as she demonstrated a couple of years ago in a memorable performance of Bach's taxing solo cantata BWV 51; and its control is perfect for sustaining the long lines of the German Lieder she chose for her program on the 19th at Sanders Theater in Cambridge.

Especially with so sympathetic a partner as Earl Kim at the piano (an interesting-sounding Bechstein), these songs of Brahms, Schubert and Schumann could not have been more exquisitely or tastefully rendered. But the cumulative effect was soporific. Every vocal challenge, even in such difficult pieces as Ganymed and Gretchen am Spinnrade, was made to sound like no challenge at all: these, and the others, were perfectly sung. Her rather far back, resonant placement produced some ravishing sonorities, but they were only slightly colored by the sounds of the German texts. It was never a matter of not understanding the musical point of a song; it was the diehard choice she made of vocal beauty first. This was all the more apparent when we mentally compared her approach to Fruehlingsglaube, for instance, to that of Elly Ameling, who is at once more forward (letting one hear words) just as vocally subtle and equally understated. This recital was enchanting and disturbing in equal measure.

Arts Across the River and the Dudley House Music Society sponsored this and another concert we attended two nights later at Burden Hall at Harvard Business School. Leon Kirchner conducted members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighteen or so in number, in the Mozart C Minor Wind Serenade, K. 388, Hindemith's Kammermusik No. 3, Op. 36, No. 2, and the Chamber Symphony in E flat major, Op. 9 of Arnold Schoenberg. The Mozart Divertimento in D, K. 205, was performed with the absolute minimum of personnel, one player to each string part and two horns, and without conductor. The B.S.O.'s principals notoriously do not think or sound like chamber players. In the K. 205, this was evident in violinist Joseph Silverstein's maudlin vibrato, sometimes indistinguishable from his trill, and in the dynamically unvaried, or loud, oboe playing of Ralph Gomberg. Conductor Kirchner seemed to turn these defects into virtues when he could not erase them. There was a high emotional temperature to his direction of the Mozart wind serenade, which came out at high volume but also with an angry kind of readiness and sharpness of accent in keeping with the piece's aggressive phraseology and polyphonic textures. A similar control of dynamics and tension made the performance of the early Schoenberg an exciting one, full of nervous energy. The intellectual sympathy and direct physicality that Kirchner brings to such music shows what a valuable conductor he can be. The program was also intelligently arranged in its working up to an emotional peak in the Schoenberg.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 70,000

MAY JUN 1972

THEATER / ARTS

Kirchner conducts 15 soloists

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

The same people who are billed in another series as the BSO Chamber Players, plus a few more of their cohorts, played an interesting program in Burden Hall Sunday night. Interesting partly because of the music, partly because it was obvious how much better the ensemble is when they play chamber music with a conductor.

The most satisfying piece to me was a Mozart Serenade (C minor, K.388) played beautifully by pairs of oboes, clarinets, bassoons, and horns. This is gorgeous music all around, but the Menuet is really something special — in canon, and the Trio another canon played also upside-down and with the loveliest sotto voce quality. I wondered at first why such a small group played with conductor, but it seemed in the end to be a good idea since Leon Kirchner drew something from these players that is rarely there.

There was another Mozart earlier, a Divertimento scored for strings and horns, and it got the same old "pecked-at fast movements alternating with fussy, rhapsodic, super-vibrato slow movements" treatment I have come to expect from this group. They played "unassisted," and even though the idea of someone conducting a handful of men in a piece of Mozart is a bit bizarre, perhaps they would have benefited from Kirchner guidance too — it worked in the wind Serenade.

Jules Eskin was cello soloist in Hindemith's Kammermusik No. 3, parts of which were quite all right, but the rest of which was a mess. It's a regular tour de force for the cellist, playing a lot of the time where violins usually do, but all that would have been infinitely more impressive if he hadn't so obviously been fighting it most of the way. The intonation of the group as a whole was shameful - did they tune at all?

The concert ended with Schoenberg's First Chamber Symphony, for 15 solo instruments. I think Kirchner's tempi were on the whole not actually too fast, but it felt that way. There was in the whole piece a sense of enormous frantic hurry that, yes, in some crazy way held the piece together, but also, no, didn't give things a chance to be heard. This "franticity" may have been augmented by the fact that everybody seemed afraid he wasn't going to be heard (15 SOLO instruments, says the title page), and the dynamic instructions went out the window - altogether a very noisy result. It was hard to tell whether or not the acoustics of the hall had anything to do with that - visually it's the worst place ever for a chamber music concert. At any rate, something thickened up the texture beyond what is written and made the higher registers, particularly in the first violin part, unusually squeaky.

LEON KIRCHNER . . . beautiful Mozart

Spring Song: Schoenberg Lieder Rag

BY RICHARD BUELL

Even with the B.S.O. season at an end and the last of the Celebrity Series events behind us, there has been no shortage of musical events worth taking in. This seems to be the time of year when out-of-the-way music gets trotted out, when some performer one has been curious about all winter finally makes an appearance, when conservatories and university music departments come forth with projects they've been working up to throughout the academic year. The concertgoer who consults this paper's listings has been in a position to be highly selective. Maybe too selective, or it might have been the fine weather, or that people were busy with exams and papers and suchlike, for the concerts we covered were underattended. We hope people weren't sitting home bored.

It was high time that the young American soprano Benita Valente appeared locally in recital. She has built up a sterling reputation as a specialist in technically difficult contemporary music, without being any the less comfortable with Brahms, Schubert and Mozart. (They certainly like her a lot at Marlboro, which is no hotbed of outrageous avant-garde activity.) Her voice, considered as sheer sound, is one of the most beautiful now before the public. Its clear, true, silvery timbre reminds one of Rita Streich, except for its greater vibrancy and weight; it has unusual mobility, as she demonstrated a couple of years ago in a memorable performance of Bach's taxing solo cantata BWV 51; and its control is perfect for sustaining the long lines of the German Lieder she chose for her program on the 19th at Sanders Theater in Cambridge.

Especially with so sympathetic a partner as Earl Kim at the piano (an interesting-sounding Bechstein), these songs of Brahms, Schubert and Schumann could not have been more exquisitely or tastefully rendered. But the cumulative effect was soporific. Every vocal challenge, even in such difficult pieces as Ganymed and Gretchen am Spinnrade, was made to sound like no challenge at all: these, and the others, were perfectly sung. Her rather far back, resonant placement produced some ravishing sonorities, but they were only slightly colored by the sounds of the German texts. It was never a matter of not understanding the musical point of a song; it was the diehard choice she made of vocal beauty first. This was all the more apparent when we mentally compared her approach to Fruehlingsglaube, for instance, to that of Elly Ameling, who is at once more forward (letting one hear words), just as vocally subtle and equally understated. This recital was enchanting and disturbing in equal measure.

Arts Across the River and the Dudley House Music Society sponsored this and another concert we attended two nights later at Burden Hall at Harvard Business School. Leon Kirchner conducted members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighteen or so in number, in the Mozart C Minor Wind Serenade, K. 388, Hindemith's Kammermusik No. 3, Op. 36, No. 2, and the Chamber Symphony in E flat major, Op. 9 of Arnold Schoenberg. The Mozart Divertimento in D, K. 205, was performed with the absolute minimum of personnel, one player to each string part and two horns, and without conductor. The B.S.O.'s principals notoriously do not think or sound like chamber players. In the K. 205, this was evident in violinist Joseph Silverstein's maudlin vibrato, sometimes indistinguishable from his trill, and in the dynamically unvaried, or loud, oboe playing of Ralph Gomberg. Conductor Kirchner seemed to turn these defects into virtues when he could not erase them. There was a high emotional temperature to his direction of the Mozart wind serenade, which came out at high volume but also with an angry kind of readiness and sharpness of accent in keeping with the piece's aggressive phraseology and polyphonic textures. A similar control of dynamics and tension made the performance of the early Schoenberg an exciting one, full of nervous energy. The intellectual sympathy and direct physicality that Kirchner brings to such music shows what a valuable conductor he can be. The program was also intelligently arranged in its working up to an emotional peak in the Schoenberg.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 70,000

MAY JUN 1972

THEATER / ARTS

Kirchner conducts 15 soloists

By Jean R. Dane
Globe Correspondent

The same people who are billed in another series as the BSO Chamber Players, plus a few more of their cohorts, played an interesting program in Burden Hall Sunday night. Interesting partly because of the music, partly because it was obvious how much better the ensemble is when they play chamber music with a conductor.

The most satisfying piece to me was a Mozart Serenade (C minor, K.388) played beautifully by pairs of oboes, clarinets, bassoons, and horns. This is gorgeous music all around, but the Menuet is really something special — in canon, and the Trio another canon played also upside-down and with the loveliest sotto voce quality. I wondered at first why such a small group played with conductor, but it seemed in the end to be a good idea since Leon Kirchner drew something from these players that is rarely there.

There was another Mozart earlier, a Divertimento scored for strings and horns, and it got the same old "pecked-at fast movements alternating with fussy, rhapsodic, super-vibrato slow movements" treatment I have come to expect from this group. They played "unassisted," and even though the idea of someone conducting a handful of men in a piece of Mozart is a bit bizarre, perhaps they would have benefited from Kirchner guidance too — it worked in the wind Serenade.

Jules Eskin was cello soloist in Hindemith's Kammermusik No. 3, parts of which were quite all right, but the rest of which was a mess. It's a regular tour de force for the cellist, playing a lot of the time where violins usually do, but all that would have been infinitely more impressive if he hadn't so obviously been fighting it most of the way. The intonation of the group as a whole was shameful - did they tune at all?

The concert ended with Schoenberg's First Chamber Symphony, for 15 solo instruments. I think Kirchner's tempi were on the whole not actually too fast, but it felt that way. There was in the whole piece a sense of enormous frantic hurry that, yes, in some crazy way held the piece together, but also, no, didn't give things a chance to be heard. This "franticity" may have been augmented by the fact that everybody seemed afraid he wasn't going to be heard (15 SOLO instruments, says the title page), and the dynamic instructions went out the window - altogether a very noisy result. It was hard to tell whether or not the acoustics of the hall had anything to do with that - visually it's the worst place ever for a chamber music concert. At any rate, something thickened up the texture beyond what is written and made the higher registers, particularly in the first violin part, unusually squeaky.

LEON KIRCHNER . . . beautiful Mozart

Kirchner's Direction Makes Work Live

RA May 23, '72

By JOHN RICHARDSON

Arnold Schonberg's Chamber Symphony op 19 is a highly problematic work. Although something of a standard concert item these days, few performers are successfully able to cope with its extreme technical demands, heavy post-romantic idiom, and acute balance problems.

At Harvard's Burden Hall Sunday night, a group of Boston Symphony players under the direction of Leon Kirchner gave the only performance in my memory that managed to pull the piece from its lugubrious trench and make it live.

★

The basic problem with this work lies in its scoring. The composer seemed determined to use an idiom and scope suited to a larger instrumental group and score it for 15 solo instruments.

The usual result is that the strings (quartet plus bass) are beaten and pummelled into inaudibility by the winds:

• Symphony Review

flute doubling piccolo, oboe and english horn, three breeds of clarinet, bassoon and contra-bassoon, two horns.

This was not, however, the case Sunday night. Under Mr. Kirchner's beautifully paced conducting, the winds played with the requisite delicacy and care, and the strings (Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass) played with amazing strength and virtuosity.

Mr. Silverstein, particularly, managed the tortuous first violin part with consistently fine tone and unfailingly good intonation.

★

The rest of the program was devoted to two Mozart pieces, (Divertimento K. 205 in D and the Serenade for eight winds, K. 388) and the Hindemith Kammermusik No. 3.

Mr. Eskin's playing of the solo cello part in the Hindemith was very fine indeed: technically and rhythmically secure, unfailingly musical. This piece, too, can be lugubrious, but Mr. Kirchner's light handling of the instrumental accompaniment kept things in proper scale.

The Mozart pieces were generally fine. Mr. Silverstein and Mr. Fine played particularly well in the Divertimento, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, played warmly and delicately in the serenade.

A word about Burden Hall. This is a perfect place for this kind of concert. Despite a large number of seats, this is basically an intimate hall. The acoustics are extremely clear yet resonant; the separation of timbres is almost perfect which helped the Schonberg and Hindemith pieces immensely.

SUN
LEWISTON, MAINE
D. 32,167
Boston Sym,
JUN 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Music: Kirchner, BSO Play Chamber Works

HT May 23, '72

By HARRY NEVILLE

Leon Kirchner led members of the Boston Symphony Sunday night in a concert of chamber works by Mozart, Hindemith and Schoenberg. Both the program and the playing were delightful and so too was Burden Hall, the fairly new lecture auditorium where the concert took place.

Located on the Harvard Business School campus, the hall has about 900 seats, all quite comfortable and all with excellent sightlines. The appointments are modest and unpretentious and the acoustics are first-rate—good separation of sound, a bit bright but not brittle or harsh. As a concert hall for chamber events, Burden Hall has one possible drawback—its location, which is inconvenient to concert-goers who rely on public transportation.

THIS HAS NOT prevented "Arts Across the River," a project operated in cooperation with Harvard Business School, from attempting to establish a concert series in Burden Hall. If Sunday's concert was typical of what the project offers, then the effort deserves to meet with success.

Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony in E, Op. 9, got a reading that was impressive for Kirchner's control of the over-all shape of the piece. It is a work that can sound frantic and rushed if the composer's tempo markings are taken literally. Kirchner chose speeds that allowed the music to breathe, to come across with a subtlety too often missed by other conductors.

Jules Eskin was the cello soloist in Hindemith's Kammermusik No. 3, Op. 36, No. 2. The work has some thorny technical problems, but Eskin gave a seemingly effortless account while at the same time projecting all the wit and humor in the score.

Mozart's Divertimento No. 7 in D, K. 205, and Serenade No. 12 in C Minor, K. 388, made up the remainder of the program. Despite their function as music for entertainment, Mozart's works in these genres explore a remarkably wide range of emotions, and it was unusual and welcome to get two of his finest efforts in this vein on the same program.

The Divertimento—for strings (in three parts), horns and bassoons—is notable for its deeply felt Adagio, and for the prominence and imaginativeness throughout of the viola part, admirably played on this occasion by Burton Fine.

The Serenade is an altogether splendid work with tragic overtones in its opening movement, Italianate warmth in the Andante, and a delightful canonic minuet and trio in which oboist Ralph Gomberg did some exquisite playing. Throughout, the playing of everyone was vivid, unpretentious, appreciative of the character of each movement.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 199,160
OCT 24 1971
New England Newsclip

Gorham Pops Concert To Feature Trumpet Player

GORHAM N.H. — Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be featured artist at the annual Pops Concert of the Gorham High School Music Department to be held Saturday at 8 p.m. in the gym.

Ghitalla, who made his first appearance with the Gorham High School band two years ago, is making his return appearance. He is recognized as one of the finest trumpeters in the world. Besides his duties at the Boston Symphony, he has recorded two albums and teaches at the New England Conservatory of Music and Boston University. He also teaches at Tanglewood during the summer. Also he performs with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and gives guest solos extensively around the country.

His selections with the Gorham High School Band will include The Haydo Trumpet Concerto, the Vivaldi Concerto for two trumpets and the Carnival of Venice. The Carnival, which brought Ghitalla a standing ovation at the concert here two years ago, will be repeated by popular request.

Performances by the Gorham High School Chorus will include I'd like to Teach the World to Sing, Joy to the World, Everything's Alright, from Jesus Christ Superstar, and Aquarius, Let the Sunshine In. Miss Chris Ross, assistant director, will conduct I'd Like to Teach the World to Sing.

Page Dinsmore, assistant director, will conduct the Vivaldi Concerto For Jack Thrapp, music director of Gorham schools this will be a long-time dream come true, when he will perform in public with his former teacher, Ghitalla.

The Gorham Shelburne Randolph Senior Seniors Club members have been invited as special guests.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
D. 16,095
OCT 13 1971
New Englan Newscl

South Windsor

Symphony Organist At Dedication

Boston Symphony organist Berj Zamkochian will be guest musician at the dedication of a new pipe organ at the St. Francis of Assisi Church on Ellington Rd. Oct. 27 at 8 p.m.

According to the Reverends Eugene M. Kilbride and John

Berj Zamkochian

Curry Gay, co-pastors, the organ will be officially put into use with the dedication ceremony.

Zamkochian, born and educated in Boston, is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music. While a graduate student at the conservatory, he was appointed to the organ faculty.

At the age of 26 he was appointed organist of the Boston Symphony and Boston Pop Orchestra and his recordings on the RCA label have won him international acclaim.

He represented the organists of the United States at the Third World Congress of Sacred Music in Paris and was invited to play at the closing event at the Montreal Expo in 1967. He became the first North American Organist to tour the Soviet Union in 1965 and has since made six return tours and performances in that country.

In the United States, Zamkochian has toured with concerts to every part of the country, and dedicated many organs throughout the country, including those at the Cathedral of St. Joseph in Hartford; the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D.C.; Sacred Heart Cathedral in Gallup, N. Mex.

From his youth, Zamkochian has been an active and dedicated church musician. His dedication to sacred music has brought him distinctive honors from Pope Paul VI and Cardinal Agagianian.

The dedication program will also include songs by the Senior and Junior Choirs of the parish under the direction of Mrs. Ralph Thrall.

A reception will follow immediately after the ceremony for all those attending.

Zamkochian To Play at Dedication

SOUTH WINDSOR — Berj Zamkochian, organist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops Orchestra, will play at the dedication of a new organ at St. Francis of Assisi Church, 673 Ellington Road, Wednesday at 8 p.m.

The church's senior and junior choirs, directed by Mrs. Ralph Thrall, will sing during the dedication ceremonies.

A reception will follow in the church hall.

Zamkochian, a graduate of Conservatory of Music, was appointed organist of the two Boston orchestras at the age of 26 and has recorded several records with them.

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa joins Boston Symphony; starts out as 'music advisor'

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . coming to Boston

Tokyo-trained Seiji Ozawa. 36, will be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-1974 season. During the 1972-73 season, he will hold the title of music advisor.

As music director, Ozawa will be principal conductor. However, Boston will share his services with the San Francisco Symphony whose music director Ozawa has been since 1970. He will be in charge of planning the shape of the Boston orchestra's season as a whole, including the choice of guest conductors and soloists.

The title of music advisor is somewhat between vague and meaningless, and is used by orchestras temporarily without music directors to give the impression that someone is in charge. During 1972-73, Ozawa will be advising on a season already planned in considerable detail under the music directorship of William Steinberg, whose three year tenure comes to an end this summer.

Ozawa's association with the Boston Symphony goes back to 1960, when the Manchurian born musician, who turned from piano to conducting because of a soccer injury to his hand, was a student one summer at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

OSAWA, Page 42

THE BOSTON HERALD Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,361

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Becomes Music Director in 1973-74 Season

Seiji Ozawa Joins Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE

The Boston Symphony yesterday announced that 36-year-old Seiji Ozawa, music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will become the Boston orchestra's music director at the beginning of the 1973-74 season.

During the coming 1972-73 season Ozawa will serve as music adviser to the orchestra. However, his prior commitments during that period will allow him to be in Boston only briefly. At the present time he is scheduled to conduct only one week of the 1972-73 season.

Ozawa will continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, a post he has held since 1970. He will also retain his position with the San Francisco Symphony. Beginning in 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to the regular season in Boston, and in order to do this he will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco orchestras.

Ozawa made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony during the 1964 Berkshire Festival and since that time he has conducted the orchestra numerous times in Tanglewood, New York and Boston. Born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, he was graduated from the Toho School of Music in

(Contined on Page Seven)

SEIJI OZAWA

Ozawa Gets BSO Position

(Continued from First Page)

Tokyo, where he won first prizes in composition and conducting.

In 1959 he won first prize at the International Competition of Conductors at Besancon, as as result of which Charles Munch, one of the judges, invited him to Tanglewood to become a conducting student. There he was awarded the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center.

Ozawa's first major North American guest conducting engagement was with the San Francisco Symphony in 1962. He became music director of that orchestra in 1970, and his contract was recently extended through the 1975-76 season. He will lead the West Coast orchestra on its first European tour in 1973.

Perhaps the most significant statement issued yesterday in connection with Ozawa's appointment was that of Robert Ripley, BSO cellist and chairman of the Players' Committee. "The players are especially gratified," he said, "that the trustees charged with the responsibility of making the selection did so after consultation with representatives of the orchestra. The decision reached is evidence that the players' views were given full consideration."

Yesterday's announcement also included the news that beginning with the 1972-73 season Michael Tilson Thomas and Colin Davis will be named principal guest conductors of the orchestra. Thomas serves as the group's associate conductor. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will continue as assistant conductor.

Ozawa is scheduled to arrive in Boston for a press conference this Sunday, at which time he will discuss long-range plans and goals for the orchestra.

Ozawa joins Symphony as 'music advisor'

★ OSAWA
Continued from Page 1

There he won the Koussevitzky prize as the most promising conducting student. Ozawa later spent a year as Leonard Bernstein's assistant at the New York Philharmonic, and the first of his frequent guest engagements with the Boston Symphony was at Tanglewood, summer 1964.

Before going to his present job in San Francisco, he was music director of the Toronto Symphony, and since summerr 1970 he has been codirector with Gunther Schuller of the Berkshire Music Center.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., Boston Symphony manager, told the Globe this morning that the news would be officially announced this afternoon at a press conference "to which we were planning to invite you." A definite date for the press conference was not set until the arrangement with Ozawa seemed imperiled by the appearance Monday of a semi-true article in Newsweek. The magazine was correct about Ozawa's impending Boston appointment, but incorrect in its statement that Ozawa would leave San Francisco in order to accept the post here. In fact, Ozawa last November renewed his San Francisco contract to extend through 1976.

Personally and professionally, Ozawa feels closely tied to San Francisco. He had asked that while the news was being announced in Boston, he would personally tell his San Francisco players of the new arrangement. Ozawa flew to San Francisco after a concert in New York last night and was planning to address his orchestra at their morning rehearsal. Then he was immediately going to return to Philadelphia for rehearsals and concerts with the orchestra there.

Monday night in New York, Ozawa was sufficiently shaken by the Newsweek story and by the interference with his careful plans of when, how, and by whom the San Francisco orchestra would be told, that he was seriously in doubt about accepting the Boston offer. At that time, there was no signed contract between Ozawa and Boston. Boston Symphony Manager Perry said this morning that though there was still nothing written down, the matter was "agreed upon" in New York last night, and that it is "a settled matter."

Details of Ozawa's double job will presumably be announced this afternoon. It is expected, however, that he will conduct about half of each season and that he will give up all other guest arrangements in the United States as long as his bigamous relation with San Francisco and Boston continues.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,093

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa, 34, Named Director of BSO

Appointment of Seiji Ozawa, 34-year-old director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was announced yesterday.

The announcement was made by Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony's board of trustees, who said Ozawa would become music director for the 1973-74 season. During the 1972-73 season he will serve as music advisor.

Banks said the Boston position would not conflict with Ozawa's service as conductor-musical director of the San Francisco orchestra as the two seasons do not conflict. He said Ozawa also will continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

Ozawa is a native of Hoten, Manchuria, and a graduate of the Tojo School of Music in Tokyo. He first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1964.

Ozawa left New York Tuesday night to return to San Francisco, where he was scheduled to address orchestra members, presumably to tell them he would serve out the term of his contract there which runs through the 1975-76 season.

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette
Sun-Telegraph
D. 243,988 SAT. 292,767

FEB 3 1972

Ozawa is Named For Boston Baton

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, currently conducted by William Steinberg, has chosen Sejii Ozawa to conduct during the 1972-73 season. Ozawa, presently conductor of the San Francisco Smyphony Orchestra, will be musical adviser with the group.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN 566,377

FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

EDITORIAL POINTS

This is still Boston. A new Symphony Orchestra conductor gets as much attention as a new mayor.

Luckily for some people, snow comes down in little flakes instead of big lumps.

People

acy of U.N. envoy Gunnar V. Jarring — although, she stipulated, the resumption would have no connection with a recent American

San Francisco Examiner-Chronicle
SUN. 640,505

FEB 6 1972

and community organization; the new methods, he said, repudiated the Eldridge Cleaver "pick-up-the-gun-now" strategy.

Seiji Ozawa announced that he had accepted the music directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the 1973-74 season — as well as continuing at the helm of the San Francisco Symphony.

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000

FEB 7 1972

New Baton in Boston

The recent shortage of music directors was relieved by the appointment of Seiji Ozawa to the San Francisco Symphony, Georg Solti to Chicago, Pierre Boulez to the New York Philharmonic and Lorin Maazel to the Cleveland Orchestra. Only the Boston Symphony among major orchestras was rudderless.

When the Manchurian-born Ozawa arrived in San Francisco, he was greeted by Day-Glo posters spelling out AND NOW OZAWA. Last week, NEWSWEEK learned that it was now sayonara, Ozawa. At the end of his contract in 1973, Ozawa, 36, will become the thirteenth conductor of the 90-year-old Boston Symphony.

Although he has frequently guest-conducted the orchestra, Ozawa is different from the kind of music director (Koussevitzky, Leinsdorf, Steinberg) that Boston is used to. Fiery, demonstrative, Ozawa is very tuned into the twentieth century. Proper Bostonians will simply have to adjust to a man who believes "everyone should be just a little cuckoo."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

~~Flies to~~ Coast to explain dual role

Ozawa tells San Francisco he'll stay

By Robert Commanday
Special to the Globe

SAN FRANCISCO — Seiji Ozawa made a flying leap from Philadelphia Tuesday night to confirm in person to the members of the San Francisco Symphony that he would not be leaving his post as their director.

The Feb. 7 edition of Newsweek magazine announced that Ozawa would leave the San Francisco Symphony in 1973 to become music director of the Boston Symphony. This had already been emphatically denied at a press conference Tuesday by Philip Boone, the symphony association president.

Ozawa cancelled Tuesday's rehearsal with the Philadelphia orchestra which he is guest conducting in order to fly to San Francisco. He spoke for 10 minutes to the San Francisco Symphony players before yesterday's morning rehearsal with this week's guest conductor, Kazuyoshi Akiyama. Ozawa assured the musicians that San Francisco was his home and that he would remain their director as long as he wanted, beyond the 1976 termination of his present contract.

Ozawa, his wife Vera and their new daughter, Seira, will continue to make their home in the families' Twin Peaks residence in San Francisco.

Ozawa also made the unprecedented proposal that the orchestra should have an open-ended contract with its director. If the orchestra or the public at some point decided that they no longer wanted him, then he should be asked to leave. Even if he held a 10-year contract, this shouldn't matter, he said.

"I though at first it was a crazy thing to consider accepting a contract with Boston, last November," Ozawa said. He acknowledged that he had considerable help from Boone and Joseph Scafidi, the San Francisco Symphony's manager, in the two months it has taken to make the decision.

"When the baby came (on Dec. 29), Vera and I knew my present schedule was too much and I have to concentrate on my work," he said. This means that after the 1972-73 seasons, Ozawa will confine his North American appearances to Boston and San Francisco.

"The practice and style of people like Szell, Ormandy and Koussevitsky who conducted whole seasons, have changed," Ozawa said. "The audience needs variety. So does the orchestra. If you (the orchestra) see me all season you may want to kill me or something. I feel that 14 weeks is enough time to work with an orchestra to develop its character."

Ozawa admitted that there might be certain problems raised by his conducting both orchestras. If individual Boston Symphony musicians want to audition for the San Francisco Symphony, Ozawa said he wouldn't want to have to judge them.

Boone had pointed out on Tuesday that conflicts between the orchestras over Ozawa's time should not arise because their seasons do not exactly coincide. It would not interfere with his 14 performance weeks in San Francisco.

Ozawa told the orchestra that since he has become married and settled down, he has "become a little bit square, just a little bit, and is tired of living in hotels."

So saying, Ozawa left immediately for the airport and back to Philadelphia.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227

FEB 2 1972

Boston Rumor Explained

Ozawa to Stay Here, But...

By Heuwell Tircuit

Seiji Ozawa has no intention of leaving his post as music director of the San Francisco Symphony, or of breaking his contract which now runs through the 1975-76 season.

This was the substance of a hastily-called press conference yesterday morning in the Sir Francis Drake Hotel, denying a story in the February 7 edition of Newsweek Magazine that Ozawa had accepted the post of music director of the Boston Symphony and would leave San Francisco in 1973. However, he may become an associate conductor in Boston, dividing his time between Boston and San Francisco.

Philip S. Boone, president of the Symphony Association, acting as principal spokesman for the maestro and orchestra said "we were caught totally by surprise yesterday, and of course, it is not true. We want to assure the city of that."

Ozawa, speaking to Boone from New York (where he had just conducted a tour program of the Philadelphia Orchestra), branded the report "shocking" and "inconceivable."

As an unprecedented display of personal loyalty, Ozawa canceled one rehearsal of the Philadelphia to fly back to San Francisco. Purpose of the trip is to address today's rehearsal of his orchestra face to face, reported Boone, "reassure the orchestra musicians and the Bay Area music patrons that he would remain in San Francisco for many years to come."

SEIJI OZAWA
Flying back

"I believe in the future of the San Francisco Symphony," said Ozawa. "I am very happy that the Symphony and I are making music so well together, and I am also happy to see the public responding with such great warmth for the orchestra and me.

"My wife and I started a new life in San Francisco. Our daughter Seira was born here, our home is here. It is evidence that my emotions, my musical hopes and my life are involved with San Francisco, and will continue hopefully for a much longer period of time than my contract now covers."

This was the first time that both Ozawa and major Symphony Association officers have made firm statements of Ozawa's long-range plans here.

Boone, in answering another query, stated that the orchestra definitely will record with Ozawa and that "negotiations with two record companies are in progress." He declined to discuss details at this time.

Boone did explain the origin of the Boston story.

"Negotiations have been going on with the Boston Symphony since November, mostly between Joseph Scafidi, manager of the San Fracisco Symphony; Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony; and Ronald Wilfred, president of Columbia Artist management," conceded Boone. "But nothing has been resolved.

"Boston has proposed that Ozawa be made an associate conductor, and later music director, but while maintaining his San Francisco post. If this were to happen, the maestro would give up all other guest engagements in the United States."

Boone does not believe that San Francisco would suffer from such an arrangement. "Boston's season runs from September through April. Ours is from December through the end of May, so there is not such a conflict.

"Maestro Ozawa is contracted to do 14 of 24 weeks for us. He could do the same for Boston and still have his summers free to guest conduct in Japan or Europe. As it is, he conducted 134 concerts last year. Consolidating his work in two cities for the season is easier on him.

Boone said that he thinks the Boston-San Francisco arrangement, "will be consummated. Ozawa's feelings that his motives are suspect might hinder the negotiations. If it fell through now, it would be, I think, because of this statement by Newsweek."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
D. 79,398

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa 'Honored'

Frisco Conductor Takes Hub Baton

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36, Manchurian, born conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973, the Boston orchestra announced Wednesday.

Ozawa, who will continue as music director in San Francisco, will effectively join the Boston Symphony this summer, but he will hold the title "music advisor" for the first year.

He replaces William Steinberg, who retires this summer as music director of the Boston Symphony after serving three years.

Born at Hoten, Manchuria, Ozawa was educated at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, Japan.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of Charles Munch, then music director.

Ozawa began his appearances as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in 1964 and has made several appearances as conductor since. The last was November, 1971.

Ozawa, who served for one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic, has conducted the Boston Symphony during several recording sessions.

"Beginning in 1973," said the announcement from the Boston Symphony, "in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony, Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco symphonies."

Ozawa's contract with the San Francisco Symphony extends through 1976.

Ozawa said, "I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world."

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

FEB 3 1972 New Engla News

Ozawa To Head Boston Symphony Orchestra in '73

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36, Manchurian born conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973, the Boston orchestra announced yesterday.

Ozawa, who will continue as music director in San Francisco, will effectively join the Boston Symphony this summer, but he will hold the title "music advisor" for the first year.

He replaces William Steinberg, who retires this summer as music director of the Boston Symphony after serving three years.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 49,250

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 536,108 SUN. 709,123

FEB 3 1972

Ozawa agrees to lead 2 symphonies

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa, the diminutive, colorful conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday announced he would add the Boston Symphony to his responsibilities in an arrangement putting him at the helm of two of the country's major orchestras.

"I am not changing my job at all," the 36-year-old Japanese-born conductor told his San Francisco musicians. "It took me two months to decide, but I know now that I can do it. . . . I need your help and your co-operation."

(Ozawa was music director at Ravinia in Highland Park, Ill., from 1964 through 1969, directing the Ravinia Festival Chicago Symphony Orchestra.)

Ozawa said he would take over the music directorship of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season, but will drastically cut down his North American guest appearances in order to maintain his responsibilities in San Francisco.

San Francisco is considered one of the country's most improved orchestras in the last 10 years, and Boston is a first-line symphony, one of the top five in the nation.

Ozawa said he, his wife Vera and their daughter Seira, born Dec. 29, will live in San Francisco, and he intends to remain after his present contract ends in 1976.

He said he would appear briefly in Boston next season as music adviser and will continue to serve as co-artistic director of the Tanglewood Music Festival, the Boston Symphony's summer home, a post he has held since 1970.

In Boston, Ozawa will take over from William Steinberg, who has been interim director since the resignation of Eric Leinsdorf in August of 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

SEIJI OZAWA

ITEM
WAKEFIELD, MASS.
D. 7,200

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Have New Music Director

BOSTON (AP)—Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Francisco orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein, with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 500,118 SUN. 657,560

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa to Head Boston Symphony

Seiji Ozawa will replace William Steinberg as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the top jobs in music, it was announced yesterday in Boston. Ozawa will maintain his position as musical director of the San Francisco Symphony. Because of his heavy schedule with that orchestra, he will assume the role of musical adviser to the Boston Symphony for the 1972-1973 season and move into the director's position at the start of the 1973-1974 season. His appointment runs through 1976. Michael Tilson Thomas, currently associate conductor of the orchestra and musical director of the Buffalo Philharmonic, and Colin Davis, director of the Royal Opera at Covent Garden, were named principal guest conductors.

"Mod look" for Boston Symphony?

Seija Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the prestigious Boston Symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it. . . . I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians Wednesday.

The move puts him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras—the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions.

The diminutive, Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home in San Francisco with his wife, Vera, and their month-old daughter, Seira, and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa, 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970 His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him an instant success with San Franciscans.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg, who has been the interim director since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa To Guide Boston Symphony

By Jon Lehman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday named Seiji Ozawa, the 36-year-old Japanese conductor as the man to lead it out of the uncertainties over future directions which have lingered since the abrupt departure of Erich Leinsdorf nearly four years ago.

Mr. Ozawa, who is music director of the San Francisco Symphony, will retain his position there and will take over the leadership of the Boston orchestra in a two-phased arrangement beginning next fall when he will become music advisor. The music advisor position is to provide a transition during the year following the scheduled resignation of the orchestra's current music director, 72-year-old William Steinberg, who is returning to the Pittsburgh Symphony which he also heads.

During the 1972-73 season, when Mr. Ozawa's previous commitments will allow him only one weekend of conducting in Boston, the orchestra will be led by two principal guest conductors. One of those will be Michael Tilson Thomas, who will give up his title as the orchestra's associate conductor, and the other will be Colin Davis, conductor of London's Covent Garden Opera House, a director who has long enjoyed a close relationship with the BSO.

Mr. Ozawa will formally assume the position of music director of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1973-74 season, when he will devote at least 10 weeks to the winter season in Boston, according to the orchestra's announcement. Beginning with that season, the arrangement with Boston requires that Mr. Ozawa restrict his appearances on North American podiums to Boston and San Francisco.

He will not be required, however, to give up his relationship with the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo, of which he is also music director, or his annual guest conducting series in Europe. He will also continue as artistic director of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire music festival at its summer home in Tanglewood, a post he has shared for the past three summers.

The selection of Mr. Ozawa, who has had close connections with the Boston Orchestra since he came to this country as a Tanglewood student 12 years ago, was made after consultation with the orchestra's members. According to Robert Ripley, chairman of the players' committee, "he is the choice of the players."

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa to direct BSO

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seija Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the presitigious Boston Symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it ... I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians Wednesday.

The move puts him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras—the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions.

The diminutive, Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home here with his wife Vera and their month-old daughter Seira and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa, 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him an instant success with San Franciscans.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg, who has been the interim director since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa Accepts Offer To Lead Hub Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

OZAWA TO DIRECT TWO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI)—Seija Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the presitigious Boston Symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it . . . I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians Wednesday.

The move puts him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras — the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions.

The diminutive Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is poshible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home here with his wife Vera and their month-old daughter Seira and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa, 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him an instant success with San Franciscans.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg, who has been the interim director since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa Named Boston Symphony Conductor

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seija Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the presitigious Boston Symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it ... I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians Wednesday.

The move puts him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras—the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions.

The diminutive, Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home here with his wife Vera and their month-old daughter Seira and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa, 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him an instant success with San Franciscans.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg, who has been the interim director since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

FEB 3 1972 New England Newsclip

TOKYO-TRAINED Seiji Ozawa, 36, will be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-1974 season. During the 1972-73 season he will hold the title of music advisor. As music director, Ozawa will be principal conductor, but Boston will share his services with the San Francisco Symphony where he has been musical director since 1970. (UPI Telephoto)

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1.293,800

MAR 27 1972

Angel Records

Boston Chooses Ozawa's Beat

The spectacular American career of Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa has been crowned with a major new appointment: to head the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973 season.

Not only will Ozawa, 36, be the orchestra's youngest music director, but he is the first musician of Oriental

The Detroit News
D. 639,703 SUN. 850,078

MAR 12 1972

San Francisco Examiner
D. 203,026

MAR 12 1972

Everybody At Boston Wanted Ozawa

Conductor evaluations made by members of American symphony orchestras are having an increasing effort on appointments to musical directorships in this country.

Now, through Senza Sordino, the official publication of the International Conference of Symphony and Opera Musicians, comes word that Seiji Ozawa not only was the choice of the board of directors, but also the musicians, of the Boston Symphony.

"Ozawa," reports the BSO's Players Committee, "had been "evaluated" at least three times over the past few years, along with all other guest conductors. His rating had improved dramatically each time.

"This year's evaluation showed an overshelming majority of the orchestra favored him for the post of music director."

HERALD
RUTLAND, VT.
D. 22,553

MAR 13 1972

New England Newsclip

Boston's Orchestra Hires Music Director

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36, Manchurian born conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973, the Boston orchestra announced Wednesday.

Ozawa, who will continue as music director in San Francisco, will effectively join the Boston Symphony this summer, but he will hold the title "music advisor" for the first year.

MAR 12 1972

Istvan Kertesz

On the aisle

The permanent conductor: a thing of the past

By JAY CARR
News Drama and Music Critic

The Detroit Symphony's search for its new music director is beginning to warm up. There is no formal selection committee, but a small group of symphony board members has been scanning lists and pondering the question of Sixten Ehrling's successor. At this point, the field is wide open. None of next season's guest conductors will be settling in for a prolonged stay.

You can bet that Istvan Kertesz, the 41-year-old Hungarian maestro, will be given a thorough once-over when he returns to Ford Auditorium this week as a guest conductor. Kertesz, who made his U.S. debut here in 1961, has gone on to achieve an international reputation as a Dvorak and Mozart specialist. He was the Cleveland Orchestra musicians' overwhelming choice to succeed the late George Szell. But the Cleveland board hired Lorin Maazel.

GETTING A NEW conductor for the Detroit Symphony, one who will boost the orchestra into the international class, will be both difficult and expensive. The Symphony might lure a name conductor here, but it will cost a lot of money. Detroit has Ford Auditorium's bad reputation for acoustics and its lack of a recording contract working against it. So far, the Symphony doesn't seem to be making what can be called an all-out effort.

You won't hear the Davises, the Abbados, the Michael Tilson Thomases here next season. But then even if the Symphony were to hire one of the stars of the podium, the chances are that he wouldn't spend that much time here conducting. The days when a so-called permanent conductor would conduct most of a season's concerts is all but finished. There are exceptions, such as Eugene Ormandy. But jet travel and year-round seasons have finished off the idea of the full-time conductor.

TODAY'S STAR conductors split their seasons between orchestras. It is doubtful if tomorrow's so-called permanent conductors will conduct more than 10 or 12 weeks a season. The Chicago Symphony is presided over by two conductors, George Solti and Carlo Maria Giulini, both of whom pursue busy careers in Europe. These days European conductors want to spend at least part of their working time in Europe.

Today's conditions are perhaps best illustrated by what has happened in Boston in recent seasons. The Boston Symphony has long been regarded as one of the American "Big Five" orchestras, the others being Chicago, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia. In a word, the Boston Symphony has been slipping. In 1969 Erich Leinsdorf said the heavy concert schedule was having an adverse effect on the orchestra's standards, and resigned.

HERE WAS one of the world's great orchestras, conductorless. A plum job open. But did star conductors rush to fill it? No. The orchestra spent three years trying to put a man on the podium. It got William Steinberg to act as caretaker. But Steinberg's activities were limited by failing health, and in any case he felt too loyal to his Pittsburgh Symphony to leave Pittsburgh for good.

So Steinberg commuted between Boston and Pittsburgh and the Boston Symphony kept looking. The British conductor Colin Davis made an exceedingly favorable impression, and the Boston board wooed him for two years. To no avail. Davis wasn't inclined to give up the leadership of the BBC Symphony in London. This fall he succeeded George Solti as Covent Garden music director (Solti will head the Orchestra of Paris as well as the Chicago).

BOSTON GOT the message. The most Davis was willing to give Boston was six weeks a year over a three-year period. "What they want is a conductor to take a real interest in

Concluded on Page 9H

Seiji Ozawa

CHICAGO
today
AMERICAN
Always on Top of the News
D. 429,052 SUN. 434,103

MAR 19 1972

Roger Dettmer—

Music

A tough task for Ozawa in Boston

SINCE SERGE Koussevitzky stepped down in 1949 after 25 years as lord and leader of the Boston Symphony, that once-unbettered orchestra's fortunes have declined ever more sadly. A dozen erratic seasons of Charles Munch on the podium unhinged an ensemble thought to be indestructible, which his successor Erich Leinsdorf could not manage in seven years to repair. .

Since 1969—but no more after next month—William Steinberg has had charge, when sieges of illness and a concurrent lifetime post in Pittsburgh permitted. But he too, on the evidence of Friday's tired and untidy concert in Orchestra Hall, failed to bring order and elegance where once these qualities were taken for granted, but never lightly.

Whether Seiji Ozawa, who becomes musical advisor next autumn and music director in 1973, can do the reconstruction job in Boston that has eluded the efforts of three senior colleagues remains to be known. Assuredly, tho, he has hard work cut out for him.

FRIDAY'S PROGRAM was standard repertory that did not, even with the bait of a piano soloist, fill Orchestra Hall. It proceeded from Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony—played most securely, for the probable reason that Steinberg and the orchestra recently recorded it for future release—thru the Ravel G major Concerto to Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

What the Boston Orchestra has salvaged from Koussevitzky's storied era is bedrock of low string sound, dark mahogany in the contrabassi, lighter and mellower in the 'celli and violas, but of a matching color. The gleaming violin sound of golden years is gone, however, and discipline in the back stands. The heavy brass still muster an emphatic sonority, but individual players are unpredictable, especially the rank-and-file horns.

The winds suffer from Doriot Anthony Dwyer's breathy, tonally coarse, vibrato-ridden flute sound. Clarinets can be as unsteady as Chicago's in intonation, and oboist Ralph Gomberg, usually a port in a storm, had an off-night in the upper register when Steinberg applied the pressure. Even the lovely cor-anglais sound of Laurence Thorstenberg, perhaps by osmosis, took on some of Mrs. Dwyer's ugly vibrato, leaving only Sherman Walt's solo bassoon as a bastion.

THE PERCUSSION section has lost its whilom subtlety and shimmer, while the conductor urged timpanist Everett Firth to play too loudly in tutti passages [altho, to his credit, Firth played too loudly in tune]. Such was the ensemble heard in perfunctory performances of the Hindemith and Brahms symphonies, the former almost as smoothed-out as a Karajan reading. But the Brahms wasn't even smooth: playing was rough-edged in an intellectually anesthetized run-thru.

With the years Steinberg's beat and body English have become more eccentric as his concern for expressive details has grown increasingly lacunose. His Ravel accompaniment succeeded a lot of the time in blanketing the soloist—not, however, the debit this might have been were the player another than Alexis Weissenberg, or the piano a better specimen. It was, in fact, a dog of an instrument with a tone as brittle as dry-roasted nuts.

Weissenberg's approach was digitally flawless even at speeds faster, especially in the first movement, than ever the composer intended. But otherwise his playing was ice-cold, as barren of expression and innocent of breathing in music as a windup toy.

That Ravel was basically a classicist may have been the musical premise from which Weissenberg worked, tho Steinberg was obliviously conducting "Nights in the Gardens of Gershwin." But to play the G major Concerto as Weissenberg did, with an undeviating absence of expression, is mere perversity.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 1972

Longhair music

The announcement that Seiji Ozawa will become the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director next season has drawn criticism from some music lovers. Two BSO subscribers were quoted in a Boston Globe survey as follows: "I wish he would cut his hair . . . there's just something about his round face and straight, slinky hair," and "That hair flopping up and down drives me crazy. It gets between me and the music."

The BSO management is planning to meet this problem head on. We have learned from confidential and highly impeachable sources that Ozawa's opening program will make use of subliminal vibes to soften the audience's attitude. We have obtained an advance proof sheet of the proposed program, smuggled out of the print shop that handles the Symphony printing, and while we are mindful of the flap that followed publication of the Pentagon Papers and other classified material, we feel an obligation to share this information with our readers.

Here's what's in store for music lovers at Ozawa's first concert in his new post:

Night on Bald Mountain .... Moussorgsky
Barber of Seville ..... Rossini
Samson and Delilah, Overture
Saint-Saens
Selections from "Hair"
Intermission
Hary Janosch ..... Kodaly
Concerto #2 ..... Barber
George Shearing, soloist
Maid With the Flaxen Hair ..... Debussy
Airs from "Pompadour" ..... M. Sagoff

CHICAGO
today
AMERICAN
Always on Top of the News
D. 429,052 SUN. 434,103

MAR 19 1972

Roger Dettmer

Music

A tough task for Ozawa in Boston

SINCE SERGE Koussevitzky stepped down in 1949 after 25 years as lord and leader of the Boston Symphony, that once-unbettered orchestra's fortunes have declined ever more sadly. A dozen erratic seasons of Charles Munch on the podium unhinged an ensemble thought to be indestructible, which his successor Erich Leinsdorf could not manage in seven years to repair. . .

Since 1969—but no more after next month—William Steinberg has had charge, when sieges of illness and a concurrent lifetime post in Pittsburgh permitted. But he too, on the evidence of Friday's tired and untidy concert in Orchestra Hall, failed to bring order and elegance where once these qualities were taken for granted, but never lightly.

Whether Seiji Ozawa, who becomes musical advisor next autumn and music director in 1973, can do the reconstruction job in Boston that has eluded the efforts of three senior colleagues remains to be known. Assuredly, tho, he has hard work cut out for him.

FRIDAY'S PROGRAM was standard repertory that did not, even with the bait of a piano soloist, fill Orchestra Hall. It proceeded from Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony—played most securely, for the probable reason that Steinberg and the orchestra recently recorded it for future release—thru the Ravel G major Concerto to Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

What the Boston Orchestra has salvaged from Koussevitzky's storied era is bedrock of low string sound, dark mahogany in the contrabassi, lighter and mellower in the 'celli and violas, but of a matching color. The gleaming violin sound of golden years is gone, however, and discipline in the back stands. The heavy brass still muster an emphatic sonority, but individual players are unpredictable, especially the rank-and-file horns.

The winds suffer from Doriot Anthony Dwyer's breathy, tonally coarse, vibrato-ridden flute sound. Clarinets can be as unsteady as Chicago's in intonation, and oboist Ralph Gomberg, usually a port in a storm, had an off-night in the upper register when Steinberg applied the pressure. Even the lovely cor-anglais sound of Laurence Thorstenberg, perhaps by osmosis, took on some of Mrs. Dwyer's ugly vibrato, leaving only Sherman Walt's solo bassoon as a bastion.

THE PERCUSSION section has lost its whilom subtlety and shimmer, while the conductor urged timpanist Everett Firth to play too loudly in tutti passages [altho, to his credit, Firth played too loudly in tune]. Such was the ensemble heard in perfunctory performances of the Hindemith and Brahms symphonies, the former almost as smoothed-out as a Karajan reading. But the Brahms wasn't even smooth; playing was rough-edged in an intellectually anesthetized run-thru.

With the years Steinberg's beat and body English have become more eccentric as his concern for expressive details has grown increasingly lacunose. His Ravel accompaniment succeeded a lot of the time in blanketing the soloist—not, however, the debit this might have been were the player another than Alexis Weissenberg, or the piano a better specimen. It was, in fact, a dog of an instrument with a tone as brittle as dry-roasted nuts.

Weissenberg's approach was digitally flawless even at speeds faster, especially in the first movement, than ever the composer intended. But otherwise his playing was ice-cold, as barren of expression and innocent of breathing in music as a windup toy.

That Ravel was basically a classicist may have been the musical premise from which Weissenberg worked, tho Steinberg was obliviously conducting "Nights in the Gardens of Gershwin." But to play the G major Concerto as Weissenberg did, with an undeviating absence of expression, is mere perversity.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 1972

Longhair music

The announcement that Seiji Ozawa will become the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director next season has drawn criticism from some music lovers. Two BSO subscribers were quoted in a Boston Globe survey as follows: "I wish he would cut his hair . . . there's just something about his round face and straight, slinky hair," and "That hair flopping up and down drives me crazy. It gets between me and the music."

The BSO management is planning to meet this problem head on. We have learned from confidential and highly impeachable sources that Ozawa's opening program will make use of subliminal vibes to soften the audience's attitude. We have obtained an advance proof sheet of the proposed program, smuggled out of the print shop that handles the Symphony printing, and while we are mindful of the flap that followed publication of the Pentagon Papers and other classified material, we feel an obligation to share this information with our readers.

Here's what's in store for music lovers at Ozawa's first concert in his new post:

Night on Bald Mountain .... Moussorgsky
Barber of Seville ..... Rossini
Samson and Delilah, Overture
Saint-Saens
Selections from "Hair"
Intermission
Hary Janosch ..... Kodaly
Concerto #2 ..... Barber
George Shearing, soloist
Maid With the Flaxen Hair ..... Debussy
Airs from "Pompadour" ..... M. Sagoff

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

FEB 3 1972

Seiji Ozawa to Assume Boston Symphony Baton

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa, the diminutive, colorful conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday announced he would add the Boston Symphony to his responsibilities in an arrangement putting him at the helm of two of the country's major orchestras.

* * *

"I am not changing my job at all," the 36-year-old Japanese-born conductor said in an address to his San Francisco musicians.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know now that I can do it . . . I need your help and your cooperation."

Ozawa said he would take over the music directorship of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season, but will drastically cut down his North American guest appearances in order to maintain his responsibilities in San Francisco.

San Francisco is considered one of the country's most improved orchestras in the last 10 years, and Boston is a first-line symphony, one of the top five in the nation.

Osawa said he, his wife Vera and their new daughter Seira, born Dec. 29, will continue to live in San Francisco, and he intends to remain after his present contracts ends in 1976.

He said he would appear briefly in Boston next season as music advisor and will continue to serve as co-artistic director of the Tanglewood Music Festival, the Boston Symphony's summer home, a post he has held since 1970.

* * *

In Boston, Ozawa will take over from William Steinberg, who has been interim director since the resignation of Eric Leinsdorf in August of 1969. Steinberg will contique as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Ozawa began an association with the Boston Symphony in 1960 when he attended the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. There he won the Koussevitzky Prize as the most promising conducting student.

It was expected that the Boston Symphony will also announce the appointment of Michael Tilson Thomas, 27, as principal guest conductor.

Ozawa said he would devote equal time to each of the American orchestra starting with the 1973-74 season.

The diminutive Ozawa took over the San Francisco Symphony in the 1970-71 season and has been a resounding success, with his raffish image, energetic style on the podium and his thick, shoulder-length black hair.

A native of Hoten, Japan, he apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years before coming to San Francisco.

The San Francisco Symphony Association, which called a hasty news conference Tuesday to deny news reports that Ozawa would leave San Francisco if he took the Boston offer, said the two-orchestra arrangement was eminently satisfactory.

"I can think of no finer tribute to this great leader than to have these two major orchestras through which to express his unequalled musicanship," said Philip S. Boone, president.

DUNKIRK, N. Y.
OBSERVER
D. 12,000

FEB 3 1972

BOSTON: Tokyo-trained Seiji Ozawa, 36, will be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-1974 season. During the 1972-73 season, he will hold the title of music advisor. As music director, Ozawa will be principal conductor, but Boston will share his services with the San Francisco Symphony where he has been musical director since 1970.—(UPI).

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
D. 13,000

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa New Director Of Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

n addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
D. 32,000

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

San Francisco Conductor To Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music adviser" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recording sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 466,405 SUN. 557,315

FEB 3 1972

Ozawa Will Direct Symphonies In Boston and San Francisco

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday named Seiji Ozawa music director beginning with the 1973-74 season.

The 35-year-old Japanese-born conductor will continue as music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, where he has just signed a three-year contract. Both contracts extend through 1976.

RAN TANGLEWOOD

Ozawa left Philadelphia to attend the press conference at Boston's Symphony Hall. He is midway through a three-week engagement with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Symphony officials said that Ozawa will take the title of musical adviser beginning with this fall's season. He began his association with the Boston Symphony two seasons ago when he became director of the summer season of concerts at Tanglewood.

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . double duties

Ozawa told the press that he will be able to manage both posts because of the different demands of their schedules. The San Francisco Symphony plays 10 weeks in the San Francisco Opera House in October, November and December. This opens that period for his work in Boston.

He will divide the rest of the season between the two orchestras and conduct some concerts at Tanglewood.

monic in Tokyo, where he

DIRECTS IN TOKYO

He reserves time each year to lead the Japan Philhar-

also holds the title of music director, but he will spend less time in Tokyo with his new assignment, he said.

Ozawa succeeds William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, who had led the Boston Symphony for three seasons on a caretaker basis while the orchestra scouted for a permanent music director. Steinberg asked to be relieved of the position effective this spring.

ENDS SPECULATION

Ozawa's appointment stills speculation that has raged since Erich Leinsdorf left as music director in 1969.

Steinberg's associate, 23-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, had been touted as the front-runner. Thomas has made records with the Boston Symphony and led the ensemble extensively at home and on tour. Last fall, he began his tenure as music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic while continuing as associate conductor of the Bostonians.

Others who had been named as possible appointees were Colin Davis, English conductor and music director of the Covent Garden Opera, and Claudio Abbado, La Scala's music director with whom the Boston Symphony had also made recordings in recent years.

RECORDING A PROBLEM

Ozawa seems to provide the qualities which the Boston Symphony had not found in a conductor since Charles Munch retired in 1962. Symphony sources said Ozawa has the charisma to attract new audiences and the maturity to hold them. Whether he will be able to return the Bostonians to the recording field is one of his problems.

Musicians with whom he plays have praised his rhythmic gifts and his strong sense of finely balanced ensemble. In rehearsal, players call him by his first name and find little of the traditional orchestra relationship with him.

Ozawa's wife, Vera, is a Russian-Japanese writer and former model in Japan. They have a daughter, Seira, born in January.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 97,539

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa to Direct Boston Symphony

Los Angeles Times-Washington Post News Service

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced the appointment yesterday of Seiji Ozawa, 36, as its new music director. He replaces William Steinberg in one of music's top jobs.

Michael Tilson Thomas, currently associate conductor of the orchestra as well as the Buffalo Philhármonic's director, and Colin Davis, musical director of London's Royal Opera, were named principal guest conductors.

Beginning with the 1973-1974 season, Boston will share Ozawa's services with the San Francisco Symphony, where he has been music director since 1970. Ozawa's San Francisco contract recently has been extended through 1976.

Ozawa's initial contract with the Boston Symphony is for the three-year period customary in such arrangements, also until 1976. He will continue as co-director with Gunther Schuller of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and Festival, a post he has held since 1970.

Because of previous commitments, Ozawa will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony for only one week during the 1972-73 season. It was announced, however, that he would serve as music adviser for that year.

While a music director is principal conductor and in charge of planning the season as a whole, including the choosing of guest conductors and soloists, the title of music adviser is somewhere between vague and meaningless, used by orchestras temporarily without a music director in lieu of having someone in full charge.

Beginning in 1973, Ozawa will confine his work in North America to the San Francisco and Boston Symphonies. In his first year as music director he will conduct the Boston Symphony for 10 weeks, and then more in subsequent seasons.

Thomas's title of associate conductor falls vacant with his change of status. Davis is known to have been the trustees' first choice after Brich Leinsdorf announced his resignation in December, 1967, but Davis could not be persuaded to accept the post. He is in Boston this week as guest conductor with the symphony.

UPI Telephoto

Seiji Ozawa

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,661

FEB 3 1972

Seiji Ozawa Takes On Boston Too

#6

Seiji Ozawa, the diminutive, colorful conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, yesterday announced he would add the Boston Symphony to his responsibilities in an arrangement putting him at the helm of two of the country's major orchestras.

The 36-year-old Japanese-born conductor told his San Francisco musicians, "It took me two months to decide, but I know now that I can do it . . . I need your help and your cooperation."

Ozawa said he would take over the music directorship of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season, but will drastically cut down his North American guest appearances in order to maintain his responsibilities in San Francisco.

San Francsco is considered one of the country's most improved orchestras in the last 10 years, and Boston is a first-line symphony, one of the top five in the nation.

He said he would appear briefly in Boston next season as music advisor and will continue to serve as co-artistic director of the Tanglewood Music Festival, the Boston Symphony's summer home, a post he has held since 1970.

In Boston, Ozawa will take over from William Steinberg, who has been interim director since the resignation of Eric Leinsdorf in August of 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

It was expected that the Boston Symphony will also announce the appointment of Michael Tilson Thomas, 27, as principal guest conductor. —From UPI.

TORONTO, ONT ,CANADA
STAR
D. 488 073

FEB 3 1972

Boston Symphony hires Ozawa

BOSTON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa, 36, as its new music director.

Beginning with the 1973-1974 season, Boston will share Ozawa's services with the San Francisco Symphony, where he has been music director since 1970. Ozawa's San Francisco contract recently has been extended through 1976. Ozawa was at one time music director of the Toronto Symphony.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,993 SUN. 867,810

FEB 3 1972

Maestro Ozawa Has Two Jobs, Boston and San Francisco

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday named Seiji Ozawa as music director beginning with the 1973-74 season.

The 35-year-old Japanese-born conductor will continue as music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, where he had just signed a new three-year contract. Both contracts extend through 1976. Ozawa is conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra for the next two weeks.

Ozawa began his association with Boston two seasons ago when he became director of the BSO's summer season at Tanglewood.

In his new post, he succeeds William Steinberg, who had jointly directed the Pittsburgh and Boston Symphonies. Steinberg resigned the position effective at the end of the current season.

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . double duties

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 848,132 S. 1,407,549

FEB 3 1972

Ozawa Leads the Philadelphia In Concert With Gagaku Group

By DONAL HENAHAN

Is there a more consistently exciting conductor unnder 40 these days than Seiji Ozawa? One could easily doubt it after Mr. Ozawa's work at the head of the Philadelphia Orchestra Tuesday night at Philharmonic Hall. The 36-year-old Japanese musician led a stylistically mixed program that kept one absorbed from start to end.

It was an odd program on the face of it, offering rackety Verdi (Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers") and precise but highly charged Tchaikovsky (the "Pathétique" Symphony). But the most peculiar item was Maki Ishii's "So-Gu II," which went further toward repudiating Kipling's cliche about East and West than any such work one can recall hearing recently. The half-hour score proved to be a kind of encounter session between the Philadelphia Orchestra and a 10-member Gagaku ensemble, in full costume.

Gagaku, a program note told us, means refined, correct music, and also specifically designates the classical chamber music of the Japanese court. The Gagaku ensemble, a solemn group that went at its work with ritualistic intensity, sat at one side of the stage, looking like something out of a Hiroshige print.

Intermingled Ideas

With Mr. Ozawa intermediating skillfully, Japanese and Western musicians traded and intermingled ideas that seemed initially antagonistic but came together startlingly well. Western flutes played Oriental-style microtones, strings on both sides slid up and down in glissando patterns reminiscent of Xenakis, percussion roared in the falling-kitchenware manner of Messiaen. The effect was neither Easter nor Western but post-Webern and international contemporary, circa 1972.

The Gagaku ensemble, playing sho (mouth organ), biwa (lute), koto (zither crossed with surfboard) and various flutes, took over occasionally for soloistic interludes, rather like the concertino group in a baroque concerto grosso. Sometimes the orchestra sustained eerie tones or cluster chords while the Japanese band took the lead.

The musical quality of the score itself may not match, of course, the effectiveness of this theatrically tinged performance. The sight of such diverse-looking musicians interacting helped evoke a strangely touching mood of ancient formality and biting modernity.

But Mr. Ishii skill at orchestrating and at balancing instruments could not be sympathetic care reinforced and emphasied its culture-bridging power.

Named by Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has appointed Seiji Ozawa as music director beginning with the 1973-74 season. Mr. Ozawa, who has been artistic director of the orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood since 1970, will serve as the Boston Symphony music adviser for the 1972-73 season, during which prior commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly.

He will remain music director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post to which he was appointed in 1970, even after taking up full duties with the Boston. Beginning in 1973, he will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the two orchestras he will be serving as music director and principal conductor.

Colin Davis, the English conductor, and Michael Tilson Thomas, present associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, have been appointed principal guest conductors of the orchestra for the immediate future.

Mr. Ozawa made his first visit to the United States in 1960 as a student conductor at Tanglewood. He was invited there by Charles Munch after he had won the 1959 Conducting Competition at Besancon. His first major North American conducting engagement was with the San Francisco Symphony in 1962. During the 1964-65 season he was an assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic. He has since served as music director of the Ravinia festival, the Toronto Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic and as guest conductor of most of the major orchestras of the world.q He has made recordings with the orchestras of Boston and Chicago, the London Symphony Orchestra and the Orchestra de Paris.

NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.
D. 15,205
FEB 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Music Director At San Francisco Joins Boston Symphony In 1973

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008
FEB 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Ozawa To Head Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa , 36, Manchurian born conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973, the Boston orchestra announced yesterday.

Ozawa, who will continue as music director in San Francisco, will effectively join the Boston Symphony this summer, but he will hold the title "music advisor" for the first year.

He replaces William Steinberg, who retires this summer as music director of the Boston Symphony after serving three years.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
D. 14,019
FEB 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Ozawa to Replace Steinberg As Boston Symphony Conductor

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 114,000
FEB 3 1972
New England Newsclip

UPI

New Director Of Boston Symphony

Tokyo-trained Seiji Ozawa, 36, will be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the 1973-74 season. During the 1972-73 season he will hold the title of music adviser. As music director, Ozawa will be principal conductor, but Boston will share his services with the San Francisco Symphony where he has been musical director since 1970.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225
FEB 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Ozawa to be director of Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
FEB 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston — (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, Manchurian born conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective in 1973, the Boston orchestra announced yesterday.

Ozawa, who will continue as music director in San Francisco, will effectively join the Boston Symphony this summer, but he will hold the title "music adviser" for the first year.

He replaces William Steinberg, who retires this summer as music director of the Boston Symphony after serving three years.

Ozawa became music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970, coming from a job as music director of the symphony in Toronto, Canada. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

Born at Hoten, Manchuria Ozawa was educated at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, Japan.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa began his appearances as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in 1964 and has made several appearances as conductor since.

Ozawa, who served for one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic, has conducted the Boston Symphony during several recording sessions.

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 149,649
FEB 3 1972
New England Newsclip

Ozawa to Direct 2 Orchestras

San Francisco — (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the prestigious Boston Symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it . . . I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians Wednesday.

The diminutive, Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home here with his wife Vera and their month-old daughter Seira, and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa, 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him an instant success with San Franciscans.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg, who has been the interimdirector since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Chairman of the Massachusetts committee to elect New York Cong. Shirley Chisholm to the presidency is, according to the records on file in State Sec. Jack Davoren's office, new Cambridge City Councilor Saundra Graham . . . Members of the BSO couldn't find a card big enough to hold all their signatures for presentation to new associate conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, so they arranged to have a three-sheet one, about 3 by 8 feet, printed with this message: "Highest Critical Acclaim and Congratulations for Opus 1 — Seira." Seira's the first Ozawa child, born six weeks ago. She starts with a sizable collection of autographs . . . Pitched on the floor of Mayor White's office when members of the Greater Boston Real Estate Board entered for a private meeting was a "sleep-two" tent — which they thought might be a cryptic message about high rents — until His Honor explained it was a wedding gift to his close aide, Bob Weinberg, who's a camper-type. His bride had better be, too . . . Negotiators for Boston Carmen's Local 589 are expected to recommend, unanimously, Thursday evening that the membership accept the MBTA's latest offer. What it contains remains undisclosed.

Harold Banks

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 110,602
FEB 10 1972
New England Newsclip

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE.
D. 29,772

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Mod Conductor Appointed Boston Symphony Maestro

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seija Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the presitigious Boston Symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it ... I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians Wednesday.

The move puts him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras—the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions.

The diminutive, Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home here with his wife Vera and their month-old daughter Seira and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa, 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him a instant success with San Francisco.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg who has been the interim director since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Keats Kolumn

Archie Bunker and his All in the Family show tops the latest poll and is one being retained for next Fall's schedule . . . sports TV shows are rarely effected . . . and is Dean Martin's show in its last season? . . .

By the way, how are the Gamblers Anonymous progressing? . . . Any word on the new Director of Athletics at University of Massachusetts? . . . I'd guess it will happen in mid or late March . . . about 700 applications were received, some outside the university and some within the university . . .

Apparently, it will take another rags-to-riches performance by the S-Kings to repeat last year's AHL Calder Cup victory . . . this year's playoff system, the best one yet, will get under way early in April . . . each set is allowed 12 days to be completed . . .

Both swing a club — one a big one and the other a small one . . . and they have a fast-growing friendship . . . one is Fran Healy, Holyoke man who is the SF Giants No. 2 catcher and the other is Seija Osawa who has just accepted the conductor's post with the Boston Symphony Orchestra . . . remember how they met last summer and Healy did a thesis on the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra for his term paper at AIC? . . . that's where the friendship started . . . Healy swings a big club—baseball bat—and Osawa a little bat—his baton—yet his little bat has even greater control over close to 100 musicians than Healy's bat does against opposing National League pitchers . . . of course, Osawa doesn't have to be on the alert and duck the "close ones" . . .

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

SEIJA OZAWA, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the Boston Symphony, he announced Wednesday.

PAGE ONE

THE MOVE PUTS him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras — the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions. The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
D. 5,003

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa to head Boston Symphony

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seija Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the presitigious Boston Symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it ... I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians Wednesday.

The move puts him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras—the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions.

The diminutive, Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home here with his wife Vera and their month-old daughter Seira and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him an instant success with San Franciscans.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg, who has been the interim director since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969, Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

SUN-CHRONICLE
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,500

FEB 3 1972

New England News

Successor To Steinberg Announced

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

EAGLE TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
D. 18,000

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

New music director for Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964.

SANTA ROSA, CALIF.
PRESS DEMOCRAT
D. 45,500 S. 47,500

FEB 3 1972

New Director For Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

SEIJI OZAWA, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the Boston Symphony. Ozawa said he will assume the Boston position beginning with the 1973-74 season but will continue to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco. It's the first time one maestro has held two such positions.

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 20,300

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

New Thomas Role Won't Have Effect On Philharmonic

Michael Tilson Thomas' status as conductor and music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra will be unaffected by his appointment as a principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Robert I. Millonzi, chairman of the Philharmonic's Music Advisory Committee, said today.

Mr. Thomas, who in addition to being conductor and music director of he Buffalo Philharmonic had been associate conductor in Boston, leaves that post.

Mr. Millonzi said that Mr. Thomas' new post with the Boston Symphony "will have no effect on us whatsoever."

Next year's concert schedule is already completed, he said.

Besides Mr. Thomas' new Boston appointment, the Boston Symphony has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director for the 1973-74 season.

He replaces William Steinberg, a former Buffalo Philharmonic conductor, who will devote full time to the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 281,982 SAT. 297,247

FEB 4 1972

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

FEB 3 1972

New Engl News

Ozawa Will Advise With BSO Consent

Seiji Ozawa will serve as "musical adviser" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this summer before taking over next year as music director, according to an announcement made yesterday in Boston.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," he said at a press conference.

Ozawa will confine his activities to the BSO and the San Francisco Symphony where he has a contract until 1976. He will devote more and more time each year to his Boston and Tanglewood activities.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,105 SUN. 311,112

FEB 4 1972

Buffalo Orchestra's Thomas Given Guest Post in Boston

PAGE ONE

Special to The Courier-Express

BOSTON, Mass.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as its new music director and Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor and music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra as well as associate conductor in Boston, becomes a principal guest conductor at Boston.

Ozawa, 36, will replace William Steinberg as music director at Boston in the 1973-74 season. Steinberg, a former conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic, will devote his full time to the Pittsburgh Symphony. He has divided his time between Pittsburgh and Boston.

Boston will share Ozawa's services with the San Francisco Symphony of which he has been music director since 1970. Ozawa has been given a three-year contract, to 1976, with the Boston Symphony. His San Francisco contract recently was extended through 1976.

Rated a Top Job

The Boston Symphony directorship is considered one of the music world's top jobs.

Joining Thomas as a principal guest conductor of the Boston orchestra in the reorganization is Colin Davis, musical director of London's Royal Opera.

Thomas was named to succeed Lukas Foss as director of the Buffalo Philharmonic last February and assumed his duties in Buffalo last October while continuing as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Retains Berkshire Post

Ozawa will continue as co-director with Gunther Schuller of the Boston orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and Festival, a post he has held since 1970.

Because of previous commitments, Ozawa will appear with the Boston Symphony, as a guest conductor, for only one week during the 1972-73 season.

Michael T. Thomas
. . . new role

He will serve as music adviser to the orchestra for that season, however.

Steinberg's tenure with the Boston orchestra ends next summer. Steinberg has decided that expanded demands of the Pittsburgh Symphony will require his full-time attention.

Thomas' title of associate conductor of the Boston orchestra falls vacant with his change of status.

Next year's Boston lineup of conductors, therefore, is Ozawa, music adviser; Thomas and Davis, principal guest conductors, and Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, continuing as assistant conductor.

Ozawa is a Manchurian-born, Tokyo-trained musician. He switched from piano to conducting because of a soccer injury to his hand. He was a student at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., in 1960 when he won the Koussevitzky Prize as the year's most promising student conductor. A year earlier he had won the International Conductors' Contest at Besancon, France. In 1964-65 he was Leonard Bernstein's assistant at the New York Philharmonic.

He held previous music directorships with Chicago's Ravinia Festival, the Toronto Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic.

HERALD
RUTLAND, VT.
D. 22,553

FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Musical Chairs

One morning this week a group, including strangers to the newsroom, was anxiously hovering over the Associated Press teletype machine. A veteran newsman noticed them and wondered if an earthquake or an assassin had struck somewhere in the world. It turned out they were reading the announcement of the professional football draft and swap of players. It seems the New England Patriots had acquired a hot defensive end and what have you. It was hot stuff, provoking growls, grunts and an occasional stifled shout.

But there was no similar flurry of excitement later in the week when word reached the hinterland that Seiji Ozawa had been named musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra starting in 1973-74, though any musician could tell you this was quite a bomb.

Ozawa at 36 fits the Boston orchestra's new accent on youth. Some of the orchestra's best notices this year and last have been for concerts led by Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, still in his twenties.

Ozawa is Manchurian born, Tokyo educated and Tanglewood trained. He switched from concert pianist to conductor because of a soccer injury to one hand. He is now musical director of the San Francisco Symphony, which post he will continue to serve, along with his new one, at least until 1976. He is a popular guest conductor with the major orchestras; only last Tuesday he led the Philadelphia orchestra in New York. He will have the interim title of musical adviser to the Boston orchestra next year, when the contract of the venerable William Steinberg ends.

Ozawa isn't the only one with two jobs or more. Thomas, the associate conductor, is also director of the Buffalo orchestra. But in this game of musical chairs he will become one of two "principal guest conductors" at Boston, the other being Colin Davis of the Covent Garden Opera in London. An airplane is almost a musical instrument these days.

In 1973 the Boston Symphony will have, you might say, a new quarterback, a couple of new linebackers, and a whole new ballgame.

DAILY NEWS RECORD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 25,000

FEB 4 1972

ACCENT ON YOUTH: Although Boston Symphony Orchestra has named Seiji Ozawa as new music director, beginning with 1973-74 season, that doesn't mean a chunk of top job won't still go to 27-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, as earlier reported. William Steinberg, who's retiring, is the BSO's music director and conductor. Announcement of Ozawa's appointment said he'd take music director's job—made no mention of conductor's post. It also specified that Ozawa, who will retain his current posts as conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, will conduct only 10 weeks a year in Boston through 1973-74 "and more in subsequent seasons." BSO promised more announcements over weekend. Ozawa is 36 years old. If he's teamed with Thomas, accent for the 90-year-old orchestra will definitely be on youth.

The Cleveland Press
D. 375,653

FEB 4 1972

Celebrities:

Yokoi gets back pay ($162)

Shoichi Yokoi, the Japanese soldier who hid in the caves of Guam for 27 years after World War II ended, returned to his homeland to learn that he will indeed receive all that back pay — 50,000 yen, or $162.

COLLEEN

Actor George Scott and actress Colleen Dewhurst were divorced in Santo Domingo under the Dominican Republic's new "quickie" divorce law.

Warrants charging attempted rape and assault were issued in Boston for George Peppard after Joan McLaughlin, 24, complained that the actor assaulted her in his hotel room Jan. 30. She has a bit part in a movie being filmed by Peppard in Boston.

Japanese-born Seiji Ozawa, 36, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will add to his responsibilities by becoming director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 966,293 SUN. 1,246,870

FEB 4 1972

Boston Symphony Fills Guest Conductor Posts

Michael Tilson Thomas and Colin Davis have been named principal guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The announcements came in conjunction with the confirmation this week of Seiji Ozawa's appointment as music director, replacing William Steinberg.

Beginning with the 1973-74 season, Boston will share Ozawa's services with the San Francisco Symphony, where he has been music director since 1970. Ozawa's San Francisco contract recently has been extended through 1976.

Ozawa's initial contract with the Boston Symphony is for the three-year period customary in such arrangements, also until 1976. He will continue as codirector with Gunther Schuller of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and Festival, a post he has held since 1970.

Because of previous commitments, Ozawa will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony for only one week during the 1972-73 season. It was announced, however, that he would serve as music adviser for that year.

While a music director is principal conductor and in charge of planning the season as a whole, including the choosing of guest conductors and soloists, the title of music adviser is somewhere between vague and meaningless, used by orchestras temporarily without a music director in lieu of having someone in full charge. Boston will thus be without a music director for a year, because Steinberg's tenure comes to an end this summer.

In his first year as music director, Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony for 10 weeks, and then more in subsequent seasons.

Thomas' present title of associate conductor of the orchestra falls vacant with his change of status. Davis, music director of the Boston Opera House Covent Garden, is known to have been the trustees' first choice after Erich Leinsdorf announced his resignation in December, 1967, but Davis could not be persuaded to accept the spot.

Next year's Boston setup for conductors, therefore, is Ozawa, music adviser; Davis and Thomas, principal guest conductors, and Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, continuing as assistant conductor.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 554,797

FEB 4 1972

New Baton Man for Boston

BOSTON (AP)—Seiji Ozawa, 36, conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973, the Boston orchestra has announced.

DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
D. 36,600

FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa Will Succeed Steinberg in Boston

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Francisco orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during, several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

SHOPPER NEWS
KEENE, N. H.
W. 21,800

FEB 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa New Director Of Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973/74 season.

During the coming season, 1972/73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as music advisor and continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

Ozawa is presently conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony. Wzawa will confide his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

In 1973/74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer.

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
D. 69,493

FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Have a New Director

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement this week said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recording sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

HERALD
RUTLAND, VT.
D. 22,553

FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Musical Chairs

One morning this week a group, including strangers to the newsroom, was anxiously hovering over the Associated Press teletype machine. A veteran newsman noticed them and wondered if an earthquake or an assassin had struck somewhere in the world. It turned out they were reading the announcement of the professional football draft and swap of players. It seems the New England Patriots had acquired a hot defensive end and what have you. It was hot stuff, provoking growls, grunts and an occasional stifled shout.

But there was no similar flurry of excitement later in the week when word reached the hinterland that Seiji Ozawa had been named musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra starting in 1973-74, though any musician could tell you this was quite a bomb.

Ozawa at 36 fits the Boston orchestra's new accent on youth. Some of the orchestra's best notices this year and last have been for concerts led by Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, still in his twenties.

Ozawa is Manchurian born, Tokyo educated and Tanglewood trained. He switched from concert pianist to conductor because of a soccer injury to one hand. He is now musical director of the San Francisco Symphony, which post he will continue to serve, along with his new one, at least until 1976. He is a popular guest conductor with the major orchestras; only last Tuesday he led the Philadelphia orchestra in New York. He will have the interim title of musical adviser to the Boston orchestra next year, when the contract of the venerable William Steinberg ends.

Ozawa isn't the only one with two jobs or more. Thomas, the associate conductor, is also director of the Buffalo orchestra. But in this game of musical chairs he will become one of two "principal guest conductors" at Boston, the other being Colin Davis of the Covent Garden Opera in London. An airplane is almost a musical instrument these days.

In 1973 the Boston Symphony will have, you might say, a new quarterback, a couple of new linebackers, and a whole new ballgame.

DAILY NEWS RECORD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 25,000

FEB 4 1972

ACCENT ON YOUTH: Although Boston Symphony Orchestra has named Seiji Ozawa as new music director, beginning with 1973-74 season, that doesn't mean a chunk of top job won't still go to 27-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, as earlier reported. William Steinberg, who's retiring, is the BSO's music director and conductor. Announcement of Ozawa's appointment said he'd take music director's job—made no mention of conductor's post. It also specified that Ozawa, who will retain his current posts as conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, will conduct only 10 weeks a year in Boston through 1973-74 "and more in subsequent seasons." BSO promised more announcements over weekend. Ozawa is 36 years old. If he's teamed with Thomas, accent for the 90-year-old orchestra will definitely be on youth.

The Cleveland Press
D. 375,653

FEB 4 1972

Celebrities:

Yokoi gets back pay ($162)

Shoichi Yokoi, the Japanese soldier who hid in the caves of Guam for 27 years after World War II ended, returned to his homeland to learn that he will indeed receive all that back pay — 50,000 yen, or $162.

COLLEEN

Actor George Scott and actress Colleen Dewhurst were divorced in Santo Domingo under the Dominican Republic's new "quickie" divorce law.

Warrants charging attempted rape and assault were issued in Boston for George Peppard after Joan McLaughlin, 24, complained that the actor assaulted her in his hotel room Jan. 30. She has a bit part in a movie being filmed by Peppard in Boston.

Japanese-born Seiji Ozawa, 36, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will add to his responsibilities by becoming director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 956,293 SUN. 1,246,870

FEB 4 1972

Boston Symphony Fills Guest Conductor Posts

Michael Tilson Thomas and Colin Davis have been named principal guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The announcements came in conjunction with the confirmation this week of Seiji Ozawa's appointment as music director, replacing William Steinberg.

Beginning with the 1973-74 season, Boston will share Ozawa's services with the San Francisco Symphony, where he has been music director since 1970. Ozawa's San Francisco contract recently has been extended through 1976.

Ozawa's initial contract with the Boston Symphony is for the three-year period customary in such arrangements, also until 1976. He will continue as codirector with Gunther Schuller of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and Festival, a post he has held since 1970.

Because of previous commitments, Ozawa will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony for only one week during the 1972-73 season. It was announced, however, that he would serve as music adviser for that year.

While a music director is principal conductor and in charge of planning the season as a whole, including the choosing of guest conductors and soloists, the title of music adviser is somewhere between vague and meaningless, used by orchestras temporarily without a music director in lieu of having someone in full charge. Boston will thus be without a music director for a year, because Steinberg's tenure comes to an end this summer.

In his first year as music director, Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony for 10 weeks, and then more in subsequent seasons.

Thomas' present title of associate conductor of the orchestra falls vacant with his change of status. Davis, music director of the Boston Opera House Covent Garden, is known to have been the trustees' first choice after Erich Leinsdorf announced his resignation in December, 1967, but Davis could not be persuaded to accept the spot.

Next year's Boston setup for conductors, therefore, is Ozawa, music adviser; Davis and Thomas, principal guest conductors, and Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, continuing as assistant conductor.

New York Post
D. 628,246 SUN. 554,797

FEB 4 1972

New Baton Man for Boston

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36, conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973, the Boston orchestra has announced.

DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
D. 36,600

FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa Will Succeed Steinberg in Boston

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Francisco orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

SHOPPER NEWS
KEENE, N. H.
W. 21,800

FEB 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa New Director Of Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973/74 season.

During the coming season, 1972/73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as music advisor and continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

Ozawa is presently conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony. Wzawa will confide his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

In 1973/74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer.

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
D. 69,493

FEB 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Have a New Director

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement this week said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recording sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

Ozawa's contract at San Francisco extends through 1976.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

"In 1973-74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 3 1972

New England Newsclip

The reaction:

It's unanimous (almost): they like Ozawa

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

What pleases professional musicians, trustees, composers, and the more liberal BSO-watchers when it comes to music directors may not necessarily make subscribers happy.

A quick survey of the reactions to Seiji Ozawa's appointment as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed unanimous pleasure among those who see no connection between fine music-making and long hair and ethnic origin.

Some of those contacted include:

WALTER PISTON, composer — "It's an excellent choice. I'm much pleased with Ozawa's progress and found his last concert (which included Bartok's "Miraculous Mandarin" Suite) really magnificent. I've been watching him ever since his apprenticeship with Leonard Bernstein in New York."

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, BSO Concertmaster — "I can't remember ever seeing a situation of an orchestra in which a conductor was so universally liked. We feel not only affection but the greatest admiration for Seiji. For instance, I have never seen anyone come into the first rehearsal of a piece with such a level of preparation as he does.

"At a performance of 'Cosi' (Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte") at Tanglewood, he conducted without a score and, at the very last moment there were several small changes in repeats and text made. He always knew exactly where he was in the text and was sensitive to the smallest detail of orchestral sound. Now that isn't just casual learning. I think we're very lucky."

LORNA COOKE DE VARON, conductor of New England Conservatory chorus. "Seiji is wonderful to work with. He has such equilibrium and is so lacking in destructive temperament. His selection is the most positive move the BSO has made in a long time.

"He couldn't have been more understanding and reassuring than in the situation confronting the chorus during the recording of 'Carmina Burana.' That was during the time of the big Washington marches and there was a lot of drama and soul-searching among those in the chorus who wanted to go to Washington. Seiji told them that if their consciences dictated they should go, they had his sympathy."

WALTER PISTON
. . . "much pleased"

DORIOT DWYER
. . . "very happy"

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
. . . great admiration

LONG-TIME BSO SUBSCRIBER WHO ASKED THAT HER NAME NOT BE USED — "Who's he?" After positive identification had been made, "I don't think he will wear well. I don't think we need an Oriental to conduct a western orchestra. The Orchestra plays western music. Also, I wish he would cut his hair. I'm not a bit against long hair, but there's just something about his round face and straight, slinky hair."

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH, concert pianist and frequent soloist with the BSO — "I think it's the greatest joy the Boston Symphony could have. I've had marvelous musical experiences with him. We did the Mozart C-major concerto in San Francisco and it was as beautiful as always with him. And his programs — he is so open to new music and he has such a good eye for good new composers. At the same time he is strong in every time and idiom. His Mozart and Beethoven are marvelous; in romantic music he is also great. He has such vitality and intensity without sentimentality."

IKUKO MIZUNO, BSO violinist — "I'm obviously very happy. The position is certainly well-deserved. Also because I am Japanese. I've known Seiji for a long time — more than 15 years. We went to the same school. He was the first to graduate from it (the school is very new) and I came seven or eight years later. He conducted the student orchestra many times and I played under him then."

MRS. CHARLES C. GRAY, another long-time subscriber who remembers Monteux concerts — "I'm disappointed. I would have preferred Thomas (Michael Tilson Thomas). I think Ozawa is fine, though. He is a good musician. I liked him better when he first came. Now that his hair is long he looks like a Japanese doll. That hair flopping up and down drives me crazy. It gets between me and the music. I'm going to reserve my judgment."

DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER, BSO principal flute — "I'm very, very happy and I think most of the orchestra is."

WILLIAM STEINBERG, BSO Music Director who is stepping down — "Congratulations to everyone and best wishes for continued success of great music-making."

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 5 1972

New England Newsclip

An Impressive Appointment

We imagine that most Bostonians who are concerned about the future of the Boston Symphony were pleased with the recent announcement of Seiji Ozawa's appointment as that orchestra's music director, beginning with the 1973-74 season. Congratulations are due the Symphony trustees on the successful outcome of their arduous search. We doubt that they could have found a more distinguished appointee than the imaginative and gifted Mr. Ozawa.

Though only 36 years old, he comes to the position highly acclaimed by his fellow musicians and with an impressive fund of experience. Most important of all, he becomes music director with the whole-hearted support and approval of the people he will be working with, the musicians of the BSO. We expect he will be an enlivening influence on the musical life of Boston and we extend him our most cordial welcome.

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,571

FEB 4 1972

At the Academy

Great Ovation for Ozawa

By JAMES FELTON
Of The Bulletin Staff

SEIJI OZAWA, guest conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra this week, received one of the greatest ovations given in the Academy of Music within memory, last night.

At the close of Gustav Mahler's First Symphony ("The Titan"), this 35-year-old native of Japan was saluted first by the players themselves, who stamped their feet and almost clapped their palms off.

This electric moment was also one to mark a milestone. For only two days ago Ozawa was named director of the Boston Symphony, becoming the first Oriental named to head one of this country's Big Five elite orchestras. (The others are in New York, Cleveland, Chicago, and, of course, here).

• • •

OZAWA KEPT trying to yank players up to take a bow and once in a while he took a modest solo bow, as he was recalled endless times by the audience standing on the ground floor and in all the tiers, whistling and shouting joyful shouts.

Ozawa may look like an adorable teen-ager with long black hair and black tails, but he led a stunning performance of the Mahler with a slowly gathering power that erupted in great fanfares of brass and incredibly beautiful work by every section of the orchestra.

Leading from memory, Ozawa used catlike gestures to build up the music's increasing tensions with a soft but driving, relentless force. It was the work of a great conductor and a great orchestra. Certainly it was the most brilliant and moving performance of the "Titan" I have ever heard. The articulation of details alone was staggering.

• • •

EVERYTHING WENT so well one felt inclined to forgive the insertion of the recently-found "Blumine" movement which Mahler first included before editing it out after reflection. The "Blumine," a fifth movement, was inspired by Mahler's crush on a singer, which becomes a bit too sugary and certainly doesn't stand with the other already-teeming four movements.

But this performance, delivered with a velvet punch, was that one in a thousand that finds leader and players caught up in an act of stupendous power and beauty.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 132,687

FEB 6 1972

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Names Ozawa as Music Director

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

Seiji Ozawa has been named music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-74 season.

The 36-year old conductor replaces William Steinberg, who has allowed his Boston tenure to expire in order to work more with the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Boston will share Ozav with the San Francisc Symphony, where he has contract through 1976.

As is customary, Ozawa's initial Boston contract runs three years, to 1976.

British conductor Colin Davis and the Boston's Associate Conductor Colin Tilson Thomas have been named principal guest conductors for next year to tide the orchestra over.

Thomas is also music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic.

His associate conductor post falls vacant with his appointment as principal guest conductor.

Davis, who was the trustees' principal choice after Erich Leinsdorf announced his resignation in 1967, and could not accept the post, is music director of the Covent Garden Opera.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 536,108 SUN. 709,123

FEB 6 1972

Long-haired Seiji

By Duston Harvey

SEIJI OZAWA

A few strands of gray have appeared in conductor Seiji Ozawa's shoulder-length black hair. But no one — certainly not the directors of the San Francisco Symphony — has suggested that the real "long hair" of the classical music world get his locks trimmed.

Since the 36-year-old Ozawa took the baton from aging Josef Krips at the start of the 1970-71 season, the local orchestra's ticket sales have jumped dramatically.

Ozawa's raffish image, his swaying, bouncing vibrancy on the podium and his consummate musicianship have endeared him to both students and dowagers. The student-dominated Wednesday night concerts in San Francisco are a season-long sell-out, and sales for all concerts, including the Thursday matinees favored by well-to-do matrons, are running at record levels.

OZAWA, WHOSE musical tastes run from European classical to Oriental to rock and roll, also conducts the Japanese Philharmonic, co-directs the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Summer Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., makes regular guest appearance throughout the world and records with some of the nation's top symphonies.

He recently extended his original three-year contract as San Francisco's conductor and musical director for another three seasons — through 1976-77—and said he was "cutting down" some of his other activities. Yet now he has agreed to be musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well, starting with the 1973-1974 season.

A NATIVE of Hoten, Japan, who apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years, Ozawa strode into his annual San Francisco news conference recently in his usual street garb: Unkempt, long, black hair, sprinkled with a few strands of gray, a shaggy, off-white, knee-length Mongolian lamb coat, a thin blue silk jacket, blue turtleneck shirt, beads, faded blue jeans, white socks and black sandals.

In his heavily-accented and carefully chosen English, Ozawa talked about the state of classical music today and his ubiquitous musical tastes.

"We heard a few years ago that classical music is dead," he said. "I thought it might be true. But now it is coming to more people's ears. Life is more difficult, so music is more important.

"It comes from God to bring joy to people. They come to the concert to enjoy it."

OZAWA ADDED that he personally enjoys good rock and roll and said that a concert last year with a blues band worked very well.

"But it is dangerous," he added. "One orchestra tried it with a rock and roll band. When a band doesn't care about the sound, it can be disastrous."

When music critics complained about his orchestra's standard repertory, Ozawa said finding good new music is difficult and, besides, he wasn't Leonard Bernstein.

"His language is so good. He goes out and tells them this is the greatest piece. And they believe it," Ozawa said. "But with my language?"

Ozawa smiled. A student then asked him about his hair style.

"I hope you are not questioning why my hair is black," he said. "But length? I don't know. I didn't like to go to the barber shop from the beginning. Always I cut it myself, or my mother, and now my wife. It got longer and longer, I think."

(UPI)

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

FEB 5 1972

New England Newsclip

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 701,743

FEB 6 1972

The Music Beat . . . With James Felton

U.S. Music Scene Has an Eastern Look

"OH, East is East, and West is West, And never the twain shall meet."

When poet Rudyard Kipling penned those famous lines, he was seeing the world through the eyes of British colonialism, which could boast that the sun never set on the British flag.

If he could see the present great invasion of Western classical music by Orientals, he would say that he had surely dreamed the wrong dream.

Just two weeks ago Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa presided over the first known attempt to "marry" Eastern and Western music with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

• •

LAST WEEK, Ozawa was named conductor of the Boston Symphony, beginning the 1973-74 season. He is presently conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, which is closer and more receptive to Oriental influences than East Coast orchestras.

With that orchestra, he gave the first American performance of his compatriot Maki Ishii's work, called "So-Gu II."

When Ozawa brought the work here, hardly two weeks ago, "So-Gu II" was reported over national wire services as well as in the local press. Interest centered on the 10 gowned Japanese brought from their homeland as a Gagaku, or chamber music group.

Seiji Ozawa

. . . first Oriental to head major American orchestra

This group literally sat in with the Philadelphia Orchestra on stage and played their shrill wind instruments and plucked their stringed instruments in a reconstruction of ancient Japanese court music.

Wisely, I think, Ishii didn't try to blend both groups in some hybrid style. Each played its own music. They only collided by accident, in the hope of reaching some common ground where Eastern and Western music would sound good together. Ishii's score for orchestra was as advanced as any Western music is today, and full of fantastic color.

Ozawa is dynamic and wide in musical tastes. Regarding East and West, it can be said that he has the benefit of both, and a youthful, unprejudiced outlook. He is becoming a dominant influence in this country, and his Boston Symphony post will make him even more of a musical power.

Zubin Mehta, the Indian-born Parsee, is another powerhouse. His post as director of the Los Angeles Symphony again reflects the sympathetic attitude toward Orientals on the West Coast.

• • •

WITHOUT LEAVING the conductors' list, Ling Tung, born in Shanghai and living now in Bethayres, has become a patient and tireless Chinese who has drunk deeply at the well of Western music. Tung conducts the Philharmonic Orchestra annually in the Academy of Music and in places like Jackson Hole, Wyo., where he directs a summer music program. Tung, like many others, has all the zeal and devotion of the convert.

I can't list all the well-trained Orientals we are seeing more of on our concert stages due to lack of space. Last week alone the doll-like Korean violinist Kyung Wha Chung was splendid in the Sibelius Concerto, played with the London Symphony Orchestra.

This week Ozawa will introduce a Japanese pianist, Yuki Takahashi, who is also an avant-garde composer.

With some Orientals — Mehta, for example, — it even seems that they understand and can get more out of Western music than we do ourselves. The invasion from the East, begun after World War II, is coming now in wave after wave. Eastern enthusiasm is bombing Westerners out of complacency and pouring new excitement into our classics. In that way, Kipling's "twain" seems to be meeting after all.

As I Hear It

Bigamy Again

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

AMERICA DEMANDS high fidelity in its music but tolerates bigamy in its orchestras. Seiji Ozawa is to be the new musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but he is to be allowed to retain the analogous post he already holds with the San Francisco Orchestra.

This is no unique situation. There is such a paucity of charismatic conductors, that is of the kind not necessarily qualified solely by competence, that boards of trustees are forced and patently contented to share a man with another mistress. Boston has that situation already in the case of its incumbent, William Steinberg, who has also been musical director of Pittsburgh. And Boulez, Colin Davis and Andre Previn — to name but a few others—are equally ambi-dirextrous.

It is far from a routine matter to engage a musical director. The orchestras are much like the daughters of royalty for whom matches are usually arranged and they are always on the lookout for "catches."

* * * *

OZAWA and Boston have long been on very friendly and familiar terms so that the nuptials will require no great ceremony and little protocol. It sounds like a wise and fruitful promissory note.

When the orchestra was organized by Henry Higginson in 1881, the first conductor was George Henschel, a vocalist originally but a man of broad and comprehensive musical vision. He was followed down through the years by Wilhelm Gericke, Artur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Gericke for a second term—this time for eight years—Karl Muck, Max Fiedler (an uncle of "Pops" Arthur), Muck for a second term of eight years, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux. Then, for those who became Berkshire "natives" by reason of the establishment of Tanglewood, there were Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf, and Steinberg.

* * * *

THERE ARE several qualifications which a musical director must have. One is not generally apparent but that, naturally after and above basic competence, is a repertory. A young man can beat time in front of the orchestra in almost anything, but to "know" a work, to have X-rayed it and palpated its innards, is another matter. One of the troubles for a guest conductor, who is not allowed adequate rehearsal time, is that very often he must stand in front of the musicians and no matter what gyrations he performs, they play as they played for the last, and regular, conductor.

Koussevitzky stayed on for twenty-five years. All the others held the post for much shorter terms. Munch was at the helm for 13 years, Leinsdorf for seven. The reasons for which each one left were always individual, but Leinsdorf insisted that a full year's programming, now that the orchestra had a 52-week season, was just too much. For a conscientious artist the problem of preparing so many new and contrasted concerts is a tremendously onerous task. That is the reason guest conductors are invited, not solely to relieve the incumbent, but also to bring new and unfamiliar works. There is no man, no matter how well he knows the orchestral literature, who can satisfy himself in the complete repertory.

* * * *

KARL MUCK came to Boston in 1906, departed for four years and came back in 1912 for another six years. Muck was a German and America retrogressed to a sort of patriotic infantility in those war years. Muck refused to play the national anthem, and anyone German in those years was prima facie personna non grata (or vice versa, if we are to write Latin) and he was asked to go.

As America now is discussing candidates for the various party presidential nominations, everyone became an arbiter of Muck's successor. It was high sport to mock Germany in those days and when one said "Hock the Kaiser," a very witty turn of "Hoch der Kaiser," everyone was inwardly gratified that he had delivered a solar plexus to the enemy. Names were thrown in the hopper and among them, according to Carl Engle, then director of the music division of the Library of Congress, someone suggested Ernest Bloch, the Swiss-American composer. "No," said the chorus," we want nobody whose name ends in och." "How about Foch?" someone suggested. In any case, Rabaud was brought over for a single year, until Monteux came for one of the orchestra's resplendent periods.

* * * *

OZAWA IS a Berkshire Music Center product. The school to complement the orchestral concerts of the Tanglewood season was Koussevitzky's dream. The alacrity with which he and the orchestra accepted the invitation of the Berkshire Festival in 1936 to fill in, where Henry Hadley two years previously had inaugurated the summer concerts, was motivated in no little degree by the opportunity the summer schedule afforded their conductor to fulfill his lifelong visions.

Because we are so close to the trees, we may not see the true dimensions of the Berkshire Music Center forest, but the catalogue of its accomplishments reaches to international limits in its scope. The election now of one of its graduates to the topmost post of honor is of especial significance. It would be a mark of tremendous requital if the director-designate would apply as much energy to the Center as his mentor, an interest which the directors, since Koussevitzky, have allowed in some measure to deliquesce.

TIMES REPORTER
BELLOWS FALLS, VT.
D. 6,320

FEB 5 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa to direct Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
D. 41,749

FEB 4 1972

New Englan Newscl

Maestro Has Two Batons

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seija Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the prestigious Boston symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it ...I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians.

The move puts him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras — the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions.

The diminutive, Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home here with his wife Vera and their month-old daughter Seira and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa, 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him an instant success with San Franciscans.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg, who has been the interim director since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

FEB 7 1972

New England Newsclip

NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR — Tokyo-trained Seiji Ozawa, 36, will be the new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-74 season. During the 1972-73 season he will hold the title of music advisor. As music director, Ozawa will be principal conductor but will divide his conducting services between Boston and the San Francisco Symphony where he has been musical director since 1970. (UPI Photo)

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 5 1972

New England Newsclip

NEW ENGLAND NEWS ROUNDUP

The Boston Symphony announced Wednesday that 36-year-old Seiji Ozawa, music director of the San Francisco Symphony, will become music director of the Boston orchestra at the beginning of the 1973-74 season.

OZAWA

He will replace William Steinberg who is retiring at the end of the current season.

Ozawa will serve as music advisor to the orchestra in the 1972-73 season.

He will retain his San Francisco post and his post as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Ozawa will devote at least 10 weeks of the regular season to the Boston Symphony. To do this he will confine his North American appearances exclusively to Boston and San Francisco.

LEVITTOWN, PA.
COURIER TIMES
D. 50,000

FEB 7 1972

MUSIC DIRECTOR — Tokyo-trained Seiji Ozawa, 36 named music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-74 season, will hold the title of music advisor for the 1972-73 season.

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
D. 5,003

FEB 7 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa 'very excited' about leading Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters. It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next season. He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "too tired of me."

The symphony officially announced other conducters during 1972-73 will be Michael Tilson Thomas, current interim director William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink and Lorin Maazel. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will give the Ceharles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard for the season with the Boston Symphony involved in the illustration of his lectures.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, hinted that Bernstein might be involved with the Boston Symphony in other capacities during the season.

"I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be," Perry said. "We're working on various plans."

Ozawa said working with the orchestra is capable of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

FEB 8 1972

Eye

BERNSTEIN TO BOSTON?: Leonard Bernstein, having left the New York Philharmonic, may wind up right back where he started — in Boston. He may do some guest conductor work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. There's nothing definite yet, but at a news conference introducing the BSO's incoming music director, Seiji Ozawa, orchestra officials noted Bernstein would be required to live in Boston next winter as a visiting professor at Harvard. And, they said, it wouldn't be too surprising if he kept his baton in hand with the orchestra while he's in town.

TIMES REPORTER
BELLOWS FALLS, VT.
D. 6,320

FEB 5 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa to direct Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Seiji Ozawa, 36-year-old music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed William Steinberg as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra effective in 1973.

Steinberg is retiring this summer after three years with the Boston orchestra.

The announcement Wednesday said Ozawa will continue as music director at San Francisco, dividing his time between the two orchestras.

He will join the Boston orchestra this summer but will hold the title "music advisor" for his first year.

Ozawa, who was born at Hoten, Manchuria, studied at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo.

He came to the United States for the first time in 1960 as a student conductor of the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Charles Munch, then music director.

Munch had been a judge the year before at the International Conductors Contest in Europe, won by Ozawa.

Ozawa became music director of the San Fransicso orchestra in 1970, moving there from a similar post at Toronto. That same year he became artistic director of the Boston Symphony's summer activities at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts.

He began guest appearances as conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1964 and has made several appearances since, the last in November, 1971.

In addition to conducting the Boston musicians during several recordings sessions, he served one year as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic.

"I am honored and grateful to the trustees and players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this opportunity to make music with one of the greatest orchestras in the world," the new music director said.

"Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony," the orchestra's announcement said, "Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies.

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
D. 41,749

FEB 4 1972

New Englan Newsc

Maestro Has Two Batons

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seija Ozawa, the mod, Manchurian-born conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will take on additional duties as director of the prestigious Boston symphony.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know I can do it ...I need your help and your cooperation," he said in an address to his San Francisco musicians.

The move puts him at the helm of two of the nation's major orchestras — the first time in history one maestro has held two such positions.

The diminutive, Japanese conductor said he will assume directorship in Boston beginning with the 1973-74 season and will drastically cut his North American guest appearances to meet his responsibilities in San Francisco.

The dual directorship is possible because the two orchestras' seasons do not conflict.

He said he will maintain his home here with his wife Vera and their month-old daughter Seira and intends to remain even after his contract expires in 1976.

Ozawa, 29, assumed directorship of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His energy on the podium, with his black, shoulder-length hair waving, and his mod clothing made him an instant success with San Franciscans.

Ozawa apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years prior to his arrival in San Francisco.

In Boston, Ozawa will take the baton from William Steinberg, who has been the interim director since Eric Leinsdorf resigned in August, 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.

FEB 7 1972

New England Newsclip

NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR — Tokyo-trained Seiji Ozawa, 36, will be the new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-74 season. During the 1972-73 season he will hold the title of music advisor. As music director, Ozawa will be principal conductor but will divide his conducting services between Boston and the San Francisco Symphony where he has been musical director since 1970. (UPI Photo)

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,991

FEB 5 1972

New England Newsclip

NEW ENGLAND NEWS ROUNDUP

The Boston Symphony announced Wednesday that 36-year-old Seiji Ozawa, music director of the San Francisco Symphony, will become music director of the Boston orchestra at the beginning of the 1973-74 season.

OZAWA

He will replace William Steinberg who is retiring at the end of the current season.

Ozawa will serve as music advisor to the orchestra in the 1972-73 season.

He will retain his San Francisco post and his post as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Ozawa will devote at least 10 weeks of the regular season to the Boston Symphony. To do this he will confine his North American appearances exclusively to Boston and San Francisco.

LEVITTOWN, PA.
COURIER TIMES
D. 50,000

FEB 7 1972

MUSIC DIRECTOR — Tokyo-trained Seiji Ozawa, 36 named music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-74 season, will hold the title of music advisor for the 1972-73 season.

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
D. 5,003

FEB 7 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa 'very excited' about leading Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters. It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next season. He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "too tired of me."

The symphony officially announced other conducters during 1972-73 will be Michael Tilson Thomas, current interim director William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink and Lorin Maazel. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will give the Ceharles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard for the season with the Boston Symphony involved in the illustration of his lectures.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, hinted that Bernstein might be involved with the Boston Symphony in other capacities during the season.

"I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be," Perry said. "We're working on various plans."

Ozawa said working with the orchestra is capable of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

FEB 8 1972

Eye

BERNSTEIN TO BOSTON?: Leonard Bernstein, having left the New York Philharmonic, may wind up right back where he started — in Boston. He may do some guest conductor work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. There's nothing definite yet, but at a news conference introducing the BSO's incoming music director, Seiji Ozawa, orchestra officials noted Bernstein would be required to live in Boston next winter as a visiting professor at Harvard. And, they said, it wouldn't be too surprising if he kept his baton in hand with the orchestra while he's in town.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227

FEB 8 1972

Music World

And Now, Ozawa? Wait and Listen

Robert Commanday

AFTER IT WAS revealed last week that Seiji Ozawa will soon be a man of two cities, the San Francisco Symphony and its public found themselves in an ambivalent position — like a wife whose husband has announced that she is better off if he takes a second wife rather than continuing with many mistresses.

Now that Ozawa has accepted the musical directorship of the Boston Symphony as of 1973, in addition to his San Francisco post, there is little to do but wait and see and listen. Given the eminence, tradition, record-selling power and international fame of the Boston Orchestra, it is difficult to be convinced that San Francisco will not become the No. 2 wife. Those who worry about such things doubtless wonder if Ozawa will pursue with the same will and energies, his intentions to raise our orchestra to front-ranking status.

While stating that he wants to remain as long as we want him, even beyond the expiration of his recently renewed contract in 1976, he also proposed a novel "open-ended" agreement whereby the orchestra and public can ask him to leave when they tire of him. Presumably, he'd also have that option.

★ ★ ★

THE CONDITIONS UNDER which a conductor makes his contract commitments are subject to constantly changing circumstances—career opportunities, altered needs of orchestra No. 1 or 2, record company A or B. Last summer for example, while investigating Ozawa's reported negotiations with the Philadelphia Orchestra, I was unequivocably told by Philip Boone, the SF Symphony president, that Ozawa had assured him that as long as he was on our podium, our symphony would be his only American orchestra. When I asked Ozawa about this early in December, he was startled and emphatically denied having promised that. Of course he had already been dickering with Boston for weeks then.

Then last week he made his unprecedented flight from Philadelphia to make a ten-minute speech to his musicians, reassuring them and clarifying his Boston arrangement. Significantly, he said nothing about resigning from the musical directorship of the Japan Philharmonic, nor did he exclude opera engagements, each of which consumes three weeks of a conductor's time!

Besides the prestigious honor, the dual orchestra arrangement undoubtedly will be advantageous to Ozawa. It will be more efficient and easier on him than one regular podium on the West Coast plus many guest appearances with all the hotel-hopping. He will be able to concentrate and consolidate his repertoire, using a basically similar program for both cities. He will not have to pick up and learn special works to suit the needs and desires of host musical directors.

★ ★ ★

ON THE OTHER HAND, he will have enormously increased responsibilities for supervising, discussing and approving the year's programs and guests for both orchestras. Ozawa's season-planning here has not been distinguished. Boston's schedule is much more demanding and complex than San Francisco's and is subject to more intense scrutiny and comparisons. With greater pressure and more at stake in Boston, Ozawa's commitment here either will be lessened or strengthened by the experience. Most important, how will it affect the quality of his music-making generally?

This is the real issue which affects the San Francisco concert-goer — the musical now, not the iffy future. Ozawa's Boston decision forces an early review of his work here.

Thus far, halfway through his second full season as director, Ozawa has had marked success in many but not all aspects of the position. Still something of a matinee idol, he continues to attract record audiences. The public appreciates the advances in sensitive, sonorous, generally better ensemble orchestra playing. The orchestra is still happy and high in morale, give or take some inevitable grumbles.

★ ★ ★

MY APPRECIATION IS more qualified. Along with deep admiration for his musical intelligence, finesse, curiosity and abundant other qualities, and mixed with disappointment in his planning judgment and a certain intellectual contrivance in some interpretations, I have reservations about the depths of his response to music. The fact is I have not once been profoundly moved by an Ozawa performance. Of his programs this season, only one, the Sessions-Mozart-Ishii-Scriabin, has been thoroughly satisfying.

This is not a matter of maturity. He's had the time and experience. It's not for want of a perfect, grade AA, "Top Five" instrument. This responsive orchestra has often given such performances, even at the lowest ebb of its fortunes. If it is something wanting in his personality, then, we are not now facing the loss of possible greatness in musical experience.

Until subsequent developments prove otherwise, I would prefer to cling to an optimistic view of Ozawa and his new plan. It is entirely possible that the combined Boston-S.F. experience will give him the added securiyt to bring out his musical best.

The rest of it — prestige, mythical orchestral rankings, record sales, stage charisma, magazine cover articles — be damned. That musical best is what we want, first and foremost, and let his future decisions fall where they may.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

FEB 8 1972 New England Newsc

Seiji Ozawa Honored Sunday

Seiji Ozawa, who was appointed as the Boston Symphony's music director beginning in the fall of 1973, was honored at a reception Sunday at Symphony Hall, Boston.

He said that he was "very excited and very happy" at the prospect of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

Ozawa will open the Tanglewood season June 30. The first weekend will include a performance of Haydn's "Seasons" and a Bach program.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

FEB 8 1972 New England Newsclip

COMMUTER PROGRAMMING

Seyji Ozawa will take over as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1973-74 season, but will not relinquish his post with the San Francisco Symphony. When the flamboyant Ozawa, 36, performed here as guest conductor, he impressed audiences and orchestra alike with his thoroughness, energy, and flying hair. The Japanese maestro has had a steady climb since 1960, when he won the Koussevitsky Prize at Tanglewood.

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
D. 31,285

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

UPI

New conductor

Seiji Ozawa right, named music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in 1973, talks to orchestra president Talcott Banks during a press conference. The Tokyo-trained Ozawa will be principal conductor, but Boston will share his services with San Francisco, where he has been musical director since 1970.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa anticipates Boston Symphony work

BOSTON (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters. It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as music director of th Sam Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next season. He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "too tired of me."

The symphony officially announced other conducters during 1972-73 will be Michael Tilson Thomas, current interim director William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink and Lorin Maazel. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will give the Charles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard for the season with the Boston Symphony involved in the illustration of his lectures.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, hinted that Bernstein might be involved with the Boston Symphony in other capacities during the season.

"I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be," Perry said. "We're working on various plans."

Ozawa said working with the orchestra is capable of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE.
D. 29,772

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

New Boston Symphony Maestro 'Thrilled, Excited'

BOSTON (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters. It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next season. He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "'too tired of me."

The symphony officially announced other conductors during 1972-73 will be Michael Tilson Thomas, current interim director William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink and Lorin Maazel. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will give the Charles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard for the season with the Boston Symphony involved in the illustration of his lectures.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, hinted that Bernstein might be involved with the Boston Symphony in other capacities during the season.

"I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be," Perry said. "We're working on various plans."

Ozawa said working with the orchestra is capable of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

orchestra is capable of "'maki music on the highest level in the musical world."

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227

FEB 8 1972

Music World

And Now, Ozawa? Wait and Listen

Robert Commanday

AFTER IT WAS revealed last week that Seiji Ozawa will soon be a man of two cities, the San Francisco Symphony and its public found themselves in an ambivalent position — like a wife whose husband has announced that she is better off if he takes a second wife rather than continuing with many mistresses.

Now that Ozawa has accepted the musical directorship of the Boston Symphony as of 1973, in addition to his San Francisco post, there is little to do but wait and see and listen. Given the eminence, tradition, record-selling power and international fame of the Boston Orchestra, it is difficult to be convinced that San Francisco will not become the No. 2 wife. Those who worry about such things doubtless wonder if Ozawa will pursue with the same will and energies, his intentions to raise our orchestra to front-ranking status.

While stating that he wants to remain as long as we want him, even beyond the expiration of his recently renewed contract in 1976, he also proposed a novel "open-ended" agreement whereby the orchestra and public can ask him to leave when they tire of him. Presumably, he'd also have that option.

★ ★ ★

THE CONDITIONS UNDER which a conductor makes his contract commitments are subject to constantly changing circumstances—career opportunities, altered needs of orchestra No. 1 or 2, record company A or B. Last summer for example, while investigating Ozawa's reported negotiations with the Philadelphia Orchestra, I was unequivocably told by Philip Boone, the SF Symphony president, that Ozawa had assured him that as long as he was on our podium, our symphony would be his only American orchestra. When I asked Ozawa about this early in December, he was startled and emphatically denied having promised that. Of course he had already been dickering with Boston for weeks then.

Then last week he made his unprecedented flight from Philadelphia to make a ten-minute speech to his musicians, reassuring them and clarifying his Boston arrangement. Significantly, he said nothing about resigning from the musical directorship of the Japan Philharmonic, nor did he exclude opera engagements, each of which consumes three weeks of a conductor's time!

Besides the prestigious honor, the dual orchestra arrangement undoubtedly will be advantageous to Ozawa. It will be more efficient and easier on him than one regular podium on the West Coast plus many guest appearances with all the hotel-hopping. He will be able to concentrate and consolidate his repertoire, using a basically similar program for both cities. He will not have to pick up and learn special works to suit the needs and desires of host musical directors.

★ ★ ★

ON THE OTHER HAND, he will have enormously increased responsibilities for supervising, discussing and approving the year's programs and guests for both orchestras. Ozawa's season-planning here has not been distinguished. Boston's schedule is much more demanding and complex than San Francisco's and is subject to more intense scrutiny and comparisons. With greater pressure and more at stake in Boston, Ozawa's commitment here either will be lessened or strengthened by the experience. Most important, how will it affect the quality of his music-making generally?

This is the real issue which affects the San Francisco concert-goer — the musical now, not the iffy future. Ozawa's Boston decision forces an early review of his work here.

Thus far, halfway through his second full season as director, Ozawa has had marked success in many but not all aspects of the position. Still something of a matinee idol, he continues to attract record audiences. The public appreciates the advances in sensitive, sonorous, generally better ensemble orchestra playing. The orchestra is still happy and high in morale, give or take some inevitable grumbles.

★ ★ ★

MY APPRECIATION IS more qualified. Along with deep admiration for his musical intelligence, finesse, curiosity and abundant other qualities, and mixed with disappointment in his planning judgment and a certain intellectual contrivance in some interpretations, I have reservations about the depths of his response to music. The fact is I have not once been profoundly moved by an Ozawa performance. Of his programs this season, only one, the Sessions-Mozart-Ishii-Scriabin, has been thoroughly satisfying.

This is not a matter of maturity. He's had the time and experience. It's not for want of a perfect, grade AA, "Top Five" instrument. This responsive orchestra has often given such performances, even at the lowest ebb of its fortunes. If it is something wanting in his personality, then, we are not now facing the loss of possible greatness in musical experience.

Until subsequent developments prove otherwise, I would prefer to cling to an optimistic view of Ozawa and his new plan. It is entirely possible that the combined Boston-S.F. experience will give him the added securiyt to bring out his musical best.

The rest of it — prestige, mythical orchestral rankings, record sales, stage charisma, magazine cover articles — be damned. That musical best is what we want, first and foremost, and let his future decisions fall where they may.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

FEB 8 1972 New England Newsc

Seiji Ozawa Honored Sunday

Seiji Ozawa, who was appointed as the Boston Symphony's music director beginning in the fall of 1973, was honored at a reception Sunday at Symphony Hall, Boston.

He said that he was "very excited and very happy" at the prospect of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

Ozawa will open the Tanglewood season June 30. The first weekend will include a performance of Haydn's "Seasons" and a Bach program.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

FEB 8 1972 New England Newsclip

COMMUTER PROGRAMMING

Seyji Ozawa will take over as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1973-74 season, but will not relinquish his post with the San Francisco Symphony. When the flamboyant Ozawa, 36, performed here as guest conductor, he impressed audiences and orchestra alike with his thoroughness, energy, and flying hair. The Japanese maestro has had a steady climb since 1960, when he won the Koussevitsky Prize at Tanglewood.

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
D. 31,285

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

UPI

New conductor

Seiji Ozawa right, named music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in 1973, talks to orchestra president Talcott Banks during a press conference. The Tokyo-trained Ozawa will be principal conductor, but Boston will share his services with San Francisco, where he has been musical director since 1970.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa anticipates Boston Symphony work

BOSTON (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters. It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as music director of th Sam Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next season. He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "too tired of me."

The symphony officially announced other conducters during 1972-73 will be Michael Tilson Thomas, current interim director William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink and Lorin Maazel. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will give the Charles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard for the season with the Boston Symphony involved in the illustration of his lectures.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, hinted that Bernstein might be involved with the Boston Symphony in other capacities during the season.

"I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be," Perry said. "We're working on various plans."

Ozawa said working with the orchestra is capable of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE.
D. 29,772

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

New Boston Symphony Maestro 'Thrilled, Excited'

BOSTON (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters. It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next season. He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "'too tired of me."

The symphony officially announced other conductors during 1972-73 will be Michael Tilson Thomas, current interim director William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink and Lorin Maazel. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will give the Charles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard for the season with the Boston Symphony involved in the illustration of his lectures.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, hinted that Bernstein might be involved with the Boston Symphony in other capacities during the season.

"I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be," Perry said. "We're working on various plans."

Ozawa said working with the orchestra is capable of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

orchestra is capable of ""maki music on the highest level in the musical world."

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE
D. 78,230

FEB 8 1972 New England Newsclip

Colorful Japanese Leads Two Major US Symphonies

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa, the diminutive, colorful conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday announced he would add the Boston Symphony to his responsibilities in an arrangement putting him at the helm of two of the country's major orchestras.

"I am not changing my job at all," the 36-year-old Japanese born conductor said in an address to his San Francisco musicians.

"It took me two months to decide, but I know now that I can do it . . . I need your help and your cooperation."

Ozawa said he would take over the music directorship of Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season, but will drastically cut down his North American guest appearances in order to maintain his responsibilities in San Francisco.

San Francisco is considered one of the country's most improved orchestras in the last 10 years, and Boston is a first-line symphony, one of the top five in the nation.

Ozawa said he, his wife Vera and their new daughter Seira, born Dec. 29, will continue to live in San Francisco, and he intends to remain after his present contracts ends in 1976.

He said he would appear briefly in Boston next season as music advisor and will continue to serve as co-artistic director of the Tanglewood Music Festival, the Boston Symphony's summer home, a post he has held since 1970.

In Boston, Ozawa will take over from William Steinberg, who has been interim director since the resignation of Eric Leinsdorf in August of 1969. Steinberg will continue as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Ozawa began an association with the Boston Symphony in 1960 when he attended the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood. There he won the Koussevitzky prize as the most promising conducting student.

It was expected that the Boston Symphony will also announce the appointment of Michael Tilson Thomas, 27, as principal guest conductor.

Ozawa said he would devote equal time to each of the American orchestras starting with the 1973-74 season.

The diminutive Ozawa took over the San Francisco Symphony in the 1970-71 season and has been a resounding success, with his raffish image, energetic style on the podium and his thick, shoulder-length black hair.

A native of Hoten, Japan, he apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years before coming to San Francisco.

The San Francisco Symphony Association, which called a hasty news conference Tuesday to deny news reports that Ozawa would leave San Francisco if he took the Boston offer, said the two-orchestra arrangement was eminently satisfactory.

"I can think of no finer tribute to this great leader than to have these two major orchestras through which to express his unequalled musicianship," said Philip S. Boone, president.

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
D. 6,735

FEB 11 1972 New England Newsclip

As They See It

Musical Chairs

One morning this week a group, including strangers to the newsroom, was anxiously hovering over the Associated Press teletype machine. A veteran newsman noticed them and wondered if an earthquake or an assassin had struck somewhere in the world. It turned out they were reading the announcement of the professional football draft and swap of players. It seems the New England Patriots had acquired a hot defensive end and what have you. It was hot stuff, provoking growls, grunts and an occasional stifled shout.

But there was no similar flurry of excitement later in the week when word reached the hinterland that Seiji Ozawa had been named musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra starting in 1973-74, though any musician could tell you this was quite a bomb.

Ozawa at 36 fits the Boston orchestra's new accent on youth. Some of the orchestra's best notices this year and last have been for concerts led by Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, still in his twenties.

Ozawa is Manchurian born, Tokyo educated and Tanglewood trained. He switched from concert pianist to conductor because of a soccer injury to one hand. He is now musical director of the San Francisco Symphony, which post he will continue to serve, along with his new one, at least until 1976. He is a popular guest conductor with the major orchestras; only last Tuesday he led the Philadelphia orchestra in New York. He will have the interim title of musical adviser to the Boston orchestra next year, when the contract of the venerable William Steinberg ends.

Ozawa isn't the only one with two jobs or more. Thomas, the associate conductor, is also director of the Buffalo orchestra. But in this game of musical chairs he will become one of two "principal guest conductors" at Boston, the other being Colin Davis of the Covent Garden Opera in London. An airplane is almost a musical instrument these days.

In 1973 the Boston Symphony will have, you might say, a new quarterback, a couple of new linebackers, and a whole new ballgame.

Rutland Herald

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 8 1972 New England Newsclip

Close-up

No One Was Happier than Seiji Ozawa

Wearing a soft, black pajama-like suit and carrying a shoulder bag, the Boston Symphony's diminutive, vivacious new almost-music director flew into Boston Saturday to be formally introduced to trustees, patrons and the press.

There is nothing formal about Seiji Ozawa. Enthusiastic, yes. Humble, but with a sure feeling for what he believes he can do; open to new people and new ideas. Spontaneous, not formal.

And, as if responding already to his style, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's administration managed to make his reception a relatively informal as well as a happy occasion. Perhaps 200 people stood and chatted among the painted brick pillars in the basement of Symphony Hall, nibbling caviar and anchovy canapes and bubbling — almost unanimously — with delight at the selection of the 36-year-old Japanese conductor as the orchestra's new leader. But no one seemed happier than Seiji Ozawa himself.

They Like Him

Among the crowd were many of the orchestra members, all of whom know Mr. Ozawa quite well already from his two seasons as co-director of the summer appearances in Boston, and they were obviously pleased.

"I think its an unprecedented situation for an orchestra," said one, "a new conducter who is liked by the players."

Indeed, both players and trustees have made it plain that the musicians' admiration for Mr. Ozawa, which deepened into a warm respect during last summer's Tanglewood season, was one of the clinching reasons that led to the board's offering him the leadership of the orchestra last November. No comparison here, they almost say, to Cleveland, where the players voted for Istvan Kertesz and the trustees hired Lorin Maazel.

But one critic was heard to wonder whether a conductor who gets along so well with his players can be very good for them.

And for some, at least, of the subscribers and the orchestra, part of the joy at the selection can probably be put down to sheer relief that after three years of frustrating search, the BSO has finally found someone willing to undertake its leadership on a more or less permanent basis.

A Long Life?

No one was speculating on just how permanent that basis would be (although Mr. Ozawa at one point in the press conference earlier referred to "keeping this musical life long"), having in the backs of their minds no doubt the abrupt departure of Erich Leinsdorf in 1968, just when everyone thought the egg of the orchestra's future was safely in the basket.

But Mr. Ozawa remains, for the time being, an almost-music director. During the next year, for which his schedule was booked well before the BSO's November offer came, he will hold the title of music advisor and will conduct only one week of the winter season in Boston. The orchestra will have two principal guest conductors, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas (the brilliant young man who will give up his post as the orchestra's associate conductor), who between them will account for about half of next year's season.

In the following year, when he will assume the title of music director, Mr. Ozawa will conduct 10 weeks of the 20-week Boston season and 14 weeks of the 24-week season of the San Francisco Symphony, of which he will continue as music director.

Orchestra's Character

At the press conference, Ozawa indicated he would plan in the future for somewhat more than 10 weeks a season in Boston, although he said he felt 10 weeks in the winter plus the time he spends with the orchestra at Tanglewood would be enough to let him determine "the character of the orchestra."

Ozawa praised the two men who will share the burden of guest conducting next year. Colin Davis, he said, is "a high musician, a deep musician, very good for the orchestra." And of Michael Tilson Thomas, the 27-year-old rising star who many had hoped would go on to lead the orchestra which gave him his success, Seiji Ozawa said:

"Michael is a very good friend of mine, and I think he is one of the finest talents you could have, and young blood — we need young blood."

Ozawa made it clear (as had trustees president Talcott M. Banks previously) that the popular, young-minded Spectrum concerts which Michael Thomas initiated this year would continue, presumably as long as Thomas wishes to conduct them.

Ozawa himself, of course, is young blood, and he spoke glowingly of his situation in San Francisco, which he seems to have no mind to leave (his current contract there expires in 1976).

'Young People Come'

"It is a good orchestra, and soon it is going to be a great one," he said. "The musicians work hard, I work hard. The city helps us, the young people come to the concerts — they are very excited — and (with a bow in the direction of the Boston trustees) also the old people keep coming."

Mr. Ozawa, obviously fatigued but equally obviously sincere, said the invitation to head the Boston Symphony, one of the world's great orchestra's by anyone's accounting, "was a very great honor for me" — particularly since the Boston contract would allow him to continue his work in San Francisco.

He said he saw the Boston assignment as extending his work at Tanglewood, which he will continue to share with Gunther Schuller, who has headed the music training aspect of the summer festival for the past two seasons.

"I am not a teacher," said Ozawa (who got his start in this country as a conducting student at Tanglewood under Charles Munch in 1960,) "and Mr. Schuller is so good at that. I think we will continue."

Mr. Ozawa said he felt that the level of technique among American orchestral musicians is higher than it has ever been, and said that was one reason a conductor could accomplish more in less time with an orchestra than in the past.

Referring to the recurrent question whether he can provide the kind of leadership a major orchestra requires while heading two at the same time, Mr. Ozawa said: "I know the musicians, and I am sure the musicians and the management will help me. If the musicians help, I can do it."

J.L

Seiji Ozawa at Saturday's reception in Symphony Hall, Boston. (UPI photo)

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 416,003

FEB 8 1972

New England Newsclip

Definitely the man of assurance on the podium, Seiji Ozawa's baton movements are fluid, his concentration intense, his physical commitment to the music of the moment complete.

Today's Living

To Take Helm of Boston Symphony

Flamboyant Conductor Ozawa His Own Person Off the Podium

Seiji Ozawa, newly-appointed music director for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, strikes a contemplative, pose, top left. His wife, Vera, bottom left, indulges in some fashionable hijinks, right, as she and Ozawa model matching furs.

By FRAN WEIL

The slight, lithe, shaggy-haired man soon to be the Boston Symphony's new music director, stands poised — almost flamboyantly ready — before the ESO at the start of each concert.

Seiji Ozawa is a man of assurance on the podium. His baton movements are fluid, his concentration intense his physical commitment to the music of the moment complete.

Even in the formal attire of the concert stage, this long-haired 36-year-old is loose and easy — an almost-informal conductor with plenty of flair.

Again and again, this Tokyo-trained musical whiz kid has proven himself a favorite among the majority of Brahmin audiences. (Some balk, of course. There are those BSO subscribers who wish Ozawa would cut his hair, for instance.)

★

Off the podium, however, Seiji Ozawa is another man altogether. Though members of the orchestra apparently feel at ease with the young conductor (they say he has equilibrium . . . lacks a destructive temperament), Ozawa's public image is strictly low-profile.

At Tanglewood he shied away from accepting tribute directed toward him and the orchestra following a concert. "He directed all the tribute to the orchestra and was reluctant to face the audience until it became imperative," a fan recalled. But he was called back four times.

He does not like interviews. "Musicians cannot talk well," he insists.

But an acquaintance of Ozawa's thinks his shyness may be due to his sensitivity about his accent.

Another acquaintance claims it is Ozawa's fierce determination to keep his private life private that makes him wary of interviews and press coverage.

"Once you start mentioning his first wife, he starts pretending that he doesn't understand you and he starts spouting Japanese."

★

About all there is to know about Ozawa's current life is that his second wife, Vera, is a serene beauty who models. They consider home base San Francisco, where Ozawa will serve the San Francisco Orchestra as music director in tandem with the BSO. The couple has a new baby girl, born Dec. 29. She's named Seira — a combination of both parent's first names.

Ozawa was born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935. His family owned a piano and all the children learned to master the keyboard.

His mother was a convert to Christianity, and "although she never had us baptized," according to Ozawa, "she did sing us Christian hymns.

When he was 15, Ozawa was sent to live in a church for a year. "We were poor, and in exchange for playing the organ for services, I received my room and board. That was when I learned all the Protestant hymns and all of Bach's keyboard music."

At 19, during a rugged rugby match, Ozawa broke two fingers "and that stopped my piano career."

He did some composing and then devoted himself to conducting.

In 1935, Ozawa graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, where he won the first prizes in composition and conducting. In 1959, he went to Europe.

People

There, at the International Competition of conductors at Besancon, Ozawa won the first prize. And one of the judges just happened to be Charles Munch, who invited him to Tanglewood as a conducting student.

The following year, it was evident the young conductor's star was on the rise. He received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center.

Then came an apprenticeship under Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic during the '61-'62 season, followed by a tour through Japan, where he conducted 25 concerts with the Japan Radio Orchestra (NHK) and the Japanese Philharmonic Orchestra.

It was a turbulent time for Ozawa. He was torn between his alliance to his homeland and his fascination with America and the western world.

"I did not know where I wanted to be. I kept thinking of Japan as such a sweet country." When he returned for the 1962 tour and conducted the NHK. ". . . I had a big problem. The musicians were accustomed to taking orders only if they came from conductors with a German accent or Russian name. I was the first Japanese conductor in its 50-year history.

His bad experiences helped him decide. "Japan was really not that sweet."

★

Before his appointment as music director of the San Francisco Orchestra in 1970, he was at the helm of the Toronto Symphony. And since the summer of 1970, he has been co-director (with Gunther Schuller) of the Berkshire Music Center.

Ozawa's tenure with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin with the '73-'74 season.

He is interested in drawing more young people toward serious music. "Otherwise," he warns, "music will die."

And Ozawa is known to be anything but a traditionalist when it comes to music.

"I like to try different approaches. Not all the time. I just think it's nice to have a new dish on the menu once or twice a season."

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
D. 13,000

FEB 8 1972

New England Newsclip

Symphony Post Pleases Ozawa

BOSTON (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters. It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as music director of the Sam Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next weason. He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "too tired of me."

The symphony officially announced other conducters during 1972-73 will be Michael Tilson Thomas, current interim director William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink and Lorin Maazel. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will give the Charles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard for the season with the Boston Symphony involved in the illustration of his lectures.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, hinted that Bernstein might be involved with the Boston Symphony in other capacities during the season.

"I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be," Perry said. "We're working on various plans."

Ozawa said working with the orchestra is capable of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

[107]

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
D. 6,735

FEB 8 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa Excited Over Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters. It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next season. He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "too tired of me."

The symphony officially announced other conductors during 1972-73 will be Michael Tilson Thomas, current interim director William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink and Lorin Maazel. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will give the Charles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard for the season with the Boston Symphony involved in the illustration of his lectures.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, hinted that Bernstein might be involved with the Boston Symphony in other capacities during the season.

"I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be," Perry said. "We're working on various plans."

HT - Feb 5, 1972

An Impressive Appointment

We imagine that most Bostonians who are concerned about the future of the Boston Symphony were pleased with the recent announcement of Seiji Ozawa's appointment as that orchestra's music director, beginning with the 1973-74 season. Congratulations are due the Symphony trustees on the successful outcome of their arduous search. We doubt that they could have found a more distinguished appointee than the imaginative and gifted Mr. Ozawa.

Though only 36 years old, he comes to the position highly acclaimed by his fellow musicians and with an impressive fund of experience. Most important of all, he becomes music director with the whole-hearted support and approval of the people he will be working with, the musicians of the BSO. We expect he will be an enlivening influence on the musical life of Boston and we extend him our most cordial welcome.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

FEB 8 1972 New England Newsclip

New BSO head

Ozawa's 'good family'

By Louis Snyder

What is the Boston Symphony going to be like under its newly appointed music director, Seiji Ozawa? Definite answers weren't forthcoming at his first meeting with the press and his orchestra colleagues at Symphony Hall. But an era of mutual admiration seemed to be launched by his stated aim "to make a good family with the musicians, the BSO board and the staff," and his conviction that it will happen because "I know them and they know me." Audiences may also take comfort from his belief that "It doesn't make any difference where I go, I make music. And the Boston Symphony is one of the greatest in the world."

If Sunday's atmosphere was somewhat distrait, it stemmed from the fact that the Japanese maestro had made a flying trip to the West Coast at the time of the announcement, to assure members of the San Francisco Symphony that he would not be deserting them for Boston—this in the middle of his current guest conducting stint with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The new director's session with the press was in the nature of a nostalgic review of his first contacts with the BSO as a student at Tanglewood through the interest of the then music director, Charles Munch. In the years since, he has kept returning to the orchestra, both in Boston and at Tanglewood, where for the past two summers he has shared the artistic directorship with Gunther Schuller—an arrangement he confirmed would continue.

It was also a visit to Japan by the Boston musicians, following an earlier one by the former Symphony of the Air, which decided Ozawa that he must be a conductor. ("That sound is still in my ears.") Now sitting in the driver's seat of the orchestra in its home town for the first time, Ozawa gave the impression of this being one more fortuitous thing that has happened to make him happy and surprised.

Since the offer of the Boston post was made in November, Ozawa has done both some soul-searching and some basic figuring, he admitted. How many weeks would he allot to each of the two orchestras in order to put his stamp on it? (10 to 15 weeks.) At present he spends 14 weeks in San Francisco out of the season's 24. Future commitments already made will limit his first Boston season (1972-73) to a single week, with 10 weeks in 1973-74, when he will fully assume the title and responsibilities of the music director's position.

Seiji Ozawa

Next season, when Ozawa will be BSO's music adviser, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas, entitled principal guest conductors, will do a major portion of the Boston concerts. Others scheduled to appear include Daniel Barenboim in his local conducting debut, Claudio Abbado, Bernard Haitink, Lorin Maazel, William Steinberg, and possibly Leonard Bernstein.

THEATER / ARTS

Ozawa happy about BSO job

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Seiji Ozawa, whose appointment as the Boston Symphony's music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973 was announced Wednesday, said yesterday afternoon that he was "very excited and very happy" at the prospect of "making music on the highest level in the musical world."

At a press conference in Symphony Hall, Ozawa spoke about his double commitment as music director of both the Boston and San Francisco symphonies and gave away a few of the Boston Symphony's plans for the 1972-73 season for Tanglewood in summer of 1972. He will have the title of music adviser during the coming winter season, and he said that the arrangement that has been in force for Tanglewood since 1970, which makes him and Gunther Schuller artistic co-directors with Leonard Bernstein as adviser, would continue.

Ozawa became music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970 after four years with the Toronto Symphony, and he recently extended his contract there until 1976. Yesterday's meeting was attended by Joseph Scafidi, manager of the San Francisco Symphony, as well as by Talcott M. Banks and Thomas D. Perry Jr., president and manager respectively of the Boston orchestra.

Ozawa explained his close feeling for both cities, mentioning the impression the Boston Symphony had made on him when he heard it in Japan under Charles Munch in 1957, of Munch's inviting him to Tanglewood after Munch had been on the jury that awarded Ozawa first prize at the Besancon competition in 1959, and of his summer at Tanglewood in 1960 — where he sang in the chorus when Munch conducted Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the work which was on the program at Ozawa's final Tanglewood concert last summer. "I am sure maestro Munch knows of this appointment," Ozawa said. San Francisco was the orchestra with which he had his first professional engagement in this country — "the first concert I ever conducted all of from beginning to end" — an invitation received when the composer Aram Khatchaturian was unable to keep a date.

Because of arrangements made before negotiations with Boston became serious in November, Ozawa will be with the Boston Symphony for only one week during 1972-73. He will be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and hopes to lengthen his time here after that. He feels that the 14 weeks he conducts in a 24-week session in San Francisco is about the right ratio, enough to control the orchestra and to impose a certain character on it, not so much that players or audiences get bored.

The other conductors in Boston for 1972-73 will be Colin Davis ("a high musician, a deep musician, very good for the orchestra") and Michael Tilson Thomas ("one of the greatest talents you can have, and young blood — we need young blood"), both of whom will have the title of principal guest conductor; William Steinberg, Music Director 1969-72 ("he is really maestro maestro"), Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Bernard Haitink, and Lorin Maazel.

Leonard Bernstein will give the Charles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard in 1972-73. It is planned that his topic will be the interpretation of music and that the Boston Symphony will be involved in the illustration of his lectures. Asked about other plans for a Bernstein-BSO collaboration during that season, manager Perry said: "I'll bet something will happen, but I can't yet say what it will be. We're working on various plans."

TOKYO-TRAINED Seiji Ozawa, named Wednesday as musical director of the Boston Symphony beginning in 1973, chats with reporters yesterday. (UPI)

"And now," said Ozawa, "can I make some advertisement for Tanglewood?" Ozawa will open the season June 30, and the first weekend will include a performance of Haydn's "Seasons" and a Bach program. There will be a Beethoven weekend with Steinberg conducting twice and Ozawa once. Programs will include the 1st, 5th, 6th, and 9th symphonies, the Triple Concerto, and the Choral Fantasy, with Peter Serkin as piano soloist. There will be a four-Sunday Mahler cycle on which Bernstein, James Levine, Thomas, and Ozawa will conduct the 3rd, 6th, 5th, and 8th symphonies respectively. Colin Davis's programs will include the Berlioz Te Deum and Verdi's Four Sacred Pieces. Other conductors include Karel Ancerl, Aldo Ceccato, Bruno Maderna, and Eugene Ormandy; soloists include pianists Gina Bachauer, John Browning, Alicia De Larrocha, Misha Dichter, Claude Frank, Garrick Ohlsson, Alexis Weissenberg, and Earl Wild, violinists Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky, sopranos Phyllis Curtin and Jessye Norman, plus Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, Ann Hobson, harp, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Ralph Gomberg, oboe.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 556,377

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Time Out Feb 9

Ozawa will lead BSO

By PAULA CHILDS

Seiji Ozawa has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with its 1973/4 season.

The 36-year-old Manchurian-born conductor, who is now with the San Francisco Symphony, will serve both orchestras during his simultaneous three-year contracts. (He has just extended his contract with the San Francisco Symphony, where he has been since 1970.)

Since Ozawa's appointment does not become effective until next year, the Boston Symphony will be without a director when William Steinberg's tenure comes to an end this summer. Ozawa will act as its music advisor — an undefined position — until he takes over in the fall of 1973. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, will continue as assistant conductor next season, with Michael Tilson Thomas and Colin Davis as principal guest conductors.

Ozawa will also remain artistic director, with Gunther Schuller and music advisor Leonard Bernstein, at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer residence.

The newly appointed conductor does not anticipate any major problems in dividing himself between San Francisco and Boston since the seasons of the two symphonies do not exactly coincide. During his first season with the BSO, Mr. Ozawa will conduct for ten weeks, with another 14 weeks spent with the San Francisco Symphony. However, subsequent seasons will see more of Ozawa in Boston.

Seiji Ozawa first came to Tanglewood in 1960 when he was invited by Charles Munch (then music director of the BSO) to be a student conductor at the Berkshire Music Center, after Ozawa had won the 1959 International Conductors' Contest at Besancon, France. He made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony during the 1964 Berkshire Festival. Six years later, in 1970, he became artistic director of Tanglewood.

Trained at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, Ozawa later switched from piano to conducting after a soccer injury to his hand. In 1961 he was appointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conductors and directed the orchestra in several concerts. The following summer he conducted 25 concerts in Japan with the NHK and Japanese Philharmonic orchestras.

The next year Ozawa made his first major North American conducting engagement with the San Francisco Orchestra. Two years later, in 1964, he again became assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic under Leonard Bernstein.

Ozawa has appeared all over the world since that time, as guest conductor of many of the greatest orchestras including the London Symphony, Concertgebouw, Vienna Symphony, Vienna State Opera, Philadelphia, Chicago Symphony, and Pittsburgh Symphony. ●

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,510 S. 280,961

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA, music director of the BSO beginning with the 1973-74 season, is shown pondering a question from the press during a reception in his honor at Symphony Hall yesterday.

Guest at Symphony Hall

Ozawa Greets New Colleagues

By HARRY NEVILLE

Seiji Ozawa, appointed last week as music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season, arrived in Boston this weekend for a press conference and reception in Symphony Hall. Yesterday, between parts I and II of "The Trojans," which he was reported to be enjoying at the Aquarius Theater, he was introduced to his employers, to his colleagues in the BSO, to some of his patrons among the BSO subscribers, and to his potential critics among the Boston (and Eastern Seaboard) press.

Ozawa had flown in from San Francisco, and he was accompanied in his good-will mission by Joseph Scafidi, manager of the West Coast orchestra that will share Ozawa's conductorial services at least through the 1975-76 season. Ozawa had nothing new to say about his appointment — nothing that is, that has not already been reported in the various news stories that have appeared since the announcement.

He expressed extreme happiness at the thought that he will be working with an orchestra with which he has had so many happy associations. He expressed happiness — and humility, too — that he had been asked to conduct one of the world's great orchestras. He felt that 10 weeks out of a season — the amount he will conduct 1973-74 — would be enough to allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going." He added that he felt it important for the orchestra and the audience not to get "too tired of me."

Clearly, it's too early for Ozawa to have formulated any significant plans for the BSO. What is clear at this point is that Ozawa has a personal charm that is truly formidable — more than enough to overcome the misgivings of the crustiest Friday afternoon dowagers. As Talcott Banks, president of the BSO trustees, indicated, yesterday was indeed "a most happy occasion."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,612 SUN. 565,377

FEB 6 1972 New England Newsclip

It's Ozawa:

YOUTHFUL, long-haired, mandarin-jacketed, adventurous about new music, at home with traditional repertoire, Seiji Ozawa, 36, Wednesday was named new Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Ozawa was born in Manchuria, trained in Tokyo, and has been affiliated with the B.S.O. off-and-on since his student days at Tanglewood. He will be "music advisor" during the 1972-73 season and assume duties of Music Director in 1973-74.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

FEB 9 1972

New England Newsclip

Will Ozawa Alter BSO?

By LOUIS SNYDER
Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON — What is the Boston Symphony going to be like under its newly appointed music director, Seiji Ozawa? Definite answers weren't forthcoming at his first meeting with the press and his orchestra colleagues at Symphony Hall. But an era of mutual admiration seemed to be launched by his stated aim "to make a good family with the musicians, the BSO board and the staff," and his conviction that it will happen because "I know them and they know me." Audiences may also take comfort from his belief that "It doesn't make any difference where I go, I make music. And the Boston Symphony is one of the greatest in the world."

If Sunday's atmosphere was somewhat distrait, it stemmed from the fact that the Japanese maestro had made a flying trip to the West Coast at the time of the announcement, to assure members of the San Francisco Symphony that he would not be deserting them for Boston—this in the middle of his current guest conducting stint with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The new director's session with the press was in the nature of a nostalgic review of his first contacts with the BSO as a student at Tanglewood through the interest of the then music director, Charles Munch. In the years since, he has kept returning to the orchestra, both in Boston and at Tanglewood, where for the past two summers he has shared the artistic directorship with Gunther Schuller — an arragnement he confirmed would continue.

It was also a visit to Japan by the Boston musicians, following an earlier one by the former Symphony of the Air, which decided Ozawa that he must be a conductor. ("That sound is still in my ears.") Now sitting in the driver's seat of the orchestra in its home town for the first time, Ozawa gave the impression of this being one more fortuitous thing that has happened to make him happy and surprised.

Since the offer of the Boston post was made in November, Ozawa has done both some soul-searching and some basic figuring, he admitted. How many weeks would he allot to each of the two orchestras in order to put his stamp on it? (10 to 15 weeks). At present he spends 14 weeks in San Francisco out of the season's 24. Future commitments already made will limit his first Boston season (1972-73) to a single week, with 10 weeks in 1973-74, when he will fully assume the title and responsibilities of the music director's position.

Next season, when Ozawa will be BSO's music adviser, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas, entitled principal guest conductors, will do a major portion of the Boston concerts. Others scheduled to appear include Daniel Barenboim in his local conducting debut, Claudio Abbado, Bernard Haitink, Lorin Maazel, William Steinberg, and possibly Leonard Bernstein.

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . changes coming?

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NICHI BEI TIMES
D. 7,000

FEB 11 1972

PAGE ONE

OZAWA NOW FORMALLY BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEW MUSIC DIRECTOR

BOSTON, Feb. 10 — (UPI) — Seiji Ozawa says he is "very excited and very happy" to have the chance to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Ozawa, named music director for three years beginning in the fall of 1973, attended a reception Sunday where he chatted with reporters and orchestra supporters.

It was announced last Wednesday that Ozawa will take over the Boston position while remaining as conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa said previous commitments will prevent him from being with the Boston Symphony for more than one week during the 1972-73 season, but he plans to be here for 10 weeks in 1973-74 and about 14 weeks the next season.

He said that would allow him to "keep the character of the orchestra going," while not allowing the orchestra members and the public to get "too tired of me."

Patriot Ledger, 2.3.72

Ozawa To Guide Boston Symphony

By Jon Lehman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday named Seiji Ozawa, the 36-year-old Japanese conductor as the man to lead it out of the uncertainties over future directions which have lingered since the abrupt departure of Erich Leinsdorf nearly four years ago.

Mr. Ozawa, who is music director of the San Francisco Symphony, will retain his position there and will take over the leadership of the Boston orchestra in a two-phased arrangement beginning next fall when he will become music advisor. The music advisor position is to provide a transition during the year following the scheduled resignation of the orchestra's current music director, 72-year-old William Steinberg, who is returning to the Pittsburgh Symphony which he also heads.

During the 1972-73 season, when Mr. Ozawa's previous commitments will allow him only one weekend of conducting in Boston, the orchestra will be led by two principal guest conductors. One of those will be Michael Tilson Thomas, who will give up his title as the orchestra's associate conductor, and the other will be Colin Davis, conductor of London's Covent Garden Opera House, a director who has long enjoyed a close relationship with the BSO.

Mr. Ozawa will formally assume the position of music director of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the 1973-74 season, when he will devote at least 10 weeks to the winter season in Boston, according to the orchestra's announcement. Beginning with that season, the arrangement with Boston requires that Mr. Ozawa restrict his appearances on North American podiums to Boston and San Francisco.

He will not be required, however, to give up his relationship with the Japan Philharmonic in Tokyo, of which he is also music director, or his annual guest conducting series in Europe. He will also continue as artistic director of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire music festival at its summer home in Tanglewood, a post he has shared for the past three summers.

The selection of Mr. Ozawa, who has had close connections with the Boston Orchestra since he came to this country as a Tanglewood student 12 years ago, was made after consultation with the orchestra's members. According to Robert Ripley, chairman of the players' committee, "he is the choice of the players."

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
D. 13,000

FEB 8 1972

New England Newsclip

HUB SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR—Tokyo - trained Seiji Ozawa, 36, named music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-74 season, chats with reporters following a press conference. During the 1972-73 season he will hold the title of music advisor. As music director, Ozawa will be principal conductor, but Boston will share his services with the San Francisco Symphony where he has been musical director since 1970. (UPI)

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 500,119 SUN. 657,[illegible]

FEB 9 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa —With Fervor

By Paul Hume

Reprinted from yesterday's late editions

Seiji Ozawa has decided to complicate his life by becoming music director of the Boston Symphony while retaining that title with the San Francisco Symphony. The latest comment on where the gifted young Japanese conductor will end up comes in his latest assurance to San Francisco: "I plan to stay in San Francisco after my present contract." That contract runs through 1976. Boston is expecting Ozawa for increasingly longer seasons long before then.

Monday night, however, Ozawa was in Constitution Hall with neither Bostonians nor San Franciscans, but Philadelphians. It is easy to see why orchestras and their boards of directors like Ozawa. He plans a program with care and directs it with a strong personal fervor.

That fervor comes in varying sizes and shapes, depending on the character of the music at hand. Monday night, Ozawa offered the Philadelphia in three different sizes: one for Ravel's Mother Goose Suite; another for Edgard Varese's Hyperprism, and still another for the Mahler First Symphony.

The Ravel was a good-sized chamber orchestra, led with extreme delicacy so that the exquisite textures emerged in clear strands. The music was paced as if to support ravishing ballerinas and gallant escorts. It was a perfect matching of pastels floating on a sea of weightless silks.

Varese wrote Hyperprism in 1923. It is one of his studies in mingled sonorities, this time balancing 10 winds with a percussion chorus that extends itself far enough to include a lion's roar, siren, woodblocks and slapsticks.

In case you are wondering, the lion's roar comes from dragging a heavy rope through a hole cut in the bottom of a wooden tub. Like most Varese, the central concern of the music is to offer listeners new concepts in sound. Blocks of sound, sounds launched into space, new dimensions in sound were the chief stimuli to Varese's creative thinking. Hyperprism was one step on the journey that lasted the entire final half-century of his life.

United Press International

Seiji Ozawa.

Ozawa conducted the music not from the podium, but standing on the stage floor, directly in front of the three woodwinds at stage center; behind them were ranged the brass and percussion. It was a completely informed and lively reading that presented the audience with the evening's second grouping of instruments.

For the Mahler First, everyone was there, the full ensemble in its only appearance of the evening. While it would be foolish to suggest that any orchestra functions automatically in any great music, the Mahler First is certainly in the Philadelphians' blood these days.

With the rediscovered "Blumine" movement, they have played it often at their home base, on tour and in the recording studio, and are scheduled to open the summer season with it at Wolf Trap. Perhaps a change is in order.

Ozawa knows how well Ormandy's musicians know and can play Mahler. But he is not a man to take them through another man's account. In matters of balance, dynamics, phrasing and tempos, his Mahler First was a very different thing from Ormandy's. Its gaiety was less tinged with the "weltschmerz" that belongs there; its waltz felt more unabashedly Viennese-light-hearted, rather than Viennese-world-weary. The great violin peroration leading into the Dflat section was lighter in weight, with the climaxes rather the same, though perhaps more frenetic.

It was a reading of beauty, of youth, of impulsiveness in music where these things were once pertinent, though they would not long remain so.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

FEB 13 1972

New England Newsclip

A Look At the Arts

E. J. DIAS

Boston Symphony has new director

The recent appointment of Seigi Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the 1973-74 season, and of Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas as principal guest conductors is of considerable interest. Ozawa, whom I have seen conduct many times, is a diminutive, dynamic, intense Japanese of 36 with a good deal of drive and a musical background that includes the artistic direction at Tanglewood, service as conductor of the Toronto Symphony, and his two present directing posts with the San Francisco Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic.

That the great Boston aggregation needs a conductor who will take an interest in them and restore some of the cohesion and esprit de corps which has somewhat declined in recent years is obvious. The present musical director, William Steinberg, is an able man, but he has been plagued by illness during his Boston tenure; consequently, his appearances on the Symphony Hall podium have been rare.

What the orchestra needs is a sure and firm guiding hand — one that can win the respect and cooperation of the players. Whether Ozawa can fill the bill only time will tell. However, the appointment of Davis as a permanent guest conductor (this means that he will spend six weeks in Boston for each of the next three years) is welcome news.

It is no secret in professional circles that the Boston Symphony has long wooed Davis and has, in fact, on several occasions offered him the music directorship. Davis has not accepted the post because his recent interests have been in opera. For example, last week he conducted "Pelleas and Melisande" at the Metropolitan, and in England he presides over the Covent Garden Opera as well as serving as permanent guest conductor of the BBC Symphony. A man of 44 with a no-nonsense approach to music, he is a highly competent conductor, and his presence in Boston, even on a limited basis, should be beneficial to the orchestra.

As for young Thomas, he is, although tremendously gifted, still in the process of development. The experience he is gaining as associate conductor of the Boston ensemble and as chief conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic will stand him in good stead in future years. He is not yet ready, however, to take over the important post as music director of the Boston Symphony — although this remains a possibility in the future.

In any event, these changes in Boston were badly needed. Let us hope that they mean a return to the glory that was once the hallmark of the Boston Symphony.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 290,961

FEB 13 1972

New England Newsclip

What Determines Orchestra's Future

To the Herald Traveler Editor:

I believe the feeling of confidence which your editorial has expressed in the future of Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Ozawa would be justified were musicianship alone the orchestra's urgent need.

It seems to me, however, that equally important is the need for leadership and this, I suggest, can only be provided by a conductor who identifies with Boston, who lives here and makes Boston and its culture his first priority. This need is not met by the appointment of a man, no matter how talented, who has a greater loyalty to another city, perhaps to two other cities, and who next year can come here for only one visit, and in the next and following years can spare only ten weeks of his time for Boston.

The Ozawa, like the Steinberg appointment, seems to me a regrettable compromise with the true requirements of Boston Symphony.

You speak of an arduous search by the trustees. It is reasonable to infer that there must have been such, but the nature and extent of the search or the qualifications being sought have never been made known. This points up the orchestra's second urgent need—improved communications.

By carefully following the Boston and New York papers subscribers can occasionally glean bits of information about the orchestra and some collateral activities, but better rapport and perhaps a broader financial support would be encouraged by a policy of open disclosure of the orchestra's plans and problems to its constituency.

HESLIP E. SUTHERLAND

Quincy

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORLD
DAILY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 9 1972

A man with transcontinental talents, Seiji Ozawa, 36, will be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-74 season — and will also continue to hold the same post with the San Francisco Symphony where he has been musical director since 1970.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

FEB 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Ozawa to conduct symphony

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973 - 74 season.

During the coming season, 1972 - 73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as Music Advisor and continue to serve as Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home. Ozawa last conducted the Boston Symphony in November of 1971.

Ozawa is presently Conductor and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony, Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies. In 1973 - 74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer.

Ozawa is present guest conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Both the Boston and San Francisco Symphony Orchestras have figured prominently in the spectacular career of the 36 - year - old conductor. Seiji Ozawa's first visit to the United States came as a student conductor at Tanglewood in 1960 as the result of an invitation from Charles Munch.

PILOT
(CATHOLIC)
BOSTON, MASS.
135,000

FEB 12 1972

New England Newsclip

By Francis M. Prout

Seiji Ozawa, brilliant young conductor of the San Francisco Symphony accepted the overture of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Trustees—among whom is Msgr. Edward G. Murray, Pastor of St. Paul's, Cambridge—to become Music Director starting with the 1973-1974 season. The mop-top musician who has guest conducted the BSO a number of times much to the pleasure of the Hub's demanding symphonyophiles, will next conduct the BSO at Tanglewood this summer. Ozawa will retain his San Francisco assignment next season while doubling in brass in the Hub as Music Advisor with Michael Tilson Thomas and Colin Davis, assisting as Principal Guest Conductors.

OUR NEIGHBORS

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

FEB 14 1972

TO HEAD THE BOSTON—Seiji Ozawa, who has guest conducted many times at Saratoga and over at Tanglewood, will take over as music director of the Boston Symphony with the 1973-74 season. During the 1972-73 season he will act as music advisor of the Symphony and will continue to hold his post as conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony. In 1973 Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Orchestras. At present Ozawa is guest conducting with the Philadelphia Orchestra which is in residence at the Saratoga Center every August.

NEWS ADVERTISER
WESTFIELD, MASS.
W. 5,050

FEB 18 1972

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Appoints Ozawa As Its Conductor

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season.

During the coming Season, 1972-73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as music advisor and continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home. Mr. Ozawa last conducted the Boston Symphony in November of 1971.

Mr. Ozawa is presently conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Seiji Ozawa's first visit to the United States came as a student conductor at Tanglewood in 1960 as the result of an invitation from Charles Munch, then music director of the Boston Symphony, after Ozawa had won the 1959 International Conductors' Contest at Besancon. In 1970 he became artistic director of Tanglewood. In addition to regular appearances as conductor, he has conducted several recordings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for RCA Records.

Seiji Ozawa's first major North American guest conducting engagement was with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in 1962. He has been its music director since 1970, and in 1973 will take it abroad on its first European tour.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 427,270

FEB 9 1972

New Boston conductor

Ending four years of speculation about who would take permanent charge of the orchestra, the Boston Symphony has named 36-year-old Seiji Ozawa as its music director beginning with the 1973-74 season. Ozawa, who has signed a three-year pact with the Boston, will also remain as music director of the San Francisco Symphony through 1976. During next season, Ozawa will have the temporary post of music adviser at Boston. Young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, who many thought would get the director's job at Boston, will join Britain's Colin Davis as principal guest conductors for 1972-73. Ozawa has served as music director of the Toronto Symphony and Japan Philharmonic and assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic and as guest conductor with many major symphonies and musical festivals.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 12,559

FEB 18 1972

New Engla News

Seiji Ozawa Named Symphony Director

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as Music Director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season. During the coming season, 1972-73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as music advisor and continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home. Mr Ozawa last conducted the Boston Symphony in November of 1971.

Mr Ozawa is presently Conductor and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony, Mr Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies. In 1973-74 he will devote at least ten weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,000

FEB 11 1972

New Engln Newsc

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 11 1972

New England Newsclip

Choice of Ozawa

Re the reaction to Ozawa's appointment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Some published comments about the extra-musical characteristics of Mr. Ozawa were tasteless and representative of the feelings from which even grosser cruelties stem.

Issues of hair and birthplace are not germaine, never are! All we need to know is if the man can conduct and get along with the orchestra, and since this one can, the choice is excellent, the matter closed.

PAUL LAMAR

Allston

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .

Lillian

Tokyo-trained Seiji Ozawa a young 36, will become the Boston Symphony's new music director beginning 1973. He will succeed William Steinberg. During his Boston tenure, Mr. Ozawa will continue as music director of the San Francisco Symphony with whom he has been associated since 1970. A former pianist turned conductor as the result of a soccer injury to his hand, Ozawa has finesse and carries the promise of a long and successful career as a maestro. . .

* * *

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

FEB 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Ozawa to conduct symphony

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973 - 74 season.

During the coming season, 1972 - 73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as Music Advisor and continue to serve as Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home. Ozawa last conducted the Boston Symphony in November of 1971.

Ozawa is presently Conductor and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony, Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies. In 1973 - 74 he will devote at least 10 weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer.

Ozawa is present guest conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Both the Boston and San Francisco Symphony Orchestras have figured prominently in the spectacular career of the 36 - year - old conductor. Seiji Ozawa's first visit to the United States came as a student conductor at Tanglewood in 1960 as the result of an invitation from Charles Munch.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 427,270

FEB 9 1972

New Boston conductor

Ending four years of speculation about who would take permanent charge of the orchestra, the Boston Symphony has named 36-year-old Seiji Ozawa as its music director beginning with the 1973-74 season. Ozawa, who has signed a three-year pact with the Boston, will also remain as music director of the San Francisco Symphony through 1976. During next season, Ozawa will have the temporary post of music adviser at Boston. Young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, who many thought would get the director's job at Boston, will join Britain's Colin Davis as principal guest conductors for 1972-73. Ozawa has served as music director of the Toronto Symphony and Japan Philharmonic and assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic and as guest conductor with many major symphonies and musical festivals.

PILOT
(CATHOLIC)
BOSTON, MASS.
135,000

FEB 12 1972 New England Newsclip

By Francis M. Prout

Seiji Ozawa, brilliant young conductor of the San Francisco Symphony accepted the overture of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Trustees—among whom is Msgr. Edward G. Murray, Pastor of St. Paul's, Cambridge—to become Music Director starting with the 1973-1974 season. The mop-top musician who has guest conducted the BSO a number of times much to the pleasure of the Hub's demanding symphonyophiles, will next conduct the BSO at Tanglewood this summer. Ozawa will retain his San Francisco assignment next season while doubling in brass in the Hub as Music Advisor with Michael Tilson Thomas and Colin Davis, assisting as Principal Guest Conductors.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 12,559

FEB 18 1972 New England Newsc

Seiji Ozawa Named Symphony Director

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as Music Director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season. During the coming season, 1972-73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as music advisor and continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home. Mr Ozawa last conducted the Boston Symphony in November of 1971.

Mr Ozawa is presently Conductor and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Beginning in 1973, in order to take on his expanded responsibilities with the Boston Symphony, Mr Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies. In 1973-74 he will devote at least ten weeks to Boston and more in subsequent seasons, in addition to his presence at Tanglewood each summer.

OUR NEIGHBORS

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 115,169

FEB 14 1972

TO HEAD THE BOSTON—Seiji Ozawa, who has guest conducted many times at Saratoga and over at Tanglewood, will take over as music director of the Boston Symphony with the 1973-74 season. During the 1972-73 season he will act as music advisor of the Symphony and will continue to hold his post as conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony. In 1973 Ozawa will confine his North American appearances exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Orchestras. At present Ozawa is guest conducting with the Philadelphia Orchestra which is in residence at the Saratoga Center every August.

POST GAZETTE
BOSTON, MASS.

FEB 11 1972 New England Newsc

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .

Ellen

To so-called Seiji Ozawa a young [illegible] will become the Boston Symphony's [illegible] music director [illegible] Within a [illegible] Boston [illegible] ten years, Mr. Ozawa will continue as music director of the San Francisco [illegible] has been [illegible] A former [illegible] [illegible] long and [illegible] [illegible]

NEWS ADVERTISER
WESTFIELD, MASS.
W. 5,050

FEB 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Appoints Ozawa As Its Conductor

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season.

During the coming Season, 1972-73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as music advisor and continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home. Mr. Ozawa last conducted the Boston Symphony in November of 1971.

Mr. Ozawa is presently conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Seiji Ozawa's first visit to the United States came as a student conductor at Tanglewood in 1960 as the result of an invitation from Charles Munch, then music director of the Boston Symphony, after Ozawa had won the 1959 International Conductors' Contest at Besancon. In 1970 he became artistic director of Tanglewood. In addition to regular appearances as conductor, he has conducted several recordings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for RCA Records.

Seiji Ozawa's first major North American guest conducting engagement was with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in 1962. He has been its music director since 1970, and in 1973 will take it abroad on its first European tour.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 11 1972 New England Newsclip

Choice of Ozawa

Re the reaction to Ozawa's appointment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Some published comments about the extra-musical characteristics of Mr. Ozawa were tasteless and representative of the feelings from which even grosser cruelties stem.

Issues of hair and birthplace are not germaine, never are! All we need to know is if the man can conduct and get along with the orchestra, and since this one can, the choice is excellent, the matter closed.

PAUL LAMAR

Allston

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa: Only Time Will Tell

By Peter M. Knapp

"What they want is a conductor to take a real interest in them, and they haven't had this for some reason. When they find one who will, they'll be good again. They've just been drifting, that's all."

Also sprach Colin Davis in a New York Times interview a few days ago in reference to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Davis' remarks were certainly made before the announcement that Seiji Ozawa will become music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season. But the Ozawa appointment still leaves a number of questions up in the air which perhaps only time will resolve.

Next year, for example, the Boston Symphony will still be "drifting," as Davis put it. The orchestra's standards have not really slipped to the point the English conductor suggests — there have been some splendid performances lately — but unquestionably the lack of permanent leadership has put considerable strain upon the orchestra as it has had to adjust to a parade of guest conductors.

Not Since

Boston has not had a permanent full-time music director since Erich Leinsdorf left at the end of the 1969-70 season. Since then the Boston Symphony has had to share its nominal music director, William Steinberg, with the Pittsburgh Symphony. And because of Steinberg's illness, Boston has seen even less of him than his split-schedule contemplated.

For all intents and purposes, the principal conductor of the orchestra for the past two years has been Michael Tilson Thomas, the youthful Californian who came to Boston as Steinberg's assistant conductor and has blossomed into a mature and internationally acclaimed star of the podium whose career is being compared to that of Leonard Bernstein.

During the next season, Ozawa will be the BSO's "Music adviser" and will conduct here only one week. Davis and Thomas will be "principal guests conductors," with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein continuing as assistant conductor. (For the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, the co-leadership of Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, will continue indefinitely.)

This means until the 1973-74 season, when Ozawa will conduct at least 10 weeks in Boston, the BSO will have no resident director. Although no one has said so, you can read between the lines that the valuable Silverstein will be more or less in charge while the parade of guest conductors continues.

After that, Boston again will compromise on divided leadership, sharing Ozawa with San Francisco, where he has been music director of the symphony since 1970 with an extended contract running to 1976. Under the terms of the agreement with the Boston Symphony, Ozawa will confine his "North American appearances" exclusively to the Boston and San Francisco Symphonies (14 weeks in 1973-74). But this doesn't limit his extra-continental appearances with the Japan Philharmonic, of which he is also music director, or guest appearances in Europe. Ozawa will be very much a young man on the go, typical of the jet-set conductor.

Too Much

Ironically, Erich Leinsdorf gave as the reason for his resignation announced in 1967, the burden of too much work. He was functioning as administrative music director and principal conductor of the BSO, plus running the eight-week Berkshire Music Festival and summer school at Tanglewood.

During that season, there were 86 subscription concerts in Boston, plus trips to New York, several New England cities, St. Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, Newark and Washington. Leinsdorf noted that in six and a half years he had conducted nearly 600 concerts, to say nothing of rehearsals, or the long, painstaking work associated with advance planning of programs, lining up guest conductors and soloists, learning new scores and restudying standard repertoire, auditioning new players, and the myriad other tasks the music director must attend to.

Ozawa and Thomas . . . question marks

Too much, said Leinsdorf — but Ozawa is going to have two orchestras, plus Tanglewood and other commitments. If the full-time job was too much for Leinsdorf, is Ozawa going to be able to manage on a part-time basis? When asked this question at a news, conference the Japanese conductor replied hopefully: "I know the musicians, and the management will help me. If the musicians help, I can do it."

The fact of life in musical leadership these days is intense competition among orchestras for the small band of premiere conductors — a market of small supply and great demand. Hardly any of the major conductors are content with one orchestra or opera house. Colin Davis, for example, says he "can't do two jobs" — but he is music director of Covent Garden, the London opera house; chief guest conductor of the BBC Symphony; principal conductor of the Promenade concerts in London; and directs at the Metropolitan Opera in New York plus taking on the additional assignment as one of the two principal guest conductors in Boston next season. One job?

Not Content

Besides the artistic scope such multi-directorships offer the ranking conductors, it's also becoming a matter of status. The days apparently are gone when a prominent musician could be content with the directorship of one major orchestra; the trend probably started when Herbert von Karajan in the 1950s showed he could direct the Berlin Philharmonic, run the Vienna State Opera and the Salzburg Festival, direct at La Scala in Milan, and keep a foot in London and Paris as well.

Of necessity, this kind of arrangement means a conductor has to compromise on his time with his orchestras. And for Boston, it's not an ideal situation, for the BSO, as Leinsdorf pointed out, is a fulltime job — and then some. Leinsdorf may have been the last completely full-time director of the BSO.

However, if is pretty clear that the Boston Symphony was left with few choices. Most of the leading conductors of the stature Boston would consider have been tied up years in advance. There were reports that the post had been offered to Carlo Maria Giulini and to Davis, both of whom turned it down. And rumors flew concerning other possibilities.

Ozawa has the benefit of youth (he is 36) and vitality, plus the evident good will of the musicians, who say they are very happy with the appointment. Whether this will endure and insure a high level of artistry remains to be seen, but it is a positive factor, and Ozawa's rapport with the Orchestra has been evident in performance. (Cellist Gregor Piatigorsky once commented that a guest conductor has an advantage over a permanent one for three reasons: "He really knows his one program, the orchestra does not really know him, and everyone knows he will go away.")

Ozawa's appointment also shatters precedent. Most of the Boston Symphony's music directors have been in the Germanic meat-and-potatoes tradition, occasionally spiced with Gallic musicians, though dominated in recent memory by the Russian Serge Koussevitsky. For many of those to whom Symphony is a tradition, The Music Director is a tall, stately, dignified European presence of some six decades, whose fondest scores are marked Beethoven or Tschaikowsky. Ozawa, a Westernized oriental with Beatle-length hair and a fondness for casual Mod dress, is not in the pattern. Yet his personality and flair have made him popular with audiences.

'Best Known'

There remains the unanswered question of Michael Tilson Thomas' future relationship with the orchestra. For the time being, it will continue, although the transposing of Thomas' title from "associate conductor" to "principal guest conductor" suggests a process of disassociation. Within three years, Thomas has become the world's best known "associate conductor," has gained a music directorship of his own in Buffalo, has made several highly praised recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, initiated an exciting Spectrum series this year that has packed Symphony Hall with enthusiastic young people, has numerous guest conducting invitations and will make his debut at the Metropolitan Opera next season.

The future relationship of Boston's musical wunderkind is about as precise as the shifting harmonies of Debussy's "Images." He will, of course, conduct a good share of next year's winter season, and will continue (apparently indefinitely) with the Spectrum concerts. But as Ozawa takes over the directorship of the Symphony, how long will the ambitious and talented Thomas remain in Boston now that the top job is not available? Another question mark.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Tempers not only for sopranos

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

QUODLIBET Bos Symphony

While the Metropoliton Opera and Met-watchers are anticipating the new regime of General Manager Goeran Gentele, the Stockholm Opera — where Gentele used to be director — is having its problems.

According to "Opera News," the newly appointed, 28-year-old music director Leif Segerstam has resigned his post, claiming he cannot cooperate with the new director Bertil Bokstedt.

"This is my way to show that I reject Bokstedt as a director personality," Segerstam said of his resignation. He accused Bokstedt of social climbing and "caring only about golden statistics and not artistic quality."

Bokstedt called Segerstam's action regrettable but said the conductor's statements only confirm that he is immature and that his presence "taints the atmosphere."

Mudslinging in connection with new artistic managements seems to be de rigeur, and Boston is no exception. Among the artistic and managerial people at the BSO, there has been unanimous praise for the selection of Seiji Ozawa as new music director. However, reactions among outside observers have been a bit more mixed.

Since the appearance of an article I assembled on initial reactions to Ozawa's appointment, there have been a number of letters with unsolicited opinions.

One states: "He's (Ozawa's) just what the BSO needs — a conductor with beads and a saddle (shoulder) bag, and ten years experience. (Signed) Racist Joe."

And on the other side, a former subscriber writes: "There are a great many people who haven't gone to Symphony for years who are now enthusiastically considering redeeming their lapsed subscriptions.

"In spite of our declining interest in the standard orchestral repertoire, we have listened to some concerts conducted by Mr. Ozawa and for the first time in years found great pleasure in various "warhorses" he conducted with his marvelous elucidation of structure combined with attention to interesting detail.

"At any rate . . . some of us are absolutely delighted that Mr. Ozawa is coming to Boston. Now there may be an air of excitement surrounding what was once considered the world's finest orchestra — and may soon be again."

Dame Margot Fonteyn will dance the role of "The Sleeping Beauty" with the National Ballet of Washington at the Music Hall, March 2 at 8 p.m.

The role of Aurora has been danced more often

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . in shorn era

and over a longer period of time by Dame Margot than by any other ballerina.

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
D. 33,737

FEB 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Out of town

Donald Lee, black poet and philosopher who teaches black literature at Howard University, will present a lecture and reading tonight at 8 o'clock in the Washington Room at Trinity College. Headliner for Trinity's observance of Black History Week, Lee is the founder of Third World Press, editor of Black Book Bulletin and author of "Think Black," "Black Pride," and "Dynamite Voices: New Black Poets of the 1960's."

———

The Greek pianist, Gina Bachauer, will be the soloist for the Hartford Symphony Orchestra's seventh subscription concert March 1 at 8:15 p.m. at the Bushnell.

———

The University Players, University of Hartford, will present Paul Foster's Viking fantasy, "Heimskringla," March 8 through 12 at 8:15 p.m. in the Auerbach auditorium on campus. The play tells the story of Leif Ericson's discovery of America.

The Elm City Kennel Club Inc. will hold its 56th annual all-breed dog show Feb. 27 at the Goffe Street Armory, New Haven. Judging will begin at 10 a.m. Parking will be available at Bowen Field, with a shuttle service to the armory. Admission will be charged.

———

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony beginning with the 1973-74 season. During the coming season, 1972-73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as music advisor and continue to serve as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. Ozawa last conducted the Boston Symphony in November, 1972.

Ozawa is presently conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

MAY 1972

Appointments

Seiji Ozawa has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony, beginning with the 1973-74 season. During the coming season (1972-73) he will serve as music advisor, and he will continue as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival. He will also retain his position as music director of the San Francisco Symphony, where his contract runs through the 1975-76 season. . .

The Boston Globe
(EVENING)
D. 195,032
FEB 13 1972
New England Newsclip

OZAWA: Why he declined, accepted BSO offer

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

PHILADELPHIA—The first question was where to go for lunch. Seiji Ozawa, whose appointment as Music Director the Boston Symphony had announced three days earlier and who was now in the middle of a three-week guest engagement with the Philadelphia Orchestra, was not allowed to eat in the dining room of his posh hotel in Rittenhouse Square because he no longer owns any jackets and ties. And room service, he added, "is slow, very slow. Do you mind delicatessen?" To long-sleeved knit shirt, beads, jeans, moccasins, he added an orange-lined jacket of pale, spiky fur and a canvas shoulder-bag, and we went out into the world of corned beef, spiced beef, tongue ("sorry, dear, pastrami's out"), and beer—"and bring plenty of extra pickles, those fresh ones."

Ozawa had spent the morning and some of the previous evening with the Boston Symphony's Assistant Manager, Mary Smith, working out details of the coming summer at Tanglewood—"we're very late." Together with Gunther Schuller, he has been Artistic Director there since 1970, and in a sense, his two summers there served both parties as a trial marriage before the Boston Symphony's formal proposal to him in November and his firm acceptance of their suit only two Tuesdays ago.

"Before that, whenever I was asked unofficially, when Lennie asked me, I alway said 'no.'" Then, when BSO Manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr., began to ask more and more "officially," Ozawa found that an automatic "no" would no longer do. Boston was a flattering offer. More than that, it had special associations for him, that hearing the Boston Symphony on its Japanese tour in 1957 had been one of those major shocks that had formed his on its Japanese tour in 1957 had been one determination to become a conductor, that it was Charles Munch who had "discovered" him in Europe and had brought him to America to attend the 1960 session of the Berkshire Music Center (then 23, he won the Koussevitzky Prize and got an "a name to remember" review in the Times), and his two years of helping to run Tanglewood. In November, he had two weeks with the orchestra in Boston, and they were an exceptional success with public, players, and press.

On the other hand, in 1970 he had succeeded Joseph Krips as Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony. He began with the usual three-year contract, and in the same November 1971 he re-upped for 1973-76. He takes his San Francisco post very seriously—everyone who knows Ozawa remarks on his seriousness about obligations and his loyalty. The board there, he says, has been marvelous about allowing him the means to improve the orchestra and is paying for the expensive luxury of a European tour in May 1973. The San Francisco management had reason to be pleased with Ozawa: pre-season ticket sales this year were up 13 percent compared with the same time last year, and 1970-71 had shown a 13½ percent increase over the last Krips season.

For Ozawa, at any rate, it was not a moment just to say thank you very much and good-bye.

When he finally decided to accept the Boston offer, Ozawa showed his regard for his San Francisco orchestra by insisting on taking time out of his Philadelphia rehearsals to fly to the Coast and back in a 23-hour period in order to tell them the news himself. Newsweek, not sharing Ozawa's sensibility, broke the story two days before his trip to California, moreover getting it wrong by saying he would leave San Francisco in 1973 in order to take Boston: it upset and angered Ozawa so much that he scared the Boston trustees and management half to death by seriously turning over in his mind the idea of not accepting their offer after all.

Ozawa also stresses how much he and his wife, Vera, love the city of San Francisco. It became clear to him that if he took on Boston, it would be in addition to, not instead of San Francisco. How would the two managements take to that, particularly Boston, just coming to the end of a not very happy experience of sharing a conductor, (Steinberg) with another city

THE BIRTH OF ACCEPTANCE — Seiji Ozawa indicates the birth of his daughter influenced his acceptance of the offer from the B.S.O. Seira, born Dec. 29, 1971, is six days old in this photo.

(Pittsburgh)? Boston understood the conditions under which Ozawa was to be had, and wanted him enough. San Francisco had no objections either, partly, Ozawa speculated, "because is different market, partly because Boston Symphony is Boston Symphony, is not like sharing with San Diego or Albany."

"But I think, am I crazy?" He worried about his neck, to which he did painful disc and nerve damage last season during four days' rehearsing and three performances of the Mahler 8th at La Scala, Milan, where the soloists and the hundreds of choristers were up on high platforms, "for a week I conduct like this," tipping his head all the way back, "then I go to hospital." He saw though, that if so inclined, he could as readily kill himself running one orchestra and guest conducting all over the place as running two.

OZAWA, Page 74

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227
APR 12 1972

Ozawa Wins Cultural Prize In Japan

Tokyo

Seiji Ozawa, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, Japan Philharmonic and Tanglewood Festival, has been named 1972 winner of the Japanese Academy of Arts' Cultural Prize. It will be presented on June 7 in Japan.

The yearly award is made "for outstanding contributions in cultural arts for Japan and abroad." It marks the first official recognition of Ozawa's talent from within Japan.

Now age 36, he will assume directorship of the Boston Symphony in September 1973, in addition to concurrent duties in Tokyo and San Francisco.

Our Correspondent

DAYTON DAILY NEWS
DAYTON, OHIO
D. 161,249 SUN. 215,360
FEB 20 1972

Musical Game-Playing Goes On and On and On

By BETTY DIETZ KREBS

It was just a year ago that the musical game-playing had all the gossips busy. Who would follow William Steinberg in the post he was giving up with the Boston Symphony? Where would Cleveland find a successor to the late George Szell? If Eugene Ormandy decided to vacate the Philadelphia Orchestra post, who would move in?

But it takes more than bodies to fill the gaps. The games are still far from over, and it will be fascinating to see what happens.

The most intriguing situation is unquestionably Cleveland's — how much will Lorin Maazel take from the musicians if they keep up the cold-shoulder treatment after making their Maazel veto a juicy scandal, or will the musicians have the good sense to quiet down and do what they're hired to do?

Another thought to chew over is the impact that colorful, independent Seiji Ozawa, still only 36, will have on staid and proper Boston. Incidentally, four or five days before Ozawa told the world he was the new man for the Boston Symphony, report had already been leaked out and a spokesman for the orchestra told me on the phone that no decision had been made. So much for official statements.

Ozawa, who has been artistic director of the Boston Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood since 1970, will take over as music director of the symphony starting with the 1973-74 season. Next year he'll serve as music adviser only, because of prior commitments.

Few young conductors have shot up quite as fast as Ozawa. He turned up at Tanglewood as a student conductor in 1960, during his first U.S. visit. Two years later he made hios major conducting debut with the San Francisco Symphony and for the 1964-65 season he served as assistant to Leonard Bernstein for the New York Philharmonic.

There was talk about the Cincinnati Symphony's resident conductor, Erich Kunzel, in connection with the Boston post. Kunzel did about 10 guest conducting stints with the Boston Symphony during the holidays. But don't rule out Kunzel. Arthur Fiedler won't go on indefinitely with the Boston Pops, no matter how hale and fit he looks.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,681
FEB 11 1972

Bernstein To Conduct In Boston?

Leonard Bernstein, having left the New York Philharmonic, may wind up right back where he started — in Boston. He may do some guest conductor work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

There's nothing definite yet, but at a news conference introducing the BSO's incoming music director, Seiji Ozawa, orchestra officials noted Bernstein would be required to live in Boston next winter as a visiting professor at Harvard. And, they said, it wouldn't be too surprising if he kept his baton in hand with the orchestra while he's in town.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
D. 84,000
FEB 17 1972
New England Newsc

Passing Show
—By Fred Russell

OZAWA APPOINTED

Seiji Ozawa has been appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1973-74 season. During the coming season, 1972-73, when his commitments will allow him to be in Boston only briefly, he will serve as music advisor and continue as artistic director of the Berkshire Festival, a post he has held since 1970 at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

Ozawa is presently conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he will continue to hold.

Ozawa's road to BSO began with that 'C boom-boom-boom...'

★ OZAWA
Continued from Page 69

He decided that by giving up all other North American engagements and reducing his commitments in Japan and Europe, the Boston and San Francisco combination could add stability to his life, though he never specifically said so. Ozawa offered enough to make it clear that the fact his wife was pregnant made a tremendous difference to his thinking about all this. Their daughter, Seira, was born (9 lbs., 2 ounces) in San Francisco on Dec. 29, and that is a date to which he frequently referred as that beginning of a "new life."

About Vera and Seira: the Ozawas have been married between four and five years, he having been previously married to a Japanese pianist now living in Paris ("very good pianist, and we are still very good friends"). Vera Ozawas father was a white Russian emigre to Japan (she has a Russian grandmother in San Francisco), her mother is Japanese, she herself was born in Yokohama. The name, Seira, is put together from Seiji and Vera, but "ra" is also the second syllable of Seiji's mother's name, Sakra, and of Nara, which is the Ozawas' favorite city in Japan. "We hope to have lots of children."

Ozawa, now 36, is the third of four sons. His father, who died last year, was a dentist, "strong father, strong man, normal man, very normal man. He drink much, I drink much." He was a Buddhist, but his widow is a Presbyterian. The children were brought up as Christians, but Seiji's oldest brother returned to Buddhism. He is a sculptor, married to a painter, but because they make no money at those callings, Dr. Ozawa bought them a small inn in Kyoto — "lovely life, very quiet."

The second brother's field is German literature, and this year he is on an exchange professorship at the University of Marburg. The youngest is an actor, "not classical, but more like Broadway musicals." When they were boys, the four sang together as the Golden Gate Quartet — voices and ages descended in parallel, so Seiji sang first bass — borrowing the repertory (learned off recordings) as well as the name of the famous black close - harmony gospel group.

"No, we didn't really know English." Ozawa's English now though fairly heavily accented and inclined to lack articles, is efficent and most of the time quite fluent. He gets apprehensive about words in which R occurs third in a series of consonants — "spectrum," for instance, or "Hyperprism," the piece by Varese he was conducting that week, or "Also sprach Zarathustra," which was on the programs for the week following. What about other languages "Japanese, marvelous for poetry, otherwise no use. French and German, just enough to rehearse an orchestra. Italian, soooooo little! I must learn Italian because so many Italians speak nothing else, live in very closed world. When I did 'Cosi fan tutte' at Salzburg I had many Italian singers and Maestro Karajan found me Italian rehearsal pianist — was difficult." He wants to learn Russian to speak with his grandmother-in-law in San Francisco, and he is enviously admiring of his easily polyglot colleagues like Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, and Niklaus Wyss, his Swiss assistant conductor.

He does most of his reading in Japanese, and San Francisco is a very possible town in which to get books in that language. Often he first finds something in English, then, if it engages him enough that he wants really to read it — recently Solzhenitsyn, for example — he will get it in Japanese translation. He is now reading a lot of Japanese history, offering himself as an appallingly under-educated man now catching up — "that is trouble with going to Conservatory."

How does he, as an Oriental, live in Western culture and specifically in so refined and special a product of it as its music? "Very difficult question, very difficult. Western music is fresh to me more than foreign. My teacher, Professor Hideo Saito, who had spent time in Germany, said I must go to Europe. There music is like bread, necessary. In Japan, they hear about Western music, they don't want to miss anything, they enjoy, but is not like bread." Ozawa's musical upbringing was in Western music. The first time he learned anything about Gagaku music and its instruments was when he prepared a new piece by Ishi for the previous week's concerts in Philadelphia; his first experience with the biwa and the shakuhachi, two popular Japanese instruments, was in Takemitsu's "November Steps" (on his Boston programs in November 1969). As the product of an essentially Western education, though it was received in Japan, Ozawa is now anxious to recapture the Japanese part of his heritage: "My daughter will look Japanese, and I want her to know what that's all about."

Ozawa began piano at seven, and enrolled in the then new Toho School in Tokyo. He broke both index fingers playing rugby — "I wanted to be a really good rugby player, at highest level" — and he was told that ended his prospects as a pianist. For months he did not know what to do, then said he wanted to be a composer. He does not compose now, though for a while he did it quite seriously and successfully, writing, among other things, the score for a popular Japanese film about the war in Okinawa.

He recalled the impact of hearing an orchestra for the first time — "like this!" (fist brought sharply to side of head) — and the successively greater shocks of hearing on their Japanese tours the Symphony of the Air ("I can still hear the opening of Brahms 1st, that C, boom-boom-boom, boom-boom-boom, I had never heard such sound") and then "Boston Symphony under Maestro Munch, so full of fire."

So knowing that he wanted to conduct became surer, and he took his teacher's advice and went to Europe "for my crazy scooter period." Scooter period? "Yes, I had no money at all, but Japanese motor scooters were just beginning to be exported and I thought perhaps scooter firm would give me money and a scooter to promote scooters in Europe." He went to every scooter manufacturer until he found one who did just that, a little bit of money anyway, and after a long trip by freighter he landed at Messina with a scooter

FUEL FOR THOUGHT — Following the advice of his music teacher, Seiji Ozawa studied in Europe, and to support himself there he promoted Japanese motor scooters.

Ozawa's road to Hub

★ OZAWA
Cont'd from preceding page

16

and a guitar: "I did not play guitar, but I thought I must have musical instrument. I built case on ship."

His future first wife by chance saw an announcement of the Besancon conductor's competition on a bulletin board at the Paris Conservatoire where she was studying piano, and then came the orderly sequence of winning at Besancon where Munch was a judge, Munch's invitation to Ozawa to go to Tanglewood, the Koussevitzky prize, the assistantship under Bernstein in New York, the first professional engagements in America (the very first was with the San Francisco Symphony in 1962, Boston following in 1964, the music directorship at Ravinia Park (the Chicago Symphony's summer season) and Toronto, then San Francisco and Boston.

Ozawa recalled a hard period when his reputation and the demand for his services grew faster than his repertory, a period where everything he did seemed to be for the first time. "Is better now." He says he is a quick study when he needs to be, but dislikes needing to be (even while enjoying the professionalism that makes it possible). He takes enormous pleasure in studying something for a long time and with great concentration as he could, for instance, with Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" and Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte." What was he working on now? Three Berlioz operas, "Benvenuto Cellini," "Beatrice and Benedict," and "The Trojans," and also Schoenberg's "Moses und Aron" ("so great and beautiful, more marvelous the more I learn").

In matters of repertory as well as other things, Ozawa expects his San Francisco and Boston jobs to pose very different challenges, "Boston is most musical city in America, where music is most like bread." He is pleased particularly with its many choruses, the excellent orchestral freelancers, the New England Conservatory, the adventurousness of the Opera Company of Boston (whose work he knows only by reputation), and the potential for a large young audience provided by the many colleges and universities. "To come to work in Boston is to find large, comfortable armchair all ready for you to sit in — nice, and also dangerous. In San Francisco we must still finish building chair."

Ozawa is not yet ready to talk about his Boston repertory, though he did say that he very much wants to do "Gurrelieder" for the Schoenberg centenary in 1974. Because of commitments made before his Boston appointment (which is preceded by a year as Music Advisor. 1972-73), he will be here for only one week next season. "I don't know program yet. We were going to do recording piece, maybe Saint-Saens 3rd Symphony. Now it's so important, we're going to have to think about."

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

APR 1972

Seiji Ozawa, Conductor and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, will add the music directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to his responsibilities beginning with the 1973-74 season.

Louis Hood, Public Relations Director of the Cleveland Orchestra and former Publicity Director of The Philadelphia Orchestra, returned in March to Philadelphia to assume his old post with the Orchestra. He succeeded Wayne Shilkret who was named Director of Publicity and Promotion at the Kennedy Center in Washington.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's
Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112

FEB 15 1972

Japanese Conductor Brings Frisco Symphony Back Into Limelight

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — A few strands of gray have appeared in conductor Seiji Ozawa's shoulder-length black hair.

But no one — certainly not the dirrectors of the San Francisco Symphony — has suggested that the real "long hair" of the classical music world get his locks trimmed.

Since the 35-year-old Ozawa took the baton from aging Josef Krips at the start of the 1970-71 season, the local orchestra's ticket sales have jumped dramatically.

Ozawa's raffish image, his swaying, bouncing vibrancy on the podium and his consummate musicianship have endeared him to both students and dowagers.

THE STUDENT-dominated Wednesday night concerts are a season-long sellout and sales for all concerts, including the Thursday matinees favored by well-to-do matrons, are running at record levels.

Ozawa, whose musical tastes run from European classical to Oriental to rock and roll, also conducts the Japanese Philharmonic, co-directs the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Summer Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., makes regular guest appearances throughout the world, and records with some of the nation's top symphonies.

He recently extended his original three-year contract as San Francisco's conductor and musical director for another three seasons — through 1976-77 — and said he was "cutting down" some of his other activities.

THE SAN FRANCISCO Symphony, a second-line orchestra since the late Pierre Monteux left it more than a dozen years ago, had improved steadily under Krips. And wtih Ozawa at the helm it has scheduled a 1973 European tour and is talking about recording again.

A native of Hoten, Japan, who apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years, Ozawa strode into his annual San Francisco news conference recently in his usual street garb; a shaggy, off-white, knee-length mongolian lamb coat; a thin blue silk jacket, blue turtleneck shirt, beads, faded blue jeans, white socks and black sandals.

IN HIS HEAVILY-accented and carefully chosen English, Ozawa talked about the state of classical music today and his ubiquitous musical tastes.

"We heard a few years ago that classical music is dead" he said. "I thought it might be true. But now it is coming to more people's ear.

"Life is more difficult (so) music is more important. Music is a very pure thing. You get it through your ears and it goes direct to your hear. You don't have to understand it. It is a natural thing.

"It comes from God to bring joy to people. They come to the concert to enjoy it."

OZAWA ADDED that he personally enjoys good rock and roll and said that a concert last year with a blues band worked very well.

"But it is dangerous," he added. "One orchestra tried it with a rock and roll band. When a band doesn't care about the sound, it can be disastrous."

Ozawa's road to BSO began with that 'C boom-boom-boom...'

★ OZAWA
Continued from Page 69

He decided that by giving up all other North American engagements and reducing his commitments in Japan and Europe, the Boston and San Francisco combination could add stability to his life, though he never specifically said so. Ozawa offered enough to make it clear that the fact his wife was pregnant made a tremendous difference to his thinking about all this. Their daughter, Seira, was born (9 lbs., 2 ounces) in San Francisco on Dec. 29, and that is a date to which he frequently referred as that beginning of a "new life."

About Vera and Seira: the Ozawas have been married between four and five years, he having been previously married to a Japanese pianist now living in Paris ("very good pianist, and we are still very good friends"). Vera Ozawas father was a white Russian emigre to Japan (she has a Russian grandmother in San Francisco), her mother is Japanese, she herself was born in Yokohama. The name, Seira, is put together from Seiji and Vera, but "ra" is also the second syllable of Seiji's mother's name, Sakra, and of Nara, which is the Ozawas' favorite city in Japan. "We hope to have lots of children."

Ozawa, now 36, is the third of four sons. His father, who died last year, was a dentist, "strong father, strong man, normal man, very normal man. He drink much, I drink much." He was a Buddhist, but his widow is a Presbyterian. The children were brought up as Christians, but Seiji's oldest brother returned to Buddhism. He is a sculptor, married to a painter, but because they make no money at those callings, Dr. Ozawa bought them a small inn in Kyoto — "lovely life, very quiet."

The second brother's field is German literature, and this year he is on an exchange professorship at the University of Marburg. The youngest is an actor, "not classical, but more like Broadway musicals." When they were boys, the four sang together as the Golden Gate Quartet — voices and ages descended in parallel, so Seiji sang first bass — borrowing the repertory (learned off recordings) as well as the name of the famous black close - harmony gospel group.

"No, we didn't really know English." Ozawa's English now though fairly heavily accented and inclined to lack articles, is efficent and most of the time quite fluent. He gets apprehensive about words in which R occurs third in a series of consonants — "spectrum," for instance, or "Hyperprism," the piece by Varese he was conducting that week, or "Also sprach Zarathustra," which was on the programs for the week following. What about other languages "Japanese, marvelous for poetry, otherwise no use. French and German, just enough to rehearse an orchestra. Italian, soooooo little! I must learn Italian because so many Italians speak nothing else, live in very closed world. When I did 'Cosi fan tutte' at Salzburg I had many Italian singers and Maestro Karajan found me Italian rehearsal pianist — was difficult." He wants to learn Russian to speak with his grandmother-in-law in San Francisco, and he is enviously admiring of his easily polyglot colleagues like Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, and Niklaus Wyss, his Swiss assistant conductor.

He does most of his reading in Japanese, and San Francisco is a very possible town in which to get books in that language. Often he first finds something in English, then, if it engages him enough that he wants really to read it — recently Solzhenitsyn, for example — he will get it in Japanese translation. He is now reading a lot of Japanese history, offering himself as an appallingly under-educated man now catching up — "that is trouble with going to Conservatory."

How does he, as an Oriental, live in Western culture and specifically in so refined and special a product of it as its music? "Very difficult question, very difficult. Western music is fresh to me more than foreign. My teacher, Professor Hideo Saito, who had spent time in Germany, said I must go to Europe. There music is like bread, necessary. In Japan, they hear about Western music, they don't want to miss anything, they enjoy, but is not like bread." Ozawa's musical upbringing was in Western music. The first time he learned anything about Gagaku music and its instruments was when he prepared a new piece by Ishi for the previous week's concerts in Philadelphia; his first experience with the biwa and the shakuhachi, two popular Japanese instruments, was in Takemitsu's "November Steps" (on his Boston programs in November 1969). As the product of an essentially Western education, though it was received in Japan, Ozawa is now anxious to recapture the Japanese part of his heritage: "My daughter will look Japanese, and I want her to know what that's all about."

Ozawa began piano at seven, and enrolled in the then new Toho School in Tokyo. He broke both index fingers playing rugby — "I wanted to be a really good rugby player, at highest level" — and he was told that ended his prospects as a pianist. For months he did not know what to do, then said he wanted to be a composer. He does not compose now, though for a while he did it quite seriously and successfully, writing, among other things, the score for a popular Japanese film about the war in Okinawa.

He recalled the impact of hearing an orchestra for the first time — "like this!" (fist brought sharply to side of head) — and the successively greater shocks of hearing on their Japanese tours the Symphony of the Air ("I can still hear the opening of Brahms 1st, that C, boom-boom-boom, boom-boom-boom, I had never heard such sound") and then "Boston Symphony under Maestro Munch, so full of fire."

So knowing that he wanted to conduct became surer, and he took his teacher's advice and went to Europe "for my crazy scooter period." Scooter period? "Yes, I had no money at all, but Japanese motor scooters were just beginning to be exported and I thought perhaps scooter firm would give me money and a scooter to promote scooters in Europe." He went to every scooter manufacturer until he found one who did just that, a little bit of money anyway, and after a long trip by freighter he landed at Messina with a scooter

FUEL FOR THOUGHT — Following the advice of his music teacher, Seiji Ozawa studied in Europe, and to support himself there he promoted Japanese motor scooters.

Ozawa's road to Hub

★ OZAWA
Cont'd from preceding page

and a guitar: "I did not play guitar, but I thought I must have musical instrument. I built case on ship."

His future first wife by chance saw an announcement of the Besancon conductor's competition on a bulletin board at the Paris Conservatoire where she was studying piano, and then came the orderly sequence of winning at Besancon where Munch was a judge, Munch's invitation to Ozawa to go to Tanglewood, the Koussevitzky prize, the assistantship under Bernstein in New York, the first professional engagements in America (the very first was with the San Francisco Symphony in 1962, Boston following in 1964, the music directorship at Ravinia Park (the Chicago Symphony's summer season) and Toronto, then San Francisco and Boston.

Ozawa recalled a hard period when his reputation and the demand for his services grew faster than his repertory, a period where everything he did seemed to be for the first time. "Is better now." He says he is a quick study when he needs to be, but dislikes needing to be (even while enjoying the professionalism that makes it possible). He takes enormous pleasure in studying something for a long time and with great concentration as he could, for instance, with Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" and Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte." What was he working on now? Three Berlioz operas, "Benvenuto Cellini," "Beatrice and Benedict," and "The Trojans," and also Schoenberg's "Moses und Aron" ("so great and beautiful, more marvelous the more I learn").

In matters of repertory as well as other things, Ozawa expects his San Francisco and Boston jobs to pose very different challenges, "Boston is most musical city in America, where music is most like bread." He is pleased particularly with its many choruses, the excellent orchestral freelancers, the New England Conservatory, the adventurousness of the Opera Company of Boston (whose work he knows only by reputation), and the potential for a large young audience provided by the many colleges and universities. "To come to work in Boston is to find large, comfortable armchair all ready for you to sit in — nice, and also dangerous. In San Francisco we must still finish building chair."

Ozawa is not yet ready to talk about his Boston repertory, though he did say that he very much wants to do "Gurrelieder" for the Schoenberg centenary in 1974. Because of commitments made before his Boston appointment (which is preceded by a year as Music Advisor. 1972-73), he will be here for only one week next season. "I don't know program yet. We were going to do recording piece, maybe Saint-Saens 3rd Symphony. Now it's so important we're going to have to think about."

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

APR 1972

Seiji Ozawa, Conductor and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, will add the music directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to his responsibilities beginning with the 1973-74 season.

Louis Hood, Public Relations Director of the Cleveland Orchestra and former Publicity Director of The Philadelphia Orchestra, returned in March to Philadelphia to assume his old post with the Orchestra. He succeeded Wayne Shilkret who was named Director of Publicity and Promotion at the Kennedy Center in Washington.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's
Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112

FEB 15 1972

Japanese Conductor Brings Frisco Symphony Back Into Limelight

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — A few strands of gray have appeared in conductor Seiji Ozawa's shoulder-length black hair.

But no one — certainly not the dirrectors of the San Francisco Symphony — has suggested that the real "long hair" of the classical music world get his locks trimmed.

Since the 35-year-old Ozawa took the baton from aging Josef Krips at the start of the 1970-71 season, the local orchestra's ticket sales have jumped dramatically.

Ozawa's raffish image, his swaying, bouncing vibrancy on the podium and his consummate musicianship have endeared him to both students and dowagers.

THE STUDENT-dominated Wednesday night concerts are a season-long sellout and sales for all concerts, including the Thursday matinees favored by well-to-do matrons, are running at record levels.

Ozawa, whose musical tastes run from European classical to Oriental to rock and roll, also conducts the Japanese Philharmonic, co-directs the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Summer Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., makes regular guest appearances throughout the world, and records with some of the nation's top symphonies.

He recently extended his original three-year contract as San Francisco's conductor and musical director for another three seasons — through 1976-77 — and said he was "cutting down" some of his other activities.

THE SAN FRANCISCO Symphony, a second-line orchestra since the late Pierre Monteux left it more than a dozen years ago, had improved steadily under Krips. And wtih Ozawa at the helm it has scheduled a 1973 European tour and is talking about recording again.

A native of Hoten, Japan, who apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years, Ozawa strode into his annual San Francisco news conference recently in his usual street garb; a shaggy, off-white, knee-length mongolian lamb coat; a thin blue silk jacket, blue turtleneck shirt, beads, faded blue jeans, white socks and black sandals.

IN HIS HEAVILY-accented and carefully chosen English, Ozawa talked about the state of classical music today and his ubiquitous musical tastes.

"We heard a few years ago that classical music is dead" he said. "I thought it might be true. But now it is coming to more people's ear.

"Life is more difficult (so) music is more important. Music is a very pure thing. You get it through your ears and it goes direct to your hear. You don't have to understand it. It is a natural thing.

"It comes from God to bring joy to people. They come to the concert to enjoy it."

OZAWA ADDED that he personally enjoys good rock and roll and said that a concert last year with a blues band worked very well.

"But it is dangerous," he added. "One orchestra tried it with a rock and roll band. When a band doesn't care about the sound, it can be disastrous."

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 465,085 SUN. 367,010

FEB 20 1972

Ozawa Shows Podium Lifestyle Is Changing

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

Seiji Ozawa may not be the prophet of change in all things musical, but his appointment to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra signifies a drastic change there. The appointment, in fact, waited months while the essential point at issue was discussed.

The issue was not personalities or musical qualifications, but presence. The BSO has a reputation for finding a conductor with dramatic differences. Monteux had the aura of association with Stravinsky and the new musical riots in Paris. Koussevitzky had the force of the original man. His forays into mother Russia on a Volga barge, his active participation in new music in Paris, his quirky, unpredictable personality made him stand out, even among the Boston originals. Charles Munch was the elegant bohemian, fired by impulse, capable of cancelling all rehearsals because of the intuition that all would go well in the concert.

Ozawa has many of the qualities Bostonians apparently like in their leaders. He has the close association with Munch and his involvement with Tanglewood since his first days in this country to recommend him. The exoticism of his Japanese gestalt is all the more attractive. No one doubts his musicality or his gifts in working with an orchestra.

The problem at issue was his availability, and in this Ozawa staunchly represented his generation and the world attitude. He refused to make the BSO the one and only orchestra in his life, and he declined to make Boston his home. Because of this stand, the podium remained open a few more months while the BSO directors absorbed the implications of the new life style they were about to embrace.

Much in the symphony orchestra scene is changing, and whether it is for the better can only be guessed.

In the last 10 years, the year-round contract became a reality, work weeks were shortened, rehearsal time, considered at the minimum, was cut even farther. Probably the next round of contracts will see even more changes in the routine of orchestral life.

Seiji Ozawa, newly-appointed conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra: "If Ozawa achieves a specific sound in Boston, it will undoubtedly be echoed in San Francisco. A Philadelphia Sound, now unique, will probably not survive as unique."

The same decade has seen the less obvious but no less important change in conductor's attitudes.

The important change is in this matter of presence. The years as he continues with his music director was always chosen for his musicality, and his willingness to abjure a private life in favor of administering the orchestra throughout the year.

This was the old pattern, one set largely by the European conductors who held the major posts. Interestingly enough, this was not the European norm, for the orchestras there played comparatively short seasons, requiring the presence of a Furtwangler or a Beecham for eight or nine weeks. Those orchestras, too, were available to any conductor who had the money to hire them by the week, month or day.

TRIPLE DUTY

The major change came in this country with the appointment of Georg Solti in Chicago. He brought with him Carlo Maria Giulini and kept his position with Covent Garden in London, and even added the Orchestra de Paris to his duties.

Others have fallen into line. Cleveland will see its new music director, Lorin Maazel, infrequently in the next five other work. San Francisco, Boston and the Japan Philharmonic will share Ozawa, just as Los Angeles shares Mehta with the Israel Philharmonic and the Metropolitan Opera.

The idea concentrates many orchestras in a few hands, creating an even smaller circle of super-superstars, constantly on the move, glamorous figures on whose shoulders rest the musical fate of millions. The result will be a graying of programs as conductors will tend to repeat programs prepared for one location in the next.

ON THE MOVE

The change in style will probably mean the end of American orchestras with strong personalities of their own. In their place will grow orchestras of considerable agility, able to adapt quickly to the man on the podium this week. If Ozawa. for example, achieves a specific sound in Boston, it will undoubtedly be echoed in San Francisco. A Philadelphia Sound, now unique, will probably not survive as unique.

All the change won't be on the podium, either. With increasingly absentee artistic direction, orchestras themselves may grow, rather than shrink, in size to allow a greater flow of musicians. With more free time the aim of musicians, the larger orchestra will provide it. It will also provide a more mobile and flexible orchestra, able to appear in chamber concerts, school settings, theater ensembles.

The Ozawa appointment means this kind of change in Boston. It does not represent the beginning of change but almost the completion of it, something listeners can watch with hopes and some fears.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,061 SUN. 423,790

FEB 13 1972

Ozawa Breathes New Life Into Symphony Orchestra

By DUSTON HARVEY

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — A few strands of gray have appeared in conductor Seiji Ozawa's shoulder-length black hair.

But no one—certainly not the directors of the San Francisco Symphony—has suggested that the real "long hair" of the classical music world get his locks trimmed.

Since the 35-year-old Ozawa took the baton from aging Josef Krips at the start of the 1970-71 season, the local orchestra's ticket sales have jumped dramatically.

Ozawa's raffish image, his swaying, bouncing vibrancy on the podium and his consummate musicianship have endeared him to both students and dowagers.

The student-dominated Wednesday night concerts are a season-long sellout and sales for all concerts, including the Thursday matinees favored by well-to-do matrons, are running at record levels.

Ozawa, whose musical tastes run from European classical to Oriental to rock and roll, also conducts the Japanese Philharmonic, co-directs the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Summer Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., makes regular guest appearances throughout the world, and records with some of the nation's top symphonies.

He recently extended his original three-year contract as San Francisco's conductor and musical director for another three seasons — through 1976-77 — and said he was "cutting down" some of his other activities.

The San Francisco Symphony, a second-line orchestra since the late Pierre Monteux left it more than a dozen years ago, had improved steadily under Krips. And with Ozawa at the helm it has scheduled a 1973 European tour and is talking about recording again.

When music critics complained about his orchestra's standard repertory, Ozawa said finding good new music is difficult and, besides, he wasn't Leonard Bernstein.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,160

JAN 30 1972

HIP CONDUCTOR — Long-haired Seiji Ozawa with his raffish style and vibrant image, not to mention his consummate skills, has become the darling of San Francisco Symphony directors and patrons alike. (UPI photo)

Modish Ozawa $ells Tickets

EDITOR'S NOTE: Flamboyant conductor Seiji Ozawa is a familiar figure in this area in the summer with appearances on the podiums at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center and the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. One of the most popular conductors, he appeals to both dowagers and teen-agers not only here, but judging from this story, in San Francisco as well.

By DUSTON HARVEY

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — A few strands of gray have appeared in conductor Seiji Ozawa's shoulder-length black hair.

But no one — certainly not the directors of the San Francisco Symphony — has suggested that the real "long hair" of the classical music world get his locks trimmed.

Since the 35-year-old Ozawa took the baton from aging Josef Krips at the start of the 1970-71 season, the local orchestra's ticket sales have jumped dramatically.

OZAWA'S RAFFISH image, his swaying, bouncing vibrancy on the podium and his consummate musicianship have endeared him to both students and dowagers.

The student-dominated Wednesday night concerts are a season-long sellout and sales for all concerts, including the Thursday matinees favored by well-to-do matrons, are running at record levels.

Ozawa, whose musical tastes run from European classical to Oriental to rock and roll, also conducts the Japanese Philharmonic, co-directs the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Summer Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., makes regular guest appearances throughout the world, and records with some of the nation's top symphonies.

He recently extended his original three-year contract as San Francisco's conductor and musical director for another three seasons — through 1976-77 — and said he was "cutting down" some of his other activities.

THE SAN FRANCISCO Symphony, a second-line orchestra since the late Pierre Monteux left it more than a dozen years ago, had improved steadily under Krips. And with Ozawa at the helm it has scheduled a 1973 European tour and is talking about recording again.

A native of Hoten, Japan, who apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years, Ozawa strode into his annual San Francisco news conference recently in his usual street garb:

UNKEMPT, LONG, black hair, sprinkled with a few strands of gray; a shaggy, off-white, knee-length Mongolian lamb coat; a thin blue silk jacket, blue turtleneck shirt, beads, faded blue jeans, white socks and black sandals.

In his heavily-accented and carefully chosen English, Ozawa talked about the state of classical music today and his ubiquitous musical tastes.

"We heard a few years ago that classical music is dead," he said. "I thought it might be true. But now it is coming to more people's ear.

"Life is more difficult, so music is more important. Music is a very pure thing.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,661

JAN 30 1972

Music

Japanese Conductor Enlivens Orchestra

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — A few strands of gray have appeared in conductor Seiji Ozawa's shoulder-length black hair.

But no one — certainly not the directors of the San Francisco Symphony — has suggested that the real "long hair" of the classical music world get his locks trimmed.

Since the 35-year-old Ozawa took the baton from aging Josef Krips at the start of the 1970-71 season, the local orchestra's ticket sales have jumped dramatically.

Ozawa's raffish image, his swaying, bouncing vibrancy on the podium and his consumate musicianship have endeared him to both students and dowagers.

The student-dominated Wednesday night concerts are a season-long sellout and sales for all concerts, including the Thursday matinees favored by well-to-do matrons, are running at record levels.

Ozawa, whose musical tastes run from European classical to Oriental to rock and roll, also conducts the Japanese Philharmonic, co-directs the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Summer Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., makes regular guest appearances throughout the world, and records with some of the nation's top symphonies.

He recently extended his original three-year contract as San Francisco's conductor and musical director for another three seasons — through 1976-77 — and said he was "cutting down" some of his other activities.

The San Francisco Symphony, a second-line orchestra since the late Pierre Monteux left it more than a dozen years ago, had improved steadily under Krips. And with Ozawa at the helm it has scheduled a 1973 European tour and is talking about recording again.

He apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227

FEB 22 1972

Music World

An End Coming to Orchestral Discs?

By Heuwell Tircuit

IN ALL THE fuss and dust over Seiji Ozawa's appointment to the Boston Symphony, he finally blurted out publicly that he is planning to record with the San Francisco Symphony, hopefully in time to precede their 1973 European tour. He said that DGG already had the Boston Symphony for an American orchestra, but made vague statements about "another company."

Why fake? Everyone knows that Ozawa's current contract is with England's EMI—"Angel" in America. The implications are obvious.

Angel and DDG now have a business tie, much like English Decca (London Records) and Telefunken. Karajan (a DGG artist) is now doing substantive releases for Angel: A new "Fidelio" (bad) and a pair of Bruckner Symphonies, Nos. 4 and 7 (marvelous!). DGG, in return, gets some performances by Yehudi Menuhin, and their first Ozawa release.

★ ★ ★

WE COULD end up on both labels. The Symphony chooses to be cagey — devious, not "John"—but with my own bulging eyeballs, I have seen chief staff from both Angel and DGG in the Opera House boxes in recent months, their ears like bird dogs on point.

My spy system informs me that the orchestra passed, the Opera House flunked. If and when there are recordings, they will be made outside San Francisco—Marin's Veterans' Memorial, or the Flint Center in Cupertino. (But wouldn't it be a hit in the eye if the engineers decide on Oakland Auditorium Theater? Ugh, ugg, ahgh—that smarts!)

All this not withstanding, there are grievous problems in the way.

★ ★ ★

THE BASIC PROBLEM is national, rather than particular. Name of the game is money, or more accurately, how much? Unless there is a radical shift in union demands—an unlikely event—there will be no American orchestras recording once existing contracts expire. This would take about two years.

Speaking to assorted officials at assorted levels, it has become perfectly apparent that they are not bluffing. Classical recordings do make money, but not a lot, and it usually requires years to recoup investment outlay.

It costs an average of $30,000 to put out a single disc of orchestral music these days. The company makes something less than $2 on a $5.98 disc sale. The same disc costs about $7000 to produce in Europe, $10,000 if it is a superstar orchestra like the Berlin Philharmonic. An American orchestra has to clear an 18,000-copy sale to break even.

★ ★ ★

RCA VICTOR admitted that only two out of all its recordings of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—Toscanini's and Ozawa's—made a profit. Conductors as distinguished as Munch and Reiner didn't, and this is with a warhorse, mind you. Get into the Dvorak 8th Symphony or Schumann First and you really face a situation.

The Cleveland Orchestra has no recording contract at present. Philadelphia records for RCA Victor, the New York Philharmonic for Columbia, but both face dismal futures. London Records is currently in very hard negotiations with both Chicago and Los Angeles about possibly not renewing their contracts. DGG is moaning about the expense of keeping their Boston Symphony ties, and may drop them. Angel has dropped is official contract with Chicago, doing some new taping there on a job-by-job basis.

Part of the problem stems from exaggerated, often unreasoned demands by the players. Salaries are inflated beyond reality, but apart from that, working strictures are patently absurd in many cases.

★ ★ ★

A CASE IN point was London's new Mahler Symphony No. 7, a super sensational set by Georg Solti and the Chicago Symphony. Unhappy with sound in Chicago. London decided to go the added expense to take the giant forces all the way to Urbana from Chicago, to use the new concert hall at the University of Illinois.

So, alright, what happens? The sessions go so smoothly that the Mahler is finished ahead of schedule by several hours. Solti's idea was to use the time to tape the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" during the remaining time. The orchestra had just played it, and was ready, but a membership union vote failed. By contract, they had to go on with the sessions as planned, redoing bits of the Mahler 7th that didn't really need redoing—instead of the Tchaikovsky. A similar incident eight years ago was the reason Columbia dropped an option on Chicago after one session with Stravinsky.

With prices as they are, the record companies can no longer pay triple the price for such antics. Either the orchestra is co-operative, or they get summarily dumped—no matter who they are.

The San Francisco local has a reputation for being generally reasonable and responsible, far more so than the average Eastern local. If they are, this might be the best time, rather than the presumed worst, for getting back into the catalogue. Players are having to learn not to goose the golden egg on the turntable.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492

FEB 20 1972

The World Of Music

Sizing Up Seiji Ozawa On Boston's Podium

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

If there were a lot of rumors preceding the appointment of Georg Solti as music director of the Chicago Symphony, and if there was much embittered confusion about Lorin Maazel becoming the successor to the late George Szell with the Cleveland Orchestra, there was little of either with the announcement that Seiji Ozawa will become the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the 1973-74 season. He will replace William Steinberg, also the music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, who has held the post in Boston since 1969.

Actually, the Bostonians will be without a music director for a year. The reason for this is quite complicated. Because of previous commitments Ozawa's contract with the San Francisco Symphony, where he has been music director since 1970, was recently extended through 1976, and he will guest-conduct the Boston Symphony for only one week during the 1972-73 season. He will, however, serve during that year as music adviser.

He also will continue as co-director with Gunther Schuller of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and Festival at Tanglewood, a post he has occupied since 1970.

Michael Tilson Thomas, currently associate director of the orchestra, as well as the Buffalo Philharmonic director, and Colin Davis, musical director of London's Royal Opera, were named principal guest - conductors. Thus Thomas' title of associate conductor falls vacant. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, continues as assistant conductor.

There have been those in Boston who wanted to see young Thomas, who has repeatedly and very successfully led the orchestra, in its conductorial position, but, however talented, Thomas, it is felt, still needs seasoning and, above all, experience. Davis was reputedly the trustees' first choice after Erich Leinsdorf's departure back in 1967, but could not be persuaded to accept the post.

★ ★ ★

That Ozawa is popular with the players of the Boston Orchestra is no secret. He is amiable, easy to get along with. Despite his age — 36 — he has come a long way in a comparatively short time.

And when he conducts the Bostonians, as he frequently does at Tanglewood, it is always a relaxed relationship despite a certain theatricality that he invariably brings to his chores.

During the summer, wearing a loose-fitting white silk shirt with embroidery, a cross between a Japanese and a Russian blouse, with his long black hair swirling around his neck, the short figure bounces to the podium and takes command. Make no mistake about it, he takes command, and, with the fullest cooperation from the orchestra, he usually has his complete way, throwing himself body and soul into the music — from the contemporaries to Berlioz.

The result is always scintillating, effervescent, grandiose. (I don't recall ever having heard him conduct Mozart, however).

SEIJI OZAWA
Ex-scooter salesman

Ozawa's connection with the Bostonians goes back to 1960, when the Manchurian-born, Tokyo-trained musician, who switched from piano to conducting because of a soccer injury to his hand (ghosts of Robert Schumann!), was a student at Tanglewood. He won the Koussevitzky prize that year as the most promising student conductor.

He had come to the Berkshire Music Center at the invitation of Charles Muench, then Boston Orchestra's music director, who had been a judge when Ozawa won the International Conductors' Contest at Besancon, France, in 1959.

Ozawa's first major guest engagement in North America was with the San Francisco Orchestra in 1962, and his frequent guest visits with the Boston Symphony began at Tanglewood in the summer of '64.

During the 1964-65 season he was Leonard Bernstein's assistant at the New York Philharmonic, and he also has been music director of Chicago's Ravinia Summer Festival, the Toronto Symphony, and the Japan Philharmonic.

★ ★ ★

What every orchestra needs, and the Boston Symphony is no exception, is a degree of continuity in its leadership. With the illness of Mr. Steinberg, the Boston had to do with all sorts of well-reputed guest conductors. Ozawa has stated that he will confine his work after 1973 to North America, and will conduct the Bostonians for 10 weeks, more in subsequent seasons (his initial contract is for three years).

But he will maintain his association with the San Francisco Orchestra as well, and there is the rub, for each major orchestra would like to call its music director its own — exclusively.

In a recent press conference, Ozawa promised "to make a good family with the musicians," and he correctly asserted that "I know them, and they know me."

One hears that the offer for the Boston post was made last November. It seems there that Ozawa took time to think about it and make up his mind.

I still remember vividly the rehearsals and final presentation of Berlioz' "Mass" and "Damnation of Faust" at the end of two Tanglewood seasons. They were opulent performances, with Ozawa embracing the works with consummate skill, shaping them well-balanced and dramatically.

He is by no means a romantic music conductor exclusively. For example, at the early February concerts with the Philadelphia, which he also will continue to guest-conduct, he presented an odd program consisting of "Sicilian Vespers" Overture, the "Pathetique" and Maki Ishii's "So-Gu II," classical chamber music of the Japanese court, in an encounter that made East at least meet West, even if the two could not fully merge. The 10-member Gagaku ensemble, in traditional costume, enhanced the presentation.

The critics agree that Ozawa is consistently exciting as a conductor who keeps one absorbed. Having guest-conducted most of the major orchestras around the world already, and having a goodly number of recordings to his credit has added to his knowledge and experience.

No wonder, then, that Talcott W. Banks, president of the Boston Orchestra board of trustees, welcomed "this brilliantly gifted and utterly devoted conductor" and that he was joined by cellist Robert Ripley, chairman of the orchestra's players' committee who said that "the members of the orchestra are delighted with this appointment . . . we are looking forward with keenest anticipation to working with him on a regular basis."

It has been a long and fast road from Hoten (Hobin), Manchuria, since 1935, via Tokyo and Europe, where he also served a stint as an agent for a Japanese motor scooter company in the early 1950s, to America to one of the most prestigious positions in the conductorial world.

Can the summer favorite sustain his elan and excitement over the full winter season? Only time will tell; we will have to wait for any hints until the 1973-74 season.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 200,961

MAR 5 1972

New England Newsclip

An orchestral debate

by Harry Neville

In a recent issue of New York Magazine Alan Rich devoted his music column to a discussion of what he termed the "disaster ahead for our orchestras," if the tendency toward guest conductors is allowed to continue. Rich attended the recent Symphony Hall press conference at which Seiji Ozawa's appointment as the next BSO music director was announced. Rich recalled that when he was a youngster in Boston the prevailing attitude was that a conductor and his orchestra were one and the same thing. "Serge Koussevitzky took maybe four weeks off during the season," he said, "and during the rest of the time he worked to create an orchestra wonderfully responsive not only to his baton but to every twitch of his nose, every flicker of his eyelid."

Rich wondered how Ozawa could hope to create this kind of rapport with an orchestra, in view of the fact that the new music director will conduct only half the season at most and in view of the fact that he will carry on an "overtly bigamous" relationship with one or more other orchestras at the same time.

Ozawa's reply, according to Rich, was that orchestral musicians are so much better trained these days that they can respond to a conductor's personality much sooner than used to be the case. He added, too, that today's public demands lots of variety in its concert fare. "The more guest conductors the better," is the way Rich paraphrased (inaccurately, it seems to me) Ozawa.

From there Rich went on to develop a well-reasoned argument whose principal thesis was that "You can buy the most adept orchestral players in the world, put them together on a stage in a house with the most beautiful acoustical conditions in all the world . . . and you still won't have a symphony orchestra—not, that is, until a single dominant personality is put on the podium, to work with the musicians week after week, studying the strengths and weaknesses of the individual players, and gradually molding a sound that comes to represent the uniqueness of that orchestra."

There are probably very few people who would disagree with Rich's thought. There are probably even fewer who don't regret the increasing rarity of orchestral uniqueness—the kind of quality that was represented by Koussevitzky and the BSO, Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra, Toscanini and the N.B.C. In this country Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra are about the only remaining example of the kind of thing Rich is talking about.

Seiji Ozawa

Orchestra managers generally adduce two explanations for this situation, one being that there simply aren't enough top-rank conductors to go around, the other being that few top-rank conductors are willing to settle down with a single orchestra nowadays. Conductors find the guest-circuit attractive not only because it is lucrative and prestigious but also because of the ease with which it can be done in the jet age.

Rich seems to agree with these explanations, but he goes on to point out that if there aren't enough conductors to go around, then something ought to be done about it. He suggests that orchestra managements too often are hung up on the unrealistic hope of finding a new Leonard Bernstein, that they ought to be willing instead to take on "talented music-oriented" conductors who will grow in skill over the years, that managements should be concerned with the idea of providing a climate conducive to the growth of new conductors.

All of which sounds eminently sensible and some of which has for some time been practiced by the BSO management, which surely did its utmost to provide an atmosphere in which the young and enormously talented Michael Tilson Thomas could grow. Should the BSO trustees have followed through by making Thomas the new music director? I'm told they almost did so last spring. Frankly, I'm glad it didn't happen, for it would have been calamitous for the morale of the players.

I think it's accurate to say that Thomas has the respect and admiration of a majority of the orchestra members. I think it's equally accurate to say that his appointment would have created bitter resentment among the players, many of whom don't see Thomas as being ready for the job at this stage of his career.

Objections to Ozawa's appointment come primarily from non-orchestral sources. First of all, there are those who feel the trustees could have done better than to end up with a part-time music director, in answer to which it might be said that only a foolish management would ignore the feelings of the players.

In this instance, the players appeared to prefer the part-time services of Ozawa to the full-time services of any other available conductor. There have been objections, too, from a certain kind of BSO subscriber—the kind of person who does not see Ozawa as an entirely suitable ornament to her dinner table. His hair is too long, his dress too outlandish, etc., etc., There is, of course, no answer to this kind of objection.

As to Ozawa's chances of bringing about a new Golden Era in Boston—something comparable, say to the Koussevitzky reign—it probably won't happen. Excellence of that kind, it seems to me, was possible only under a supreme autocrat, and the day of the autocratic conductor is just about over. Players will no longer tolerate being flayed alive twice a day in order for a conductor to get the results he wants. Most conductors have to adopt a more democratic approach nowadays, which certainly seems to be the case with Ozawa. Right now he has a lot going for him—most importantly, the respect of the players. Let's hope the honeymoon lasts a long time.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

FEB 26 1972

SEIJI OZAWA

7 Guest Conductors at Saratoga Center

Seven guest conductors will share the podium with Eugene Ormandy this coming summer during the Philadelphia Orchestra's annual August residency at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

Of the seven, six are familiar favorites to Saratoga audiences. They are Franz Allers, Fruhbeck de Burgos, Andre Kostelanetz, James Levine, Seiji Ozwa and Julius Rudel.

A newcomer to the Center's podium is the young Italian Aldo Ceccato, who will make his local debut on August 16. Recent engagements include appearances with the Boston Symphony, Cleveland Orchestra, Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic. He is also the conductor of the new recordings of "Maria Stuarda" and "La Traviata," both with Beverly Sills.

Franz Allers, currently on the roster of the Metropolitan Opera, will return for a program featuring Lerner and Loewe selections. He led the original production of "My Fair Lady" on Broadway.

The Japanese maestro, Seiji Ozawa, will conduct two performances in Saratoga Ozawa was recently named the new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will take on this assignment while continuing the same position with the San Francisco Symphony.

Andre Kostelanetz returns for the Orchestra's ballet evening following several important engagements. In May he celebrates his tenth anniversary as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Promenade concerts, and in July he will open a new concert hall in Berlin.

James Levine, a young American still in his 20's, has just been named principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. He is the first conductor in the history of the Met to hold this title.

A special Veinnese evening will bring back Julius Rudel, the director of the New York City Opera and music adviser of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington.

Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra of Madrid, will be responsible for the music on two evenings during the summer, including the repeat performance of Orff's "Carmina Burana."

The remaining conerts will be led by the Orchestra's music director, Eugene Ormandy.

ANDRE KOSTELANETZ

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 338,862
FEB 6 1972

A Raffish Conductor

By DUSTON HARVEY
United Press International

SAN FRANCISCO — A few strands of gray have appeared in conductor Seiji Ozawa's shoulder-length black hair.

But no one — certainly not the directors of the San Francisco Symphony — has suggested that the real "long hair" of the classical music world get his locks trimmed.

Since the 35-year-old Ozawa took the baton from aging Josef Krips at the start of the

MUSIC

1970-71 season, the local orchestra's ticket sales have jumped dramatically.

Ozawa's raffish image, his swaying, bouncing vibrancy on the podium and his consummate musicianship have endeared him to both students and dowagers.

The student-dominated Wednesday night concerts are a season-long sellout and sales for all concerts, including the Thursday matinees favored by well-to-do matrons, are running at record levels.

Ozawa, whose musical tastes run from European classical to Oriental to rock and roll, also conducts the Japanese Philaharmonic, co-directs the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., makes regular guest appearances throughout the world, and records with some of the nation's top symphonies. Last week he was named music director of the Boston Symphony, a post he will hold while continuing in San Francisco.

He recently extended his original three-year contract as San Francisco's conductor and musical director for another three seasons — through 1976-77 — and said he was "cutting down" some of his other activities.

The San Francisco Symphony, a second-line orchestra since the late Pierre Monteux left it more than a dozen years ago, had improved steadily under Krips. And with Ozawa at the helm it has scheduled a 1973 European tour and is talking about recording again.

A native of Hoten, Japan, who apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years, Ozawa strode into his annual San Francisco news conference recently in his usual street garb: unkempt, long, black hair, sprinkled with a few strands of gray: a shaggy, off-white, knee-length Mongolian lamb coat; a thin blue silk jacket, blue turtleneck shirt, beads, faded blue jeans, white socks and black sandals.

In his heavily-accented and carefully chosen English, Ozawa talked about the state of classical music today and his ubiquitous musical tastes.

"We heard a few years ago that classical music is dead," he said. "I thought it might be true. But now it is coming to more people's ear.

"Life is more difficult (so) music is more important. Music is a very pure thing. You get it through your ears and it goes direct to your heart. You don't have to understand it. It is a natural thing.

"It comes from God to bring joy to people. They come to the concert to enjoy it."

Ozawa added that he personally enjoys good rock and roll and said that a concert last year with a blues band worked very well.

"But it is dangerous," he added. "One orchestra tried it with a rock and roll band. When a band doesn't care about the sound, it can be disastrous.

When music critics complained about his orchestra's standard repertory, Ozawa said finding good new music is difficult and, besides, he wasn't Leonard Bernstein.

"His language is so good. He goes out and tells them this is the greatest piece. And they believe it," Ozawa said.

"With my language?" he asked with a smile.

Ozawa also joked when a student asked him about his hair style.

"I hope you are not questioning why my hair is black," he said. "But length? I don't know. I didn't like to go to the barber shop from the beginning. Always I cut myself, or my mother, and now my wife. It got longer and longer, I think."

SEIJI OZAWA

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
FEB 14 1972

MUSIC

Two-Castle Man

"Once upon a time," says Japanese Conductor Seiji Ozawa, "nearly every major orchestra was a dedicated maestro's proudest castle. It no longer is." Where one castle used to suffice for a Toscanini or a Koussevitsky, now only two—or more—will do. Pierre Boulez now jets between the New York Philharmonic and London's BBC Symphony, Georg Solti between the Chicago Symphony and Orchestre de Paris, Zubin Mehta between the Los Angeles and Israel Philharmonics, Lorin Maazel between London's New Philharmonia and the Berlin Radio Orchestra; Maazel will also conduct the Cleveland Orchestra beginning next fall.

No one, however, typifies the new mobility better than lithe, mod Ozawa. Last week, at 36, Ozawa grabbed off one of the biggest plums in American orchestral life: the august, auburn-sounding Boston Symphony, which he will take over in 1973. Since he already has another juicy plum in hand as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony and has no plans to give it up, Ozawa has instantly become one of the most powerful and busy men in American music.

If anyone can handle both San Francisco and Boston, it is Ozawa. He is at once a demanding orchestral perfectionist—especially brilliant with 20th century music—and a genial man under whom musicians enjoy working. If a flaw could be found in his musical makeup, it is that he often seems to be learning his repertory as he goes along from hall to hall, hotel to hotel.

SEIJI OZAWA REHEARSING IN TOKYO

M. SUHARA

Sometimes the results are scrappy, but more usually they are exciting and blooming with fresh thought.

Boston's choice of Ozawa ended a wearying man hunt. In a bit of jet-setting of his own, the Pittsburgh Symphony's William Steinberg took on the Boston post for a three-year period, in 1969, succeeding Erich Leinsdorf, but had to curtail his activities almost immediately because of ill health. With Pittsburgh's schedule expanding, and because of the heavy dual load, Steinberg, 72, decided early on not to return to Boston next year.

Michael Tilson Thomas, 27, the talented associate conductor who has brilliantly filled in for Steinberg and who was a popular favorite for the job, was passed over largely because of his age and lack of administrative experience. He and London's Colin Davis will be on hand starting next season as principal guest conductors.

Ozawa and the other two-castle men are not necessarily greedy for power. There are simply not enough superstar conductors of great luster to go around. The result of all the doubling up sometimes seems to be a numbing jet-age confusion, affecting conductor and orchestra alike, but it is the answer to necessity. Like almost every other orchestra in the nation, the Boston Symphony needs money and a new young audience. One way to win both is to hire a conductor who is an established name in the LP marketplace, and who is attractive, personable and young. He should also be musical. The closest thing possible, in other words, to a Leonard Bernstein. Right now that just happens to be Ozawa, a Bernstein protégé whom Lenny first heard in 1960 and later hired as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Married to a former Tokyo model named Vera, and the father of a baby girl born in December, Ozawa is as hip as can be. At a recent recital by Cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, Ozawa, still sporting his familiar Beatle hairdo, wore a red turtleneck and carried a leather purse on a longish strap. Is Boston ready for this?

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 338,660
FEB 6 1972

A Raffish Conductor

By DUSTON HARVEY
United Press International

SAN FRANCISCO — A few strands of gray have appeared in conductor Seiji Ozawa's shoulder-length black hair.

But no one — certainly not the directors of the San Francisco Symphony — has suggested that the real "long hair" of the classical music world get his locks trimmed.

Since the 35-year-old Ozawa took the baton from aging Josef Krips at the start of the

MUSIC

1970-71 season, the local orchestra's ticket sales have jumped dramatically.

Ozawa's raffish image, his swaying, bouncing vibrancy on the podium and his consummate musicianship have endeared him to both students and dowagers.

The student-dominated Wednesday night concerts are a season-long sellout and sales for all concerts, including the Thursday matinees favored by well-to-do matrons, are running at record levels.

Ozawa, whose musical tastes run from European classical to Oriental to rock and roll, also conducts the Japanese Philaharmonic, co-directs the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., makes regular guest appearances throughout the world, and records with some of the nation's top symphonies. Last week he was named music director of the Boston Symphony, a post he will hold while continuing in San Francisco.

He recently extended his original three-year contract as San Francisco's conductor and musical director for another three seasons — through 1976-77 — and said he was "cutting down" some of his other activities.

The San Francisco Symphony, a second-line orchestra since the late Pierre Monteux left it more than a dozen years ago, had improved steadily under Krips. And with Ozawa at the helm it has scheduled a 1973 European tour and is talking about recording again.

A native of Hoten, Japan, who apprenticed with Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic and then conducted the Toronto Symphony for three years, Ozawa strode into his annual San Francisco news conference recently in his usual street garb: unkempt, long, black hair, sprinkled with a few strands of gray: a shaggy, off-white, knee-length Mongolian lamb coat; a thin blue silk jacket, blue turtleneck shirt, beads, faded blue jeans, white socks and black sandals.

In his heavily-accented and carefully chosen English, Ozawa talked about the state of classical music today and his ubiquitous musical tastes.

"We heard a few years ago that classical music is dead," he said. "I thought it might be true. But now it is coming to more people's ear.

"Life is more difficult (so) music is more important. Music is a very pure thing. You get it through your ears and it goes direct to your heart. You don't have to understand it. It is a natural thing.

"It comes from God to bring joy to people. They come to the concert to enjoy it."

Ozawa added that he personally enjoys good rock and roll and said that a concert last year with a blues band worked very well.

"But it is dangerous," he added. "One orchestra tried it with a rock and roll band. When a band doesn't care about the sound, it can be disastrous.

When music critics complained about his orchestra's standard repertory, Ozawa said finding good new music is difficult and, besides, he wasn't Leonard Bernstein.

"His language is so good. He goes out and tells them this is the greatest piece. And they believe it," Ozawa said.

"With my language?" he asked with a smile.

Ozawa also joked when a student asked him about his hair style.

"I hope you are not questioning why my hair is black," he said. "But length? I don't know. I didn't like to go to the barber shop from the beginning. Always I cut myself, or my mother, and now my wife. It got longer and longer, I think."

SEIJI OZAWA

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
FEB 14 1972

MUSIC

Two-Castle Man

"Once upon a time," says Japanese Conductor Seiji Ozawa, "nearly every major orchestra was a dedicated maestro's proudest castle. It no longer is." Where one castle used to suffice for a Toscanini or a Koussevitsky, now only two—or more—will do. Pierre Boulez now jets between the New York Philharmonic and London's BBC Symphony, Georg Solti between the Chicago Symphony and Orchestre de Paris, Zubin Mehta between the Los Angeles and Israel Philharmonics, Lorin Maazel between London's New Philharmonia and the Berlin Radio Orchestra; Maazel will also conduct the Cleveland Orchestra beginning next fall.

No one, however, typifies the new mobility better than lithe, mod Ozawa. Last week, at 36, Ozawa grabbed off one of the biggest plums in American orchestral life: the august, auburn-sounding Boston Symphony, which he will take over in 1973. Since he already has another juicy plum in hand as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony and has no plans to give it up, Ozawa has instantly become one of the most powerful and busy men in American music.

If anyone can handle both San Francisco and Boston, it is Ozawa. He is at once a demanding orchestral perfectionist—especially brilliant with 20th century music—and a genial man under whom musicians enjoy working. If a flaw could be found in his musical makeup, it is that he often seems to be learning his repertory as he goes along from hall to hall, hotel to hotel.

SEIJI OZAWA REHEARSING IN TOKYO

M. SUHARA

Sometimes the results are scrappy, but more usually they are exciting and blooming with fresh thought.

Boston's choice of Ozawa ended a wearying man hunt. In a bit of jet-setting of his own, the Pittsburgh Symphony's William Steinberg took on the Boston post for a three-year period, in 1969, succeeding Erich Leinsdorf, but had to curtail his activities almost immediately because of ill health. With Pittsburgh's schedule expanding, and because of the heavy dual load, Steinberg, 72, decided early on not to return to Boston next year.

Michael Tilson Thomas, 27, the talented associate conductor who has brilliantly filled in for Steinberg and who was a popular favorite for the job, was passed over largely because of his age and lack of administrative experience. He and London's Colin Davis will be on hand starting next season as principal guest conductors.

Ozawa and the other two-castle men are not necessarily greedy for power. There are simply not enough superstar conductors of great luster to go around. The result of all the doubling up sometimes seems to be a numbing jet-age confusion, affecting conductor and orchestra alike, but it is the answer to necessity. Like almost every other orchestra in the nation, the Boston Symphony needs money and a new young audience. One way to win both is to hire a conductor who is an established name in the LP marketplace, and who is attractive, personable and young. He should also be musical. The closest thing possible, in other words, to a Leonard Bernstein. Right now that just happens to be Ozawa, a Bernstein protégé whom Lenny first heard in 1960 and later hired as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Married to a former Tokyo model named Vera, and the father of a baby girl born in December, Ozawa is as hip as can be. At a recent recital by Cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, Ozawa, still sporting his familiar Beatle hairdo, wore a red turtleneck and carried a leather purse on a longish strap. Is Boston ready for this?

Orchestras Need Full-Time Conductors

By PAUL HUME

Los Angeles Times-Washington Post News Service

WASHINGTON — When Seiji Ozawa was busy explaining to the members of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra, of which he is music director, just how he was going to continue in that post and at the same time take the same position with the Boston Symphony, he said, among other things:

"I don't have to work in the old style when the musical director stays with one orchestra completely for 20-25 weeks. Times have changed because of jets, and the audience needs more variety on stage."

I wonder.

Take a look at the orchestras of this country which are now widely regarded as the greatest in the world, those of Boston, Chicago, New York, Philadelphia and, with a large question mark over its head, Cleveland.

Koussevitsky Tenure

Boston's greatness, begun by such geniuses as Nikisch, Muck, and Monteux, reached its finest heights during the 25-year tenure of Serge Koussevitsky. During those years, Koussy, disdaining the many offers that constantly poured in on him from all over the world to guest conduct, made it a rule to spend all of his time with his great Bostonians and, in turn, to limit sharply the number of guest conductors invited to lead from his podium.

In Chicago, the orchestra begun by Theodore Thomas in 1891, lived out its first 50 years with only two conductors: Thomas and his successor Frederick Stock, who raised the orchestra to superb heights by working with it practically exclusively for 37 years.

Or take the Philadelphia orchestra where Eugene Ormandy will, during the coming season, equal Stock's record for longevity as a conductor and at the same time stretch to 60 the number of years during which that peerless orchestra has been led chiefly by two men: Ormandy, and his famed predecessor, Leopold Stokowski.

Cleveland's case is another: profiting from the leadership of Rodzinski for 10 years, it developed, in the quarter-century that George Szell was its head, into an ensemble that some called the greatest in the world.

Philharmonic Case

Of the five great American orchestras, the New York Philharmonic is the one which has consistently engaged more guest conductors, has enjoyed periods of greatness at times when men such as Toscanini and Bernstein made it their principal business, and suffered severe lapses in years when it was led by a steady procession of too many less-gifted guests in too short a time.

There is a corollary to the Philharmonic's history that is worth noting, especially in view of a comment by Georg Solti recently when he was discussing the whole business of guest conductors. "It is not that guest conductors are bad for an orchestra," he said, "but only that it is bad for an orchestra to have bad guests." Thus it is true that some years the Philharmonic, sharing its platform with Toscanini and those whom he invited, did not fall into bad habits when those guests were men such as Mengelberg, Furtwangler, Beecham, Reiner, Krauss, Kleiber, Stokowski, Walter and Klemperer, all of whom appeared with the orchestra during Toscanini's great decade from 1925 to 1935.

UPI Telephoto

Seiji Ozawa believes in "jet conducting."

Central Question

But Solti posed the question that is still the central one, a question that Ozawa, naturally, did not face. Solti asked, "Where are the good conductors these days?" He is looking only for a man good enough to fill a month's absence now facing Chicago by the decision of Carlo Maria Giulini to conduct there one month instead of two.

Ozawa's comment was "times have changed because of jets, and the audience needs more variety on stage." That argument does not seem to hold water if you ask the audience who listened raptly to the music produced by Szell, Ormandy, Solti, Koussevitsky, or Reiner, men who stayed with their orchestras long enough and closely enough to give them not only singular greatness, but also a musical personality strong enough that each orchestra had its own identity, style and sound that could be identified as coming from Cleveland, Boston, or Chicago.

The greater problem for orchestras seeking musical greatness is that unless a conductor with a real genius for teaching an orchestra greatness in technique and style — and many conductors lack this completely — will come stay with the players until, like Koussevitsky and Stock and Ormandy and Bernstein, he knows not only the players' names but their personalities, their problems and their strengths, he will not be able to improve their playing, their morale, or their sense of a unique ensemble.

Even the great orchestras of Chicago, Boston and New York have known times of sheer musical disaster when their boards of directors turned them over, always for wildly ridiculous reasons, to conductors who were infinitely small in their inability to bring forth greatness. This is unfair to both audiences and players alike. It is a danger measureably increased by the jet age and the prevalance of inferior guest conductors.

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
S. 111,360
MAR 5 1972 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 97,539
MAY 8 1972 New England Newsclip

PRESS
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
D. 19,775
MAY 12 1972 New England

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 500,118 SUN. 657,560
APR 30 1972

Music

Ozawa: A Touch Of The Exotic For Proper Boston

By JOHN THORNTON

THE RECENT appointment of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra establishes two precedents: he is the youngest director in the long and brilliant history of the Boston orchestra and its first permanent conductor from the Far East.

Ozawa is current director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, and it is a post he will keep, since the schedules of the SFSO and the BSO do not clash.

William Steinberg, present music director at Boston, who succeeded Erich Leinsdorf in 1968, has suffered since from illnesses, which led to cancellation of many conducting appearances.

Another important coincidence of the Ozawa appointment is that it reflects the contemporary phenomena of dual-directorship of major orchestras.

The precedent was set at Boston by Steinberg, who simultaneously reigned over the podium of the Pittsburg Symphony.

Yet, Leinsdorf, when he resigned, contended that the BSO schedule alone was too much for one man. The burden, he said, restricted its director from accepting guest invitations. Being boss of the winter series and director of the large and active season at Tanglewood left him too little time for relaxation, no opportunity to plan the future, he complained.

At the time, Boston's proper air was filled with pros and cons of the dignified dispute between trustees and Leinsdorf, but gradually the disagreement faded.

Steinberg's appointment is in a sense an admission that the music world is undergoing great changes. In Europe, Van Karajan, flying his own plane and driving a sportscar (he is a speed demon, a winter sports buff who would ski from one podium to the other if he could) commanded three orchestras at one time. Partly because he has charismatic image good for box office and orchestra and is a fine conductor, Van Karajan pleases trustees, players and audiences.

In this country George Solti is bringing to the Chicago Symphony the best conducting it has enjoyed since the time of Fritz Reiner. The Hungarian is also an executive power at Covent Garden in England.

In this day of speed travel, it has become customary for performing artists to fill day to day dates thousands of miles apart. That phenomena also has a bearing on the situation.

Ozawa brings to Boston's podium his own unique image, and it is one that shatters tradition. The Japanese born musician is a fashionable fellow, who dresses with vivid sartorial taste, in sharp contrast to the BSO's leaders of past years. Pinstripe dignity has just about disappeared from the famous Green Room, and it is a refreshing change.

Ozawa achieved his new post, one of the most important in music, through a series of associations.

He first came to the Boston Symphony as guest conductor during the 1964 Berkshire Festival. Born in Hoten, Manchuria in 1935, he had grown up in an atmosphere of music, graduating from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo with first prizes in composition and conducting.

In 1959 he visited Europe and won an international conducting competition. One of his judges was Charles Munch, who was so impressed he invited Ozawa to be a conducting student at Tanglewood. Ozawa won a Koussevitsky scholarship the following summer.

Appointed as an assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic in 1961, Ozawa directed the orchestra in several concerts and in addition directed Japanese orchestras in 25 concerts.

His conducting talent and unusual personality led to many guest conducting dates with prominent European orchestras including Vienna Symphony, London Philharmonic and Concertgebouw Orchestra. In the United States he became in demand too, leading the Philadelphia, Chicago and San Francisco orchestras in successful concerts.

By 1968-69 Ozawa was so busy filling guest conducting roles he had to resign as music director of the Toronto Symphony. In that season he directed opera for the first time, "Cosi fan Tutte," at Salzburg.

Prestigious guest appearances piled up in promising succession — with the Cleveland Symphony, the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic — and he also made important recordings for three companies.

Two seasons ago came his appointment as director at San Francisco. But he had never been away from Boston for too long since his apprentiship at Tanglewood. He had directed the BSO several times and was a familiar sight on the beautiful rolling green meadows at Lenox. So his rement appointment should be no great surprise.

Ozawa, however, is still so busy that he cannot accept full responsibility as music director at Boston until the 1973-74 season.

Young and vibrant as he is, he will not be put in the position Leinsdorf resented nor will he inherit the crushing conducting burden typical of the days of Koussevitsky and Munch.

He will have two principal guest conductors, Micheal Tillson Thomas and Colin Davis. Thomas, also young and talented, came to the rescue of the BSO during Steinberg's illness and is one of the most exciting young conductors on the scene. If he had been a little older and a bit more experienced, some speculate the job would have been his.

Davis readily accepts the principal guest conductor offer. Twice approached to be the Boston's permanent director, he twice refused, prefering his conducting posts in England, and the easier, quieter life of the English countryside.

Ozawa has quite a tradition to uphold. The BSO for decades has been led by legendary figures: Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Koussevitsky (the record holder, 25 years) Munch (17 years) and Leinsdorf.

He brings to staid Symphony Hall along with his unquestioned ability a flambouyant style. He is a swinger in tiger striped trousers dustman cap and bright turtle neck sweater. Blithe and zestful, he keeps his cool in an emergency. For instance, when he was director at Toronto he once arrived only three minutes before concert time. Dashing past worried directors with a yell, "give me two minutes," he arrived at the podium right on time, collected and ready in tails.

With the great Boston Symphony's future in his young hands, it might just be about to enter its most fascinating period.

AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER & DEMOCRAT
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 14,000
FEB 26 1972

Saratoga Conductors Announced

Seven guest conductors will share the podium with Eugene Ormandy this coming summer during The Philadelphia Orchestra's annual August residency at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

Of the seven, six are familiar favorite to Saratoga audiences. They are Franz Allers, Fruhbeck de Burgos, Andre Kostelanetz, James Levine, Seiji Ozawa and Julius Rudel.

A newcomer to the center's podium is the young Italian Aldo Ceccato, who will make his local debut Aug. 16. Recent engagements for him include appearances with the Boston Symphony, Cleveland Orchestra, Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic. He is also the conductor of the new recordings of "Maria Stuarda" and "La Traviata," both with Beverly Sills.

Franz Allers, currently on the roster of the Metropolitan Opera, will return for a program featuring Lerner and Loewe selections. This is particularly appropriate for the man who led the original production of "My Fair Lady" on Broadway.

The vibrant young Japanese maestro, Seiji Ozawa, will conduct two performances in Saratoga. Ozawa was recently named the new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will take on this assignment while continuing the same position with the San Francisco Symphony. Andre Kostelanetz returns for the Orchestra's ballet evening following several important engagements. In May he celebrates his tenth anniversary as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Promenade concerts, and in July he will open a new concert hall in Berlin.

James Levine, a young American still in his 20's, has just been named principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. He is the first conductor in the history of the Met to hold this title.

A special Viennese evening will bring back Julius Rudel, the energetic director of the New York City Opera and music adviser of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington.

Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra of Madrid, will be responsible for the music on two evenings during the summer, including the repeat performance of Orff's "Carmina Burana."

The remaining concerts will be led by the Orchestra's music director Eugene Ormandy.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

JAN 5 1972

New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

There is no question that for those fortunate enough to have gone on the super-tour of Europe sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring it was the highlight of their year. The enthusiasm that the Friends of the orchestra brought back with them is still bubbling, and the rapport they established with the members of the orchestra while on the three-week tour a very tangible thing.

There were many Friends, though, whose pocketbooks couldn't run to the $4,000 odd it cost to accompany the orchestra on their tour of European cities. Their interest in and affection for the musical group is no less than that of those who did go, though, and so for these music-lovers the trip proposed for spring 1972 is tailor-made.

We all love to bask in reflected glory and claim an intimacy with those in the public eye. The members of the Friends are no different, their heroes are the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The success of the Stage Door Lectures at which these musicians speak informally to members of the Friends attests to this, and the one overwhelming fact that came out of the European tour was the opportunity on the part of the Friends to get to know the orchestra members so well.

The BSO's spring 1972 tour is brief and, in comparison to last year, local. It is for four days instead of three weeks and for $335 instead of $4,000, members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can accompany the orchestra to New York, and be in on all the parties, celebrations and inside-doings connected with the tour. The four-day event is called "The Mini-Tour."

The dates are April 6, 7, 8 and 9. A special train will leave for New York on the morning of April 6. It will be called the BSO train and each car will be named for previous musical directors, for composers and for symphonies. A special luncheon will be served aboard on the way to New York. A hotel near Central Park will be the headquarters at which the guests on the Mini-Tour will stay during the three nights in the city.

On the first evening, the Friends will be present at the very first Pops Concert ever given in New York when Arthur Fiedler conducts the orchestra in a concert to celebrate the anniversary of Carnegie Hall, and they will be at the special reception held afterwards for the orchestra, trustees and Friends.

The next evening the group will be entertained by Mr. and Mrs. John Hoyt Stookey at their apartment at 1125 Fifth Ave. before the concert at Lincoln Center which William Steinberg will conduct. Mr. Stookey is an overseer of the BSO and with his wife, the former Katherine Emory, and their daughters Helen and Laura, summer at Sasco Hill in Southport, Conn. After the concert that evening, a large reception in honor of the orchestra, its New York "Friends of the BSO" and the Mini-Tour guests will be held in the "Promenade" of Philharmonic Hall at Lincoln Center.

The exclusive Colony Club on Park Avenue will be the setting for a gala luncheon on the Saturday and, in the evening, Mr. Steinberg will conduct the BSO at Carnegie Hall. There are many more parties and events planned during the four days in New York as well as time allowed for shopping and other sightseeing. On Sunday, the special BSO train will bring the travelers back to Boston.

Invitations for the Mini-Tour are being mailed this week. Of the $350 charged for the event, $75 will be a tax-deductible gift to the orchestra. Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, Mrs. Richard Thompson of Swampscott and trustee and originator of unusual fund raising events for the BSO, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston, are cochairmen of the Mini-Tour.

Among the many Friends who have been working hard this week addressing the invitations are Mrs. Garrett Bowne, Mrs. Raymond Ellis of Marblehead, Mrs. John T. B. Nichols of Marblehead, Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott, Mrs. Frederic B. Mayo, Mrs. Walter McKim, Mrs. Fairfield Raymond, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard of Newton, Mrs. Walter Watson II, of Boston, Mrs. Edward L. Francis of Dover, Mrs. W. Russell Peabody of Dedham, Mrs. William J. Mixter of Dedham, Mrs. Robert Miller, Mrs. Edward L. Bond of Dedham, Mrs. T. Mitchell Hasting of Dedham, Mrs. Robert F. Daley of Dedham, Mrs. John Mecham of Westwood, Mrs. Richard Banks of Dover, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb of Boston, Miss Constance Learned of Boston, Mrs. Robert T. Hamlin of Brookline, Mrs. Robert H. Hopkins of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Vernon Alden of Boston, Mrs. Victor Jones, Mrs. William D. Manice of Weston and Mrs. Robert G. Weise.

THE BOSTON HERALD Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 3 1972

New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Friends of B.S.O. Offered 'All This and Heaven, Too'

IF YOUR NEW YEAR'S RESOLUTION was to get to know the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to ride on a private train, to visit Lincoln Center, to celebrate the very first Pops Concert in New York, to see the sights, visit museums and shops and to have lunch with your dearest friend, "All this and Heaven, too," is being offered to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

Take your new 1972 calendar and put stars on the dates of April 6, 7, 8 and 9 — a shining weekend to share with the orchestra. The chairmen of this Mini-Tour have many unique plans for the Friends. A "Limited Edition," or the first 100 Friends to accept promptly, will be the fortunate travelers. The chairmen are Mrs. Richard H. Thompson and Mrs. Albert Goodhue.

The invitations, with complete itinerary, will be received the end of the week. The special train will leave Boston for New York Thursday morning, April 6, with luncheon aboard. Arthur Fiedler and the Pops will commemorate the anniversary of Carnegie Hall with a concert that evening, followed by a reception for the orchestra and Friends.

The day will be yours on Friday, but later, John H. Stookey, an Overseer of the BSO, and Mrs. Stookey will be hosts at a party at their Fifth Avenue home. Then comes the concert at Lincoln Center with William Steinberg conducting the BSO. The "Promenade" of Philharmonic Hall will be the scene of a large reception in honor of the Symphony and its New York Friends of the BSO, as well as all the Mini-Tour guests.

The Colony Club on Park Avenue will be the setting for a luncheon, Saturday, and in the evening Mr. Steinberg will conduct the BSO train with cars named for musical directors, composers and symphonies, will take the travelers back to Boston.

Of the $350 you will be asked for, $75 will be a gift to the orchestra. All facts and figures on the spring Mini- Tour in New York will be on the invitation. If you are not a Friend, hurry and call Mrs. Whitty at the Friends office, so you will be eligible to receive an invitation.

Among the many Friends addressing invitations this week are Mrs. Garrett Bowne, Mrs. Raymond Ellis, Mrs. John T. G. Nichols, Mrs. Nelson Darling, Mrs. Frederic B. Mayo, Mrs. Walter McKim, Mrs. Fairfield Raymond, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Walter Watson 2d., Mrs. Edward L. Francis, Mrs. W. Russell Peabody and Mrs. William J. Mixter.

Also, Mrs. Edward L. Bond, Mrs. T. Mitchell Hastings, Mrs. Robert Miller, Mrs. Robert F. Daley, Mrs. John Mechem, Mrs. Richard Banks, Miss Constance Learned, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. Vernon Alden, Mrs. Robert T. Hamlin, Mrs. Robert H. Hopkins, Mrs. Victor Jones, Mrs. William D. Manice and Mrs. Robert C. Weise.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 2 1972

New England
Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

If you are one of the lucky 100 going on the Mini-Tour to New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in April, would you like to travel in "~~Koussevitsky,~~" "Munch," "Beethoven," "Berg," "Eroica" or "Munch-Synthesizer?" These are the names of the private cars attached to the Amtrak train that will take the 100 Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the musicians and their wives to New York for three days of "living with the orchestra" from April 6 to 8.

The newly decorated 21st floor of the Park Sheraton Hotel will be the home away from home of those paying the $350 for the privilege of being behind the scenes on this brief New York tour of the BSO.

It should be a fascinating weekend for, in addition to the very first Pops concert ever given in New York and a concert at Carnegie Hall conducted by William Steinberg at both of which the Friends will be guests of honor, there are cocktail parties and receptions arranged for them. There is a cordon bleu luncheon at the Colony Club on Park Avenue; a special BSO bus to transport them around New York, and ample time to renew acquaintance with the sights of the city and to shop at the famous stores that are adjacent to the hotel.

The tour has to be on a first come, first served basis for the members of the Friends as 100 is the limit that can go. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston, Mrs. Richard Thompson of Swampscott and Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead are the cochairmen in charge of this latest venture of the Friends. Mrs. Charles Lee Sargent of Dover, president of the group, and Talcott Banks of Lincoln, president of the trustees of the orchestra, are among the first to sign up for this unique experience.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 28 1972

New England
Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Friends of Symphony to Embark On Gala N.Y. 'Mini Tour' April 6

SPRINGTIME IN NEW YORK compares favorably with springtime in Paris, according to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They can hardly wait for April 6 when 100 of them will embark on a festive 4-day "mini-tour" of the big city at $350 per person, $75 of which will be a gift to the orchestra.

The Friends, along with members of the orchestra and their wives, will leave Boston on the Amtrak train. They will arrive at the Park-Sheraton, where they will be ensconced on the newly decorated 21st floor in time to leave for Carnegie Hall for the first Pops Concert ever to be given in New York.

The cochairmen of the committee, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston, Mrs. Richard H. Thompson of Swampscott and Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, tell us. "Carnegie Hall is overflowing with joy for Arthur Fiedler, who will conduct the Pops Orchestra to celebrate Carnegie Hall's 80th anniversary." The audience can also do that at a reception there after the concert.

ANOTHER FEATURE of this mini-tour will be Boston Symphony music conducted by William Steinberg in Philharmonic Hall at Lincoln Center. Before this concert, John H. Stookey, an overseer of the BSO, and Mrs. Stookey will entertain at cocktails in their Fifth Avenue duplex apartment.

There will be a Cordon Bleu luncheon at the Colony Club, Saturday, before the final concert in Carnegie Hall, at which William Steinberg will conduct Bruckner's Eighth.

On Sunday, the private cars, appropriately named "Koussevitzky," "Munch," "Beethoven," "Berg," "Heroica" and "Muench-Synthesizer" will be patiently waiting at the station for the return trip to Boston.

Mrs. Goodhue said: "After a super, catered luncheon en route and music from firemen's bands, the travelers will arrive in Boston about 4 o'clock Sunday afternoon." And she added: "They will feel they have shared in a bit of musical history and at the same time made a donation to their beloved orchestra."

Also joining the 100 Friends, to whom the mini-tour is open on a first-come-first-served-basis, will be Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Friends, and Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

MAR 14 1972

New England
Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Details for BSO Mini-Tour Outlined by Fran Fahnestock

FIRELIGHT AND SPRING FLOWERS made a delightful background for the cocktail party late yesterday afternoon in Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb's Beacon street apartment. The trustees and the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra planned this pleasant party to discuss details of the 4-day New York Mini-Tour scheduled April 6-9, for 100 Friends.

Talcott Banks, president of the trustees of the orchestra, explained that $75 of the $350 per person will be a gift to the orchestra. And then he added: "Fran Fahnestock, who shepherded us so wonderfully on the Maxi-Tour to Europe last spring, will explain the delights of the Mini-Tour."

Fran, whose name appears in the Social Register as Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, is one of the two women trustees of the orchestra. She praised the Amtrak train that will take the visitors to New York, and also the newly decorated Park-Sheraton, which is now called the New York Sheraton. It overlooks Central Park and is near Carnegie Hall where Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops orchestra, and Philharmonic Hall, where William Steinberg will conduct the Symphony.

"You can have the days to yourself to shop or visit with friends," Fran explained. "And you won't want to miss the cocktail party to be given by the John Stookeys at their 5th Avenue duplex apartment. But the best part of all will be the trip home," she continued. "It will be fun and games all the way with music from firemen's bands and a super catered luncheon.

"We'll be one big happy family with magazine writers and newspaper people, including music critics.' And she summed it all up by saying, "But, of course, most important of all is the wonderful rapport with the members of the orchestra," to which Mrs. Titcomb heartily agreed.

Mrs. Richard H. Thompson of Swampscott, Mrs. Fahnestock's co-chairman, also spoke and pointed out that the "camp followers" will feel they have shared in a bit of musical history and at the same time made a donation to their beloved orchestra. Among others who agreed were Mr. and Mrs. Richard Chapman.

CHEROKEE, IOWA
TIMES
D. 5,000

FEB 11 1972

ISU Festival Features Symphony

AMES — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, three outstanding conductors, an array of solo artists and a world premiere will be featured in the Ames International Orchestra Festival at Iowa State University, March 8-13.

The five concerts at the Iowa State Center will include four by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium and Pops Night by the Boston Pops Orchestra in the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

The distinguished conductor William Steinbert will conduct the opening concert on Wednesday, March 8. Soprano Eileen Farrell, who enjoyed wide popularity as a radio artist even before embarking on an operatic career, will be the soloist for selections from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolda" and "Gotterdammerung."

Arthur Fiedler, who for more than 40 years has conducted the famous Pops concerts, will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra's program in the Coliseum on Friday, March 10. "Doc" Severinsen, orchestra leader on the Johnny Carson "Tonight Show," will be trumpet soloist. In the style of the Pops concerts in Boston, refreshments will be served and some of the audience will be seated at tables and chairs on the arena floor. More than 12,000 spectators will be seated in the Coliseum's theater-type seats for a total audience of 14,000.

Youthful Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the symphony orchestra's Saturday, March 11, concert. Already widely acclaimed at 27, Thomas is the orchestra's associate conductor. Soloist Malcom Frager will perform Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G Major.

The world premiere of a new choral work, sung by 230 Iowa State students, will be a highlight of the Sunday, March 12, concert. William Schuman, one of America's foremost composers was commissioned to do the composition "Mail Order Madrigals," especialy for Iowa State under a grant by J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown. The composer and his wife will attend.

Soprano Veronica Tyler, bass-baritone Robert Hale, and the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus will join with the orchestra in presenting the Brahms "Requiem," which will be sung in English.

The series will end Monday, March 31, with a program that will include Zino Francescatti as soloist in the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D Major by Brahms.

All concerts will begin at 8 p.m with the exception of the Sunday matinee at 3. Ticket orders by mail and phone are being accepted by the Stephens Auditorium (294-2436) for the March, 8, 11 12 and 13 concerts in the auditorium. Pops Night, March 10, in the Coliseum is sold out.

OELWEIN, IOWA
REGISTER
D. 7,000

FEB 11 1972

5 concerts planned at Iowa State

AMES — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, three outstanding conductors, an array of solo artists and a world premiere will be featured in the Ames International Orchestra Festival at Iowa State University, March 8-13.

The five concerts at the Iowa State Center will include four by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium and Pops Night by the Boston Pops Orchestra in the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

The Boston organization becomes the third to present a concert series at Iowa State. Previous festivals featured the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The distinguished conductor William Steinbert will conduct the opening concert on Wednesday, March 8. Soprano Eileen Farrell, who enjoyed wide popularity as a radio artist even before embarking on an operatic career, will be the soloist for selections from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and "Gotterdammerung."

Arthur Fiedler, who for more than 40 years has conducted the famous Pops concerts, will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra's program in the Coliseum on Friday, March 10. "Doc" Severinsen, orchestra leader on the Johnny Carson "Tonight Show," will be trumpet soloist. In the style of the Pops concerts in Boston, refreshments will be served and some of the audience will be seated at tables and chairs on the arena floor. More than 12,000 spectators will be seated in the Coliseum's theater-type seats for a total audience of 14,000.

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA
TIMES-REPUBLICAN
D. 15,000

FEB 16 1972

Boston Symphony Is Scheduled For ISU Orchestra Festival Five Days In March

AMES — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, three outstanding conductors, an array of solo artists and a world premiere will be featured in the Ames International Orchestra Festival at Iowa State University, March 8-13.

The five concerts at the Iowa State Center will include four by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium and Pops Night by the Boston Pops Orchestra in the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

The Boston organization becomes the third to present a concert series at Iowa State. Previous festivals featured the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The distinguished conductor William Steinbert will conduct the opening concert on Wednesday, March 8.

Arthur Fiedler, who for more than 40 years has conducted the famous Pops concerts, will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra's program in the Coliseum on Friday, March 10. "Doc" Severinsen, orchestra leader on the Johnny Carson "Tonight Show," will be trumpet solist. More than 12,000 spectators will be seated in the Coliseum's theater-type seats for a total audience of 14,000.

Youthful Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the symphony orchestra's Saturday, March 11, concert.

The world premiere of a new choral work, sung by 230 Iowa State students, will be a highlight of the Sunday, March 12, concert. William Schuman, one of America's foremost composers was commissioned to do the composition "Mail Order Madrigals," especially for Iowa State under a grant by J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown. The composer and his wife will attend.

Soprano Veronica Tyler, bass-baritone Robert Hale, and the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus will join with the orchestra in presenting the Brahms "Requiem," which will be sung in English.

The series will end Monday, March 31, with a program that will inclde Zino Francescatti as solist in the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D Major by Brahms.

All concerts will begin at 8 p.m. with the exception of the Sunday matinee at 3. Ticket orders by mail and phone are being accepted by the Stephens Auditorim (294-2436) for the March 8, 11, 12 and 13 concerts in the aditorim. Pops Night, March 10, in the Colisem is sold out.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,350

FEB 9 1972

March 'Orchestra Festival' features Boston organization

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, three outstanding conductors, an array of solo artists and a world premiere will be featured in the Ames International Orchestra Festival at Iowa State University, March 8-13.

The five concerts at the Iowa State Center will include four by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the C.Y. Stephens Auditorium and Pops Night by the Boston Pops Orchestra in the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

Third Major Orchestra

The Boston organization becomes the third to present a concert series at Iowa State. Previous festivals featured the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The distinguished conductor William Steinbert will conduct the opening concert on Wednesday, March 8. Soprano Eileen Farrell, who enjoyed wide popularity as a radio artist before embarking on an operatic career, will be the soloist for selections from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and "Gotterdammerung."

Arthur Fiedler, who for more than 40 years has conducted the famous Pops concerts, will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra's program in the Coliseum on Friday, March 10. "Doc" Severinson, orchestra leader on the Johnny Carson "Tonight Show," will be trumpet soloist.

In the style of the Pops concerts in Boston, refreshments will be served and some of the audience will be seated at tables and chairs on the arena floor. More than 12,000 spectators will be seated in the Coliseum's theater-type seats for a total audience of 14,000.

Youthful Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the symphony orchestra's March 11 concert. Already widely acclaimed at 27, Thomas is the orchestra's associate conductor. Soloist Malcom Frager will perform Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G Major.

ISU Special

The world premiere of a new choral work, sung by 230 Iowa State students, will be a highlight of the Sunday, March 12, concert. William Schuman, one of America's foremost composers was commissioned to do the composition "Mail Order Madrigals," especially for Iowa State under a grant by J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown. The composer and his wife will attend.

Soprano Veronica Tyler, bass-baritone Robert Hale, and the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus will join with the orchestra in presenting the Brahms "Requiem," which will be sung in English.

The series will end March 31, with a program that will include Zino Francescatti as soloist in the Concert for Violin and Orchestra in D Major by Brahms.

All concerts will begin at 8 p.m. with the exception of the Sunday matinee at 3 p.m. Ticket orders by mail and telephone are being accepted by the Stephens Auditorium (294-2436) for the March 8, 11, 12 and 13 concerts in the auditorium. Pops Night, March 10, in the Coliseum is sold out.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO's midwest tour

A 12-day, 10-concert tour will take the Boston Symphony Orchestra to five midwestern cities between March 7 and 12. After playing in Madison, Wis., on March 7, the orchestra participates in the Ames (Iowa) International Orchestra Festival, where one of its five concerts will be a Boston Pops event. Ann Arbor, Mich., and Urbana, Ill., will hear one concert each before the BSO concludes its tour in Chicago with one Boston Pops and one orchestral concert. William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas, and Arthur Fiedler will be the conductors, and soloists include vocalists Eileen Farrell, Veronica Tyler, and Robert Hale; violinist Zino Francescatti; pianists Malcolm Frager, Jeffrey Siegel, and Alexis Weissenberg; and trumpeter Doc Severinsen.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

MAR 10 1972 New England Newsclip

MILWAUKEE SENTINEL
MILWAUKEE, WISC.
D. 165,653

FEB 29 1972

Concert Planned

Madison, Wis. – The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first Madison appearance at the University of Wisconsin Pavilion on March 7. The concert is one of 20 planned by the orchestra on its nationwide tour this year.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

FEB 21 1972

Orchestra festival assn. makes plans for Boston Symphony

The Ames International Orchestra Festival Assn. will endeavor to make the members of the Boston Symphony "feel at home, part of the family and part of Ames" during their visit here March 8-13.

Mrs. William McCormack, president of the Ames International Orchestra Festival Assn. said past experience with the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestra has shown how to make the musicians' stay in Ames as enjoyable as possible. Successful mechanics are being sharpened, streamlined and enlarged.

A reception for conductors, managers and presidents of the symphony orchestras of the midwest states will be held at the Holiday Inn following the opening concert. At the same time, a reception for Boston Symphony members will be held at the Octagon.

President and Mrs. W. Robert Parks will entertain following the concert Sunday, March 12, at a reception honoring William Schuman, composer of the compositions commissioned by the music department of Iowa State University to be given its premier performance by the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus.

Entertainment of orchestra members on an individual basis will again be channeled through the hospitality committee. Inquiries concerning dinners, trips, tours or other plans for the orchestra members should be directed to Mrs. Daniel Zaffarano, hospitality committee chairman, 292-2834, or to the office of Alvin Edgar, festival director, at Stephens Auditorium.

Would Symphony members enjoy learning how to square dance? This is a new idea under consideration as well as the possibility of a bridge party.

Bicycle transportation, so popular last year, will depend on the March weather, said Mrs. McCormack. Bicycle owners can make arrangements to loan their bicycles through the hospitality committee.

In another innovation, the ISU Musica Antiqua group has invited those in the Symphony who play Renaissance instruments to join them in a 'jam session" sometime during the week.

University athletic facilities will again be available for squash, tennis, handball and swimming. The Coliseum may be open for public skating in which case you may find yourself circling the ice alongside a violinist.

Fraternities and sororities who wish to entertain orchestra members at dinner during the week will coordinate their plans through Mrs. Wilbur Layton.

Filling a need encountered last year, volunteer drivers will be available in case of medical, dental or other emergencies involving Symphony personnel.

A daily schedule of concerts and activities will be announced later. Tickets for the Auditorium concerts of the Boston Symphony are still available.

MASON CITY, IOWA
GLOBE GAZETTE
D. 26,000

FEB 21 1972

Boston Pops plans four ISU concerts

AMES — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, three outstanding conductors, an array of solo artists and a world premiere will be featured in the Ames International Orchestra Festival at Iowa State University, March 8-13.

The five concerts at the Iowa State Center will include four by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium and Pops Night by the Boston Pops Orchestra in the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

The Boston organization becomes the third to present a concert series at Iowa State. Previous festivals featured the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The distinguished conductor William Steinbert will conduct the opening concert Wed., March 8. Soprano Eileen Farrell, who enjoyed wide popularity as a radio artist even before embarking on an operatic career, will be the soloist for selections from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and "Gotterdammerung."

Arthur Fiedler, who for more than 40 years has conducted the famous Pops concerts, will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra's program in the Coliseum on Friday, March 10. "Doc" Severinsen, orchestra leader on the Johnny Carson "Tonight Show," will be trumpet soloist.

In the style of the Pops concerts in Boston, refreshments will be served and some of the audience will be seated at tables and chairs on the arena floor. More than 12,000 spectators will be seated in the Coliseum's theater-type seats for a total audience of 14,000.

Youthful Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the symphony orchestra's Saturday concert. Already widely acclaimed at 27, Thomas is the orchestra's associate conductor. Soloist Malcom Frager will perform Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G Major.

The world premiere of a new choral work, sung by 230 Iowa State students, will be a highlight of the Sunday, March 12, concert. William Schuman, one of America's foremost composers was commissioned to do the composition "Mail Order Madrigals," especially for Iowa State under a grant by J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown. The composer and his wife will attend.

Soprano Veronica Tyler, bass-baritone Robert Hale, and the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus will join with the orchestra in presenting the Brahms "Requiem," which will be sung in English.

The series will end Monday, March 31, with a program that will include Zino Francescatti as soloist in the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D Major by Brahms.

All concerts will begin at 8 p.m. with the exception of the Sunday matinee at 3. Ticket orders by mail and phone are being accepted by the Stephens Auditorium (294-2436) for the March 8, 11, 12 and 13 concerts in the auditorium. Pops Night, March 10, in the Coliseum is sold out.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

FEB 26 1972

MANY ATTRACTIONS—C.Y. Stephens Auditorium continues to offer fine programs, concerts and special speakers after some two years serving the cultural needs of Ames and Iowa State University. An upcoming attraction in early March will be the Boston Symphony. Last year the auditorium hosted the famous New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

WAUSAU, WIS.
RECORD-HERALD
D. 21,000

MAR 1 1972

Boston Symphony to be in Madison

MADISON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's prestige orchestras, will make its first Madison appearance at the University of Wisconsin Pavilion Tuesday.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Union Theater-sponsored concert, and principal oboe player Ralph Gomberg will be the soloist.

The concert is one of 20 presented on tour across the nation this year.

Tickets are available at the Memorial Union Theater box office, 800 Langdon St., Madison 53706. Prices are $5.20, $4.16 and $2.60.

THE CAPITAL TIMES
MADISON, WISC.
D. 46,029

MAR 1 1972

Center.

March 7: Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas. 8 p.m. in the University Stock Pavilion.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 1 1972

Soprano Tyler In Pella Recital

(The Tribune's Iowa News Service)

PELLA, IA. — Soprano Veronica Tyler will present a recital at 8 p.m. Mar. 13 in Douwstra auditorium at Central College.

Miss Tyler will appear here following her performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Ames. There will be no admission charge.

STORM LAKE, IOWA
PILOT-TRIBUNE
W 6,133

MAR 1 1972

Five From Area In ISU Chorus

Appearing in the world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman to be presented by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, will be five students from this area.

The composition, "Mail Order Madrigals" was commissioned especially for the Iowa State Singers under a grant from J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown. Director W. Douglas Pritchard will also conduct the Singers and Oratorio Chorus in two other Schuman compositions, "Prelude for Voices" and "Carols for Death."

Richard Scott, 604 W. Fifth is a member of the Iowa State Singers. Others from this area who belong to the Oratorio Chorus are: Thomas Wall, Alta; Joann Fulcher, Fonda; Kirk Benson, Marathon; and Lindsey Brummer, Newell.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

FEB 28 1972

Boston Symphony Orchestra has had succession of strong men at helm

Boston Symphony Orchestra, at home in Symphony Hall

Most of this country's orchestras were organized by committees of interested citizens, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra was started by one man.

Major Henry Lee Higginson made and lost fortunes in the Boston financial world, dreaming all the while of providing the city with a great symphony orchestra. In 1881 his dream was realized when the first concert was given in Boston Music Hall, the orchestra's home until Symphony Hall was opened in 1900. In those years the German tradition in music prevailed, with its devotion to Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert, and the early Boston Symphony conductors were German.

With the strong anti-German feeling that accompanied World War I, some members of the orchestra and its conductor were unfortunately dismissed. Major Higginson, then in his 80's, entrusted the orchetstra to a board of trustees for the first time in 1918. French conductor Henri Rabaud led the orchestra for a season, then Pierre Monteux took over for five seasons, at the end of which he was praised for his restoration of the orchestra to its pre-war standing.

For the next 25 years, Serge Koussevitzky brought his own dramatic flair and electric enthusiasm to bear on the orchestra's development. During his turnure the orchestra accelerated its recording schedule, undertook live radio broadcasts of its concerts, began the free Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River embankment under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler, played the first summer concerts in the Berkshire Hills, and began its annual summer residence at the now famous estate of Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., where the Berkshire Music Center was founded in 1940.

After Koussevitzky came Charles Munch, under whom the orchestra made its first tours abroad, for 13 years. Then Erich Leinsdorf for seven years. When Leinsdorf retired in 1969, he was succeeded by William Steinberg, who will bring 106 musicians—99 men and seven women—here for the Ames International Orchestra Festival March 8-13.

In 1881, Major Higginson made the orchestra's music available to students and others of limited means byopening the final (Friday) rehearsal each week to all comers who paid in coins for the opportunity. The practice was revived in 1950 and today the final rehearsals in Symphony Hall are open to the public at one price for all, with no seats reserved and the proceeds going to the orchestra's pension fund.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

MAR 25 1972

New England
Newsclip

BSO Performs 'Romeo et Juliette' by Berlioz

By HARRY NEVILLE

After a two-week absence during which the Boston Symphony toured the Midwest, the orchestra returned to Symphony Hall yesterday to give a complete performance of "Romeo et Juliette," Berlioz' dramatic symphony after the tragedy by Shakespeare. William Steinberg conducted; the soloists were mezzo-soprano Joanna Simon, tenor Kenneth Riegel and bass Ara Bergerian; and the choral part was sung by the New England Conservatory Chorus, which had been prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon.

"Romeo et Juliette" is an incomparably beautiful score which isn't often performed, and this fact works in favor of nearly any performance, even one that is only adequate. Steinberg conducted a performance that was by no means "only adequate," but it seemed to this listener that much of its strength came from the sheer magnificence of the music and from the excellence of some of the individual contributions.

STEINBERG'S conception of this work is noble but not as moving as one could wish. He is not a conductor who wears his heart on his sleeve, and for that we can be grateful. Nevertheless, his restraint seemed excessive on this occasion. The love scene in the garden, for example, surely needs more passionate treatment than it got, and the same is true of the music for the tomb scene.

Steinberg's speeds struck this listener as being quite different from what we hear from most conductors: slightly faster in the slow sections, slightly slower in the fast sections. A somewhat deliberate pace lent a feeling of remorselessness to the fighting of Capulets and Montagues in the introduction, but for Queen Mab it did little except to make her plodding. Sloppy ensemble work, a result of Steinberg's vague beat, worked against the conception in both cases.

THERE WERE many fine solo contributions from the players, particularly from the woodwind section. Generally, the playing was refined though lacking in the sensuousness the score would seem to call for. Joanna Simon gave a rich-voiced, textually sensitive account of the contralto solo, and Kenneth Riegel sang the brief tenor solo with a great deal of charm and verve. Ara Berberian made a dignified yet sympathetic figure of Friar Laurence at the conclusion. The chorus produced a full-bodied, well blended tone and sang with flawless diction.

The Lively Arts/Alan Rich

BIGAMY ON THE ORCHESTRAL FRONT

"... An assemblage cannot become an orchestra without a dominant, permanent figure at its head, working week after week..."

While I was in Boston a couple of weeks ago to gawk at Sarah Caldwell and her Trojan horse, I also dropped in at Symphony Hall, that great place, to attend the press conference announcing the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as the Boston Symphony's next conductor. As press conferences go, it was an OK occasion—hors d'oeuvre dull but plentiful, liquor likewise—and Mr. Ozawa made a lot of sense in his long and amiable discourse.

Yet, I was concerned about the situation, and spoke a piece to that effect. When his new contract becomes effective, Ozawa will be in effect the principal conductor of two major American orchestras 3,000 miles apart, Boston and San Francisco. The same situation obtains for a great many other conductors today: Boulez in New York and with the BBC Symphony in London, Maazel in Cleveland, London and Berlin; Zubibubi in Los Angeles and Israel; Solti in Chicago and Paris, etc. Now, when I was growing up musically—in Symphony Hall, as it happens, where I wore my usher's uniform more proudly than any general his stars—the attitude seemed to prevail that a conductor and his orchestra were one and the same thing. Serge Koussevitzky took maybe four weeks off during the season, and during the rest of the time he worked to create an orchestra wonderfully responsive not only to his baton but to every twitch of his nose, every flicker of his eyelid.

I asked Ozawa how any conductor could hope to create this kind of rapport with an orchestra, given the situation that a) he can only be with it for half of its season at most, and b) that he is carrying on an overtly bigamous relationship with one or more other orchestras at the same time. His answer was, for the occasion, graceful and intelligent: a) orchestral musicians are so much better trained these days that they can respond to a conductor's personality much sooner than used to be the case, and b) today's public demands lots of variety in its concert fare; the more guest conductors the better.

Graceful and intelligent though it be, I cannot buy this answer. I see nothing but disaster ahead for our orchestras, if this policy is allowed to continue. You can buy the most adept orchestral players in the world, put them together on a stage in a house with the most beautiful acoustical conditions in all the world (a fairly accurate description of Symphony Hall, by the way) and you still won't have a symphony orchestra—not, that is, until a single dominant personality is put on the podium, to work with the musicians week after week, studying the strengths and weaknesses of the individual players, and gradually molding a sound that comes to represent the uniqueness of that orchestra. This was what Koussevitzky produced in Boston, and he worked on it for 25 years; it was what George Szell produced in Cleveland; what Stokowski, and then Ormandy, have done in Philadelphia, what Toscanini did with the New York Philharmonic and, later the N.B.C. (although the horrible acoustical conditions in which that orchestra had to work negated some of the results). Toscanini, in fact, raised a big and beautiful stink in 1944 when N.B.C. proposed that Leopold Stokowski co-conduct the orchestra.

One of the things that has disturbed me a great deal lately is the impression that most of the world's symphony orchestras are beginning to sound alike. You begin to suspect this after a few weeks at Carnegie Hall's excellent Visiting Orchestra series; even though every conductor carries his own ideas about orchestral sound and balance, there is developing a world-wide all-purpose tone. The only orchestra I have heard lately of which this isn't true is, in fact, the Philadelphia under Ormandy. I don't much like the sound of the orchestra, or the uses to which it is often put, but there's one thing for damn sure: you know it's the Philadelphia Orchestra, even with your eyes shut. That is because Ormandy stays put.

Orchestral musicians complain constantly about the constant parade of guest conductors they have to endure, and I can't say I blame them. Musicians like to complain, but it must be terribly demoralizing to them not to be able to work under any continuing sense of leadership. Beyond that, I have come to loathe the depersonalization that has come to orchestral music because of this de-emphasis of the orchestral personality. It's very much like the depersonalization we get on most recordings, where the cutting and splicing and faking of the acoustical background make it seem as though there is only one super-pianist, one super-violinist and one all-purpose orchestra at work in all the studios today. Maybe audiences are a little more fickle in their loyalties toward conductors these days, and maybe they do demand more variety during a concert season; yet, when I was spending my weekends in Symphony Hall years ago there was a pride in the presence there of a great and unique orchestra. I cannot even begin to believe that people wouldn't buy tickets once again to hear this kind of glorious noise.

Orchestral managements will hasten to explain that the principal reason behind these multiple conductorships is simply the fact that there aren't enough conductors to go around. They will point, further, to the not inconsiderable fact that the ease of jet travel these days makes it very tempting for conductors—as well as performers in all categories—to spend the greater part of their years as guest artists in some city other than their own. There's more money in this, for one thing, plus the considerable ego gratification of being able to show up somewhere every week with the acclaim given to visiting celebrities.

This latter situation cannot be disputed, although I would suggest that a great many artists are taking years off their careers (and, very likely, their lives) by spending so much time in the jet stream. The first point needs a little more exploration, however.

What a great many managers mean when they talk about a new conductor these days is, I suspect, a new Lenny. You can't blame them; it's a little horrifying these days to attend a concert by the Boston Symphony, as I did that weekend, and see blocks of empty seats; in my day tickets for Saturday night BSO concerts were harder to come by than box seats for the Knicks. Some people used to talk about Bernstein as a sellout, but in the box-office sense they were right.

There are plenty of conductors around these days, but not many of them are Lennies, and they are suffering because of this. The other night at the Philharmonic I heard the latest winner of the Mitropoulos Music Competition that is held in New York each year for conductors. This young fellow, Jacques Delacote, is a fine and talented musician, but he isn't a Lenny. He is handsome, but he is sober and sparing of his motions. He wasn't quite in his element in conducting the Bruckner Ninth (although this may be the result of my currently having withdrawal symptoms where Bruckner is concerned), but it is obvious that he has the technique to step into a good job somewhere, and the musicians treated him with seeming respect. (I heard the Monday night concert; I hear that he had suffered a memory slip on Thursday.)

In its ten years, the Mitropoulos Competition, which is run by the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of New York, has turned up a large number of able conductors. Some, like Claudio Abbado, Alain Lombard, Zdenek Kosler and Boris Brott, have gone on to decent permanent jobs. Two other winners, Akira Endo and David Gilbert, are conductors with the American Ballet Theater where their work goes largely unmarked but is of remarkably high quality. None of these conductors are, however, Lennies, at least not in their overt podium personalities. They just happen to be excellent musicians who would, if conductors were chosen merely on the basis of their musical abilities, greatly grace any community that chose to hire them.

There is no question that some sort of conductor shortage exists in this country. It is partly the consequence of an even direr shortage of training programs for conductors. Few of our conservatories offer the sort of basic Kapellmeisterschule for young conductors that you find in almost any school in Europe. The few conductors around who are enough masters of their craft that they can teach it are usually too busy jetting around the world to take on apprentices—as Pierre Monteux and several others used to do. That, plus the fact that American orchestras large and small are more anxious to hire Lennies than to take on talented music-oriented conductors to grow in skill over the years, has taken its toll on the new conductor crop. The crop must remain small so long as the climate is against its growth.

That, therefore, ought to be an area of concern, if the idea of the orchestral conductor as a permanent part of a community is ever going to be revived. Meanwhile, I should also throw in as a sidebar here that at least one of the few authentic Lennies, André Previn, shows signs these days of maturing into a serious and eloquent conductor. I caught one of his programs with the London Symphony at Carnegie Hall recently, and was impressed as I have never been before with Previn's genuine grasp of both orchestral technique and musical line. It was a horrible program—Walton, Sibelius and Brahms—but I stayed nearly to the end.

Illustrated by Barry Zaid

NEW YORK MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 28 1972

The Lively Arts/Alan Rich

BIGAMY ON THE ORCHESTRAL FRONT

"... An assemblage cannot become an orchestra without a dominant, permanent figure at its head, working week after week..."

While I was in Boston a couple of weeks ago to gawk at Sarah Caldwell and her Trojan horse, I also dropped in at Symphony Hall, that great place, to attend the press conference announcing the appointment of Seiji Ozawa as the Boston Symphony's next conductor. As press conferences go, it was an OK occasion—hors d'oeuvre dull but plentiful, liquor likewise—and Mr. Ozawa made a lot of sense in his long and amiable discourse.

Yet, I was concerned about the situation, and spoke a piece to that effect. When his new contract becomes effective, Ozawa will be in effect the principal conductor of two major American orchestras 3,000 miles apart, Boston and San Francisco. The same situation obtains for a great many other conductors today: Boulez in New York and with the BBC Symphony in London, Maazel in Cleveland, London and Berlin; Zubibubi in Los Angeles and Israel; Solti in Chicago and Paris, etc. Now, when I was growing up musically—in Symphony Hall, as it happens, where I wore my usher's uniform more proudly than any general his stars—the attitude seemed to prevail that a conductor and his orchestra were one and the same thing. Serge Koussevitzky took maybe four weeks off during the season, and during the rest of the time he worked to create an orchestra wonderfully responsive not only to his baton but to every twitch of his nose, every flicker of his eyelid.

I asked Ozawa how any conductor could hope to create this kind of rapport with an orchestra, given the situation that a) he can only be with it for half of its season at most, and b) that he is carrying on an overtly bigamous relationship with one or more other orchestras at the same time. His answer was, for the occasion, graceful and intelligent: a) orchestral musicians are so much better trained these days that they can respond to a conductor's personality much sooner than used to be the case, and b) today's public demands lots of variety in its concert fare; the more guest conductors the better.

Graceful and intelligent though it be, I cannot buy this answer. I see nothing but disaster ahead for our orchestras, if this policy is allowed to continue. You can buy the most adept orchestral players in the world, put them together on a stage in a house with the most beautiful acoustical conditions in all the world (a fairly accurate description of Symphony Hall, by the way) and you still won't have a symphony orchestra—not, that is, until a single dominant personality is put on the podium, to work with the musicians week after week, studying the strengths and weaknesses of the individual players, and gradually molding a sound that comes to represent the uniqueness of that orchestra. This was what Koussevitzky produced in Boston, and he worked on it for 25 years; it was what George Szell produced in Cleveland; what Stokowski, and then Ormandy, have done in Philadelphia, what Toscanini did with the New York Philharmonic and, later the N.B.C. (although the horrible acoustical conditions in which that orchestra had to work negated some of the results). Toscanini, in fact, raised a big and beautiful stink in 1944 when N.B.C. proposed that Leopold Stokowski co-conduct the orchestra.

One of the things that has disturbed me a great deal lately is the impression that most of the world's symphony orchestras are beginning to sound alike. You begin to suspect this after a few weeks at Carnegie Hall's excellent Visiting Orchestra series; even though every conductor carries his own ideas about orchestral sound and balance, there is developing a world-wide all-purpose tone. The only orchestra I have heard lately of which this isn't true is, in fact, the Philadelphia under Ormandy. I don't much like the sound of the orchestra, or the uses to which it is often put, but there's one thing for damn sure: you know it's the Philadelphia Orchestra, even with your eyes shut. That is because Ormandy stays put.

Orchestral musicians complain constantly about the constant parade of guest conductors they have to endure, and I can't say I blame them. Musicians like to complain, but it must be terribly demoralizing to them not to be able to work under any continuing sense of leadership. Beyond that, I have come to loathe the depersonalization that has come to orchestral music because of this de-emphasis of the orchestral personality. It's very much like the depersonalization we get on most recordings, where the cutting and splicing and faking of the acoustical background make it seem as though there is only one super-pianist, one super-violinist and one all-purpose orchestra at work in all the studios today. Maybe audiences are a little more fickle in their loyalties toward conductors these days, and maybe they do demand more variety during a concert season; yet, when I was spending my weekends in Symphony Hall years ago there was a pride in the presence there of a great and unique orchestra. I cannot even begin to believe that people wouldn't buy tickets once again to hear this kind of glorious noise.

Orchestral managements will hasten to explain that the principal reason behind these multiple conductorships is simply the fact that there aren't enough conductors to go around. They will point, further, to the not inconsiderable fact that the ease of jet travel these days makes it very tempting for conductors—as well as performers in all categories—to spend the greater part of their years as guest artists in some city other than their own. There's more money in this, for one thing, plus the considerable ego gratification of being able to show up somewhere every week with the acclaim given to visiting celebrities.

This latter situation cannot be disputed, although I would suggest that a great many artists are taking years off their careers (and, very likely, their lives) by spending so much time in the jet stream. The first point needs a little more exploration, however.

What a great many managers mean when they talk about a new conductor these days is, I suspect, a new Lenny. You can't blame them; it's a little horrifying these days to attend a concert by the Boston Symphony, as I did that weekend, and see blocks of empty seats; in my day tickets for Saturday night BSO concerts were harder to come by than box seats for the Knicks. Some people used to talk about Bernstein as a sellout, but in the box-office sense they were right.

There are plenty of conductors around these days, but not many of them are Lennies, and they are suffering because of this. The other night at the Philharmonic I heard the latest winner of the Mitropoulos Music Competition that is held in New York each year for conductors. This young fellow, Jacques Delacote, is a fine and talented musician, but he isn't a Lenny. He is handsome, but he is sober and sparing of his motions. He wasn't quite in his element in conducting the Bruckner Ninth (although this may be the result of my currently having withdrawal symptoms where Bruckner is concerned), but it is obvious that he has the technique to step into a good job somewhere, and the musicians treated him with seeming respect. (I heard the Monday night concert; I hear that he had suffered a memory slip on Thursday.)

In its ten years, the Mitropoulos Competition, which is run by the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of New York, has turned up a large number of able conductors. Some, like Claudio Abbado, Alain Lombard, Zdenek Kosler and Boris Brott, have gone on to decent permanent jobs. Two other winners, Akira Endo and David Gilbert, are conductors with the American Ballet Theater where their work goes largely unmarked but is of remarkably high quality. None of these conductors are, however, Lennies, at least not in their overt podium personalities. They just happen to be excellent musicians who would, if conductors were chosen merely on the basis of their musical abilities, greatly grace any community that chose to hire them.

There is no question that some sort of conductor shortage exists in this country. It is partly the consequence of an even direr shortage of training programs for conductors. Few of our conservatories offer the sort of basic Kapellmeisterschule for young conductors that you find in almost any school in Europe. The few conductors around who are enough masters of their craft that they can teach it are usually too busy jetting around the world to take on apprentices—as Pierre Monteux and several others used to do. That, plus the fact that American orchestras large and small are more anxious to hire Lennies than to take on talented music-oriented conductors to grow in skill over the years, has taken its toll on the new conductor crop. The crop must remain small so long as the climate is against its growth.

That, therefore, ought to be an area of concern, if the idea of the orchestral conductor as a permanent part of a community is ever going to be revived. Meanwhile, I should also throw in as a sidebar here that at least one of the few authentic Lennies, André Previn, shows signs these days of maturing into a serious and eloquent conductor. I caught one of his programs with the London Symphony at Carnegie Hall recently, and was impressed as I have never been before with Previn's genuine grasp of both orchestral technique and musical line. It was a horrible program—Walton, Sibelius and Brahms—but I stayed nearly to the end.

Illustrated by Barry Zaid

NEW YORK MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
FEB 28 1972

TORONTO, ONT., CANADA
STAR
D. 488,073

FEB 9 1972

Music
William Littler

Brothers in early 20s show maturity on guitar

Since the death of Ida Presti a few years ago, the world has been without a pre-eminent guitar duo. That condition may soon be rectified by the Abreu Brothers.

Still in their early 20s, Sergio and Eduardo Abreu have a long way to go to achieve the finished artistry of Presti and Lagoya.

But if their recital for the Guitar Society at the St. Lawrence Centre's Town Hall last night represents their current state of maturity, the omens all look good.

Each brother qualifies as a soloist in his own right. Sergio, who was born in 1948, proved himself an adept interpretor of the lute literature, notably the music of Dowland, whose Frog Galliard he articulated with nimbleness and a good ear for color changes.

Eduardo, who was born a year later, seems to specialize in the literature of the Spanish guitar. The seductive qualities of Granados' La Maja de Goya and Moreno-Torroba's Madronnos found in him a sympathetic portrait painter.

If they make proficient sounds individually, however, the two brothers sound even better together. They really can make their instruments resemble two facets of one personality.

In tackling a group of Scarlatti Sonatas, they needed to be able to do this. Scarlatti wrote for the harpsichord and anticipated a complete evenness of articulation.

In tackling the First Spanish Dance from Falla's opera La Vida Breve, they went even further by undertaking an orchestral role. This too, they managed without discomfort.

Not all their interpretations worked equally well. The guitar simply does not produce the kind of piano sonorities Ravel had in mind when writing his Pavane for a Dead Princess.

Nevertheless, the Abreus played whatever they programmed with technical fluency and good taste, whether the music at hand involved the fast finger work of a Pavan by John Johnson or the 20th century counterpoint of a sonata by Guido Santorsola.

Incidentally, they were Santorsola's personal choice to premiere his Double Concerto for Guitars in London, back in October of 1969. Their recording of this work, coupled with a concerto by Castelnuovo-Tedesco, should be available in the spring.

And speaking of recordings, these two Brazilians already seem to be well on the way to a major recording career. They have already turned out three LPs, one of which, The Guitars of Sergio and Eduardo Abreu, can be found in Canda on the Ace of Diamonds label. Judging by last night's concert, it should be worth hearing.

Seiji Ozawa faced with tough decision

OZAWA TAKES TWO JOBS: Seiji Ozawa's recent acceptance of the musical directorship of the Boston Symphony created almost as much of a stir in San Francisco as the news of his departure for the west coast city did when he was still musical director in Toronto.

Cancelling a rehearsal with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Ozawa flew to San Francisco last Tuesday to explain the situation to the members of his current orchestra, the San Francisco Symphony, some of whom feared he was abandoning them after only a couple of seasons.

"I am not changing my job at all," Ozawa explained. "I want to concentrate on my work more. It took me two months to decide, but I know now that I can do it. I won't have to stay in hotels any more."

What Ozawa will be doing, in effect, is dividing all his North American conducting after the 1972-73 season between two orchestras, the San Francisco Symphony and the Boston Symphony—which seems to mean that his first orchestra, The Toronto Symphony, will have seen the last of him for the forseeable future.

As the 36-year-old maestro put it: "At first I thought they wanted me all the time in Boston, and I thought very negatively about it. That would be a crazy thing. There was much confusion in my head. And then the baby came. Vera (Mrs. Ozawa) and I knew my present schedule was too much and I had to concentrate my work."

On the surface, Ozawa would seem to have made a mature decision—better to develop a close relationship with two orchestras than to spend half a life hopping from airport to airport. Let's just hope he finds a little time for us.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492

FEB 20 1972

The World Of Music

Sizing Up Seiji Ozawa On Boston's Podium

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

If there were a lot of rumors preceding the appointment of Georg Solti as music director of the Chicago Symphony, and if there was much embittered confusion about Lorin Maazel becoming the successor to the late George Szell with the Cleveland Orchestra, there was little of either with the announcement that Seiji Ozawa will become the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the 1973-74 season. He will replace William Steinberg, also the music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, who has held the post in Boston since 1969.

Actually, the Bostonians will be without a music director for a year. The reason for this is quite complicated. Because of previous commitments Ozawa's contract with the San Francisco Symphony, where he has been music director since 1970, was recently extended through 1976, and he will guest-conduct the Boston Symphony for only one week during the 1972-73 season. He will, however, serve during that year as music adviser. He also will continue as co-director with Gunther Schuller of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and Festival at Tanglewood, a post he has occupied since 1970.

Michael Tilson Thomas, currently associate director of the orchestra, as well as the Buffalo Philharmonic director, and Colin Davis, musical director of London's Royal Opera, were named principal guest - conductors. Thus Thomas' title of associate conductor falls vacant. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, continues as assistant conductor.

There have been those in Boston who wanted to see young Thomas, who has repeatedly and very successfully led the orchestra, in its conductorial position, but, however talented, Thomas, it is felt, still needs seasoning and, above all, experience. Davis was reputedly the trustees' first choice after Erich Leinsdorf's departure back in 1967, but could not be persuaded to accept the post.

★ ★ ★

That Ozawa is popular with the players of the Boston Orchestra is no secret. He is amiable, easy to get along with. Despite his age — 36 — he has come a long way in a comparatively short time.

And when he conducts the Bostonians, as he frequently does at Tanglewood, it is always a relaxed relationship despite a certain theatricality that he invariably brings to his chores.

During the summer, wearing a loose-fitting white silk shirt with embroidery, a cross between a Japanese and a Russian blouse, with his long black hair swirling around his neck, the short figure bounces to the podium and takes command. Make no mistake about it, he takes command, and, with the fullest cooperation from the orchestra, he usually has his complete way, throwing himself body and soul into the music — from the contemporaries to Berlioz.

The result is always scintillating, effervescent, grandiose. (I don't recall ever having heard him conduct Mozart, however).

SEIJI OZAWA
Ex-scooter salesman

Ozawa's connection with the Bostonians goes back to 1960, when the Manchurian-born, Tokyo-trained musician, who switched from piano to conducting because of a soccer injury to his hand (ghosts of Robert Schumann!), was a student at Tanglewood. He won the Koussevitzky prize that year as the most promising student conductor.

He had come to the Berkshire Music Center at the invitation of Charles Muench, then Boston Orchestra's music director, who had been a judge when Ozawa won the International Conductors' Contest at Besancon, France, in 1959.

Ozawa's first major guest engagement in North America was with the San Francisco Orchestra in 1962, and his frequent guest visits with the Boston Symphony began at Tanglewood in the summer of '64.

During the 1964-65 season he was Leonard Bernstein's assistant at the New York Philharmonic, and he also has been music director of Chicago's Ravinia Summer Festival, the Toronto Symphony, and the Japan Philharmonic.

★ ★ ★

What every orchestra needs, and the Boston Symphony is no exception, is a degree of continuity in its leadership. With the illness of Mr. Steinberg, the Boston had to do with all sorts of well-reputed guest conductors. Ozawa has stated that he will confine his work after 1973 to North America, and will conduct the Bostonians for 10 weeks, more in subsequent seasons (his initial contract is for three years).

But he will maintain his association with the San Francisco Orchestra as well, and there is the rub, for each major orchestra would like to call its music director its own — exclusively.

In a recent press conference, Ozawa promised "to make a good family with the musicians," and he correctly asserted that "I know them, and they know me."

One hears that the offer for the Boston post was made last November. It seems there that Ozawa took time to think about it and make up his mind.

I still remember vividly the rehearsals and final presentation of Berlioz' "Mass" and "Damnation of Faust" at the end of two Tanglewood seasons. They were opulent performances, with Ozawa embracing the works with consummate skill, shaping them well-balanced and dramatically.

Talcott W. Banks, president of the Boston Orchestra board of trustees, welcomed "this brilliantly gifted and utterly devoted conductor" and that he was joined by cellist Robert Ripley, chairman of the orchestra's players' committee who said that "the members of the orchestra are delighted with this appointment . . . we are looking forward with keenest anticipation to working with him on a regular basis."

It has been a long and fast road from Hoten (Hobin), Manchuria, since 1935, via Tokyo and Europe, where he also served a stint as an agent for a Japanese motor scooter company in the early 1950s, to America to one of the most prestigious positions in the conductorial world.

Can the summer favorite sustain his elan and excitement over the full winter season? Only time will tell; we will have to wait for any hints until the 1973-74 season.

He is by no means a romantic music conductor exclusively. For example, at the early February concerts with the Philadelphia, which he also will continue to guest-conduct, he presented an odd program consisting of "Sicilian Vespers" Overture, the "Pathetique" and Maki Ishii's "So-Gu II," classical chamber music of the Japanese court, in an encounter that made East at least meet West, even if the two could not fully merge. The 10-member Gagaku ensemble, in traditional costume, enhanced the presentation.

The critics agree that Ozawa is consistently exciting as a conductor who keeps one absorbed. Having guest-conducted most of the major orchestras around the world already, and having a goodly number of recordings to his credit has added to his knowledge and experience.

No wonder, then, that Tal-

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,951
FEB 26 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg Returns to Lead BSO in Bruckner's Eighth Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE

BSO Music Director William Steinberg, absent from Symphony Hall for nearly two months, returned Thursday night to lead the orchestra in a performance of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C Minor. As nearly everyone has noted, the Eighth is a very long symphony. At 70 minutes plus, it is long even by the standards of a generation that has some to accept the idea of vast symphonic canvases.

TO SOME LISTENERS the length of Bruckner's symphonies is "heavenly," to borrow Schumann's famous remark about Schubert's Ninth. Not a few listeners, however, find these works hellishly long, while still others take an in-between view somewhat like that of Stravinsky, who admired Bruckner but found himself mentally turning the score pages far in advance.

For my own part I find the Eighth a work full of strikingly beautiful things, but a poorly realized performance of this piece bores me more quickly than a comparable performance of almost any other symphony I can think of. To come to the point quickly, I did find myself squirming at several points during the Thursday night performance, despite the fact that in many ways it was a beautiful performance.

AS IS SO OFTEN the case with Steinberg, tempos were extraordinarily well judged. One always felt a sense of forward momentum, and yet there was no sacrifice of Brucknerian expansiveness in the outer movements and in the Adagio. The Scherzo was taken at a speed that captured perfectly its rather odd quality of being lumbering and yet relentless at the same time.

Transitions were beautifully managed throughout, with never a trace of affectation or sentimentality. In fact, one of the most impressive things about the performance was the noble, almost austere quality of Steinberg's concept, which was utterly devoid of cheap or easy effects. What I missed in all this was truly refined detail work. Attacks could have been more unified, phrasing more sensitive and tonal shadings more subtle — all without detriment to Steinberg's decidedly unsentimental view.

FOR THE INFORMATION of Bruckner buffs, the performance was based on the 1955 Nowak Edition, which in turn is based on Bruckner's 1890 revision. Steinberg's major departure from the text was at letter G of the Scherzo, where some passages for the lower strings were plucked instead of bowed.

French pianist Nicole Henriot was soloist in the opening work, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat, which made an old companion piece for the Bruckner. She gave a performance that was notable for its lack of feeling for anything but the heroic, bravura aspects of the piece. Though frankly virtuosic, this concerto has many opportunities for the display of subtle, delicate pianism. The opening octaves set the tone of Miss Henriot's approach, which was loud and clangorous at nearly every point.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988
FEB 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg's Reading of Bruckner Warm, Leisurely and Meticulous

By JOHN RICHARDSON

• Music Review

It would be difficult to find two more different musical figures than Franz Liszt and Anton Bruckner. Though contemporaries and ardent followers of Richard Wagner, they stand at opposite poles world: Bruckner, the introvert and church musician, Liszt the extrovert virtuoso and international star. On Friday William Steinberg returned to the Boston Symphony podium for the first time since December to give of the 19th century musical us representative Liszt (the piano concerto in E Flat) and the best of Bruckner (the eighth symphony).

★

The Liszt concerto opened the program with Nicole Henriot the excellent soloist. Mme. Henriot brought to this showpiece a sure technical command and a flair for the more delicate, Chopinesque moments. Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra provided a clean and bouncy accompaniment.

★

The eighth symphony, like so much Bruckner, is a peculiar melange of church music, folksiness and Beethoven, with a generous helping of Wagner chromaticism. It is a tribute to Bruckner's rich imagination and sure sense of counterpoint that this hour-and-a-half long monster holds together at all. For all its problems, it is probably his best piece, moving, noble and very exciting.

★

This is the kind of music that William Steinberg does best. His reading was in a tradition that is rapidily vanishing: warm, leisurely, with a great emphasis on detail. Few conductors around can bring to this piece the kind of breadth, weight and conviction heard on Friday.

The playing was on a high level all afternoon. The orchestra's string section coped ably with the very tricky writing; it is most unusual to hear string players latch onto high exposed chromaticism with such security. The wind playing was also praiseworthy, Harold Wright's clarinet playing being particularly outstanding. Aside from the occasional raucous note from the Wagner tubas, the brass section played with the requisite weight and sonority. Occasional lapses in precision were probably due to Mr. Steinberg's increasingly vague stick technique.

★

The audience behaviour, as usual, was not good. There was much unwrapping of candies, and more than a few nodding heads, though this was probably due to the bring-a-lunch length of the Bruckner.

All in all, an excellent concert and a good example of the honest and sober music-making that Mr. Steinberg has brought us during his tenure as music director.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000
FEB 24 1972 New England Newsclip

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234
FEB 24 1972 New England Newsclip

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993
FEB 24 1972 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350
FEB 24 1972 New England Newsclip

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200
FEB 24 1972 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. Concerts

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in works by Liszt and Bruckner in the second Thursday B concert, Feb. 24 at 8:30 p.m. and the sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday, Feb. 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Feb. 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The concert begins with the Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat, Nicole Henriot, soloist. After intermission, Mr. Steinberg conducts the Orchestra in the Bruckner Symphony no. 8 in C minor.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,012 SUN. 566,977
FEB 25 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg conducts Bruckner symphony

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony last night for the first time since the middle of December, and he made his return with something he understands completely, Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 8 in C minor.

The Ninth, had Bruckner lived to finish it, would have been as big, or even bigger. As it is, the Eighth, that unlikely household of "Tristan," Beethoven, the cathedral organ, and thigh-slapping country dance, is the most massive of the lot. It is exciting to start in such mystery, with a quiet phrase that is set harmonically wildly askew — poised on B flat minor in order to launch a piece in C minor — and then to wait for that phrase to settle in C where it belongs. It does, about an hour and a quarter later, in a stupendous blaze of C major: such a lesson in patience (or faith?), and such a reason to have an ear and a memory.

I wonder if Steinberg's many tempo changes in the finale come from the old, corrupt texts which for decades were the only ones available and from which he would have first learned his Bruckner? I am, at any rate, not quite sold on them. I find they tend to scatter that movement whose structure is under the best of conditions eccentric and exceedingly problematic. That one reservation aside, Steinberg led a wise performance, all sense, nobility, and complete, unreserved conviction.

Physically, his conducting tended to be minimal. There were moments, particularly in the first movement, when the orchestra could have used sharper, firmer guidance. Sonorities were splendid, however, and Everett Firth (kettledrums) and Harold Wright (clarinet) played extremely well.

The Liszt E flat Piano Concerto was an inappropriate prelude to that grand celebration. The pianist was Nicole Henriot, who was a frequent soloist with the Boston Symphony during the music directorship of her uncle, Charles Munch, and who gave a smashing party for the orchestra during its visit to France last April. The performance had some vigor of a rough sort, but neither brilliance nor delicacy.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
FEB 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Vienna and BSO

The day the Bruckner didn't stop

By Louis Snyder

There have been months, even years, without more than a token hearing of the music of Anton Bruckner in Boston concert halls. Now, all of a sudden, there's a burst of Bruckner. Music director William Steinberg included the Eighth Symphony on last weekend's programs of the Boston Symphony, and Josef Krips conducted the Seventh with the visiting Vienna Symphony Orchestra. Several weeks ago, the adventurous Civic Symphony of Boston played the Second, and several weeks hence MIT and Mount Holyoke singers will join to do the Mass in F minor in Cambridge.

Thus on Friday in Symphony Hall, it was possible for Mr. and Mrs. Hardy Listener to indulge in two of the great Bruckner symphonies, performed between 3 and 11 p.m. by two of the world's leading orchestras, under two of the most respected Bruckner interpreters of the day. There were large houses on both occasions, and except for a few early departers for the suburbs in the afternoon, a uniformly spellbound atmosphere.

Conductor's achievement

Mr. Steinberg's reading of the Eighth ranked with his most impressive BSO performances to date. Each of the four intricately wrought movements was projected with strength and clarity, to be summed up masterfully in the coda to the Finale, in which all the main themes of the symphony are combined in one magnificently orchestrated package. The 1955 Leopold Nowack version, a restoration of the composer's own revision of 1890, was used in these performances (Bruckner's work long suffered from the well-intentioned but often uncomprehending "help" of pupils and friends).

The orchestral playing on Friday was of top quality throughout all choirs. The response to Mr. Steinberg in the beautiful Adagio achieved a truly memorable meshing of tonal textures, as did the mounting harmonic excitement of the Finale.

Miss Henriot returns

The Bruckner was prefaced on the BSO's weekend programs by Liszt's Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat, played by Nicole Henriot who, in 1949, had made the first of numerous appearances with the orchestra in the same work. Fragile-seeming Miss Henriot, like her compatriot Jeanne-Marie Darré, meets the challenge of Liszt with steel-fingered facility and a grandeur of approach that is as impressive as it is unexpected.

The result, of course, is not a trippingly smooth, romantic interpretation, but one that makes the notes flash by like a chain of diamonds, solidly crystalline and equally matched. In some solo passages, tempos seemed pensively extended, but as the concerto progressed, soloist and conductor concentrated more on its bravura aspects, winding up in a blaze of virtuosic glory that set the rafters ringing.

Opens U.S. Tour

Viennese Concert In Boston

By HARRY NEVILLE

A beautiful program beautifully played was what the Vienna Symphony provided Friday night in Symphony Hall on the first stop of the orchestra's current U.S. tour. Joseph Krips led the visiting Austrians in two great masterworks of the repertory, Mozart's 41st ("Jupiter") and Bruckner's Seventh symphonies, both of which got the kind of vibrant, affectionate performances we like to think of as "Viennese."

The pairings was ideal, for these works inhabit vastly different, yet complementary worlds. If the Bruckner received the better performance, it should be understood that "better" in this case means very good as opposed to good. In both cases the playing gave satisfaction of a kind that is — sad to say — unuaual in Symphony Hall nowadays.

COMPARISON of the Vienna players with the BSO was inevitable for anyone who heard the latter group last week. The BSO program, conducted by William Steinberg, featured another great Bruckner symphony, No. 8 in C Minor. Odious as it is to say it, the visitors made by far the stronger impression in this composer's music.

Doubtless, the BSO players are stronger as individuals, but as a collective ensemble they don't often show the kind of spirit and personality that was evident in the playing of the Viennese. Doubtless, too, the difference between the two orchestras is largely a matter of the difference between the conducting of Steinberg and that of Krips.

Krips is very alert to what is happening at every point. His signals are clear, he cues nearly every entry and he constantly indicates balances, degree of vibrato, etc. — all of which may seem overly fussy. The fact is, however, that it produces excellent results, for he combines attentiveness to detail with a wonderfully fresh and poetic feeling for the music. The "Jupiter," for example, came across not as the tough, sinewy work so many conductors make of it, but as something marvelously warm and lyrical.

KRIPS' READING of the Bruckner was beautifully detailed. For this listener, his rubato and his handling of ritards were not always convincing, but these were the only points upon which he could be faulted. His control of overall structure was masterful so that in each movement climaxes arrived with stunning effect. He succeeded, too, in projecting the sense of awe and mystery that lies at the heart of so much of Bruckner's music.

For the record, it should be noted that in the Adagio, Krips opte to use the famous cymbal clash that has been the subject of so much musicological controversy.

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

MAR 2 1972 New Englan Newscl

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

MAR 2 1972 New Engla Newsc

Symphony Orchestra Concerts, March 3-4

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and guest conductor Leon Kirchner will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the seventeenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, March 3 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, March 4 at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is violinist Zino Francescatti. The concert begins with Mr. Kirchner conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony of his Music for orchestra written in 1969. Mr. Steinberg next conducts a performance of Brahms' Violin concerto with soloist Zino Francescatti, and, following intermission, Mr. Steinberg concludes the concert with Verdi's Quartet in E-minor for strings.

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 28 1972 New England Newscl

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

FEB 23 1972 New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 10,200

MAR 2 1972 Ne Engl News

BSO to play this weekend

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and guest conductor Leon Kirchner conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 17th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, March 3, at 2 and Saturday evening, at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is violinist Zino Francescatti. The concert begins with Kirchner conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony of his Music for orchestra written in 1969.

Steinberg next conducts a performance of Brahms' Violin concerto with soloist Zino Francescatti, and, following intermission, Steinberg concludes the concert with Verdi's Quartet in E-minor for strings.

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Orchestra concerts set Feb. 24, 25

BOSTON — William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in works by Liszt and Bruckner in the second Thursday B concert, Feb. 24 at 8:30 p.m. and the sixteenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Friday, Feb. 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Feb. 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The concert begins with the Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat, Nicole Henriot, soloist. After intermission, Steinberg conducts the Orchestra in the Bruckner Symphony no. 8 in C Minor.

Nicole Henriot, who first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1949, was born in Paris. She started to learn the piano at the age of seven, then entered the Paris Conservatoire at an early age, and later studied with Marguerite Long. Nicole Henriot made her debut as soloist with the Pasdeloup Orchestra in Paris at the age of 15, and was soon engaged by other leading French and Belgian orchestras. She continued her career during the second world war and after the war was decorated with the medal of the Commandos d'Afrique, an unusual honor for a civilian.

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and guest conductor Leon Kirchner conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this afternoon March 3, 1972 at 2 p.m. and Tomorrow evening, March 4 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is violinist Zino Francescatti. The concert begins with Mr. Kirchner conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony of his Music for orchestras written in 1969. Mr. Steinberg next conducts a performance of Brahms' Violin concerto with soloist Zino Francescatti, and, following intermission, Mr. Steinberg concludes the concert with Verdi's Quartet in E-minor for strings.

Leon Kirchner, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in past seasons both as conductor of his Toccata and Sinfonia, and as soloist in his Piano concerto no. 1, was born in Brooklyn, New York of both German and Russian descent. When he was a boy, his family moved west to Los Angeles, Kirchner began studying piano and composition, the latter with Ernest Toch, and Arnold Schoenberg. He received his BA from the University of California at Berkley in 1940, and two years later was awarded the George Ladd Travelling Fellowship, the highest honor given in music at the University. He studied for a short time with Roger Sessions, then joined the Army Signal Corps. In 1946 Leon Kirchner returned to Berkley to teach at the University, and after a period of working with the help of two Guggenheim Fellowships, he joined the faculty of the University of Southern California and Mills College in Oakland. In 1961 he moved to Cambridge, Massachusetts to succeed Walter Piston as Professor of Music at Harvard University, where, six years ago, he became the Walter Bigelow Rosen Professor of Music. Music for orchestras was written on commission from the New York Philharmonic in celebration of its 125th Anniversary Season. The score was completed on October 7, 1969, and the world premiere conducted by the composer, was given at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, nine days later on October 16.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston symphony plans concerts

BOSTON — William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and guest conductor Leon Kirchner conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the seventeenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, March 4, at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is violinist Zino Francescatti. The concert begins with Kirchner conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony of his Music for orchestra written in 1969. Steinberg next conducts a performance of Brahms' Violin concerto with soloist Zino Francescatti, and following intermission, Steinberg concludes the concert with Verdi's Quartet in E-minor for strings.

Kirchner, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in past seasons both as conductor of his Toccata and Sinfonia, and as soloist in his Piano concerto no. 1, was born in Brooklyn, N.Y. of both German and Russian descent. When he was a boy, his family moved west to Los Angeles. Kirchner began studying piano and composition, the latter with Ernst Toch, and Arnold Schoenberg. He received his BA from the University of California in 1940, and two years later was awarded the George Ladd Travelling Fellowship, the highest honor given in music at the University. He studied for a short time with Roger Sessions, then joined the Army Signal Corps.

In 1946 Kirchner returned to Berkley to teach at the University, and after a period of working with the help of two Guggenheim Fellowships, he joined the faculty of the University of Southern California and Mills College in Oakland.

In 1961 he moved to Cambridge to succeed Walter Piston as professor of music at Harvard University, where, six years ago, he became the Walter Bigelow Rosen Professor of Music. Music for orchestra was written on commission from the New York Philharmonic in celebration of its 125th Anniversary Season. The score was completed on Oct. 7, 1969, and the world permiere, conducted by the composer, was given at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, nine days later on Oct. 16.

The fifth Open Rehearsal of the 1971-1972 season takes place Thursday evening, March 2, at 7:30 p.m. Steinberg conducts the orchestra. All seats are unreserved at $3. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

[130]

NEWS
AMESBURY, MASS.
W. 4,400

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSIC DIRECTOR William Steinberg and guest conductor Leon Kirchner both to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday, March 3, 2 p.m., and Saturday, March 4, 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Boston. Concert includes music of Kirchner, Brahms and Verdi. Orchestra's Open Rehearsal on Thursday evening, March 2, 7:30 p.m. Soloist violinist Zino Francescatti. All seats unreserved at $3.00 each.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,900

MAR 3 1972 New England Newsclip

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .

Lillian

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

QUODLIBET

Kirchner plumbs music reservoir

By Ellen Pfeifer, Globe Staff

Leon Kirchner hates to write or talk program notes and so declined to tell me anything about his "Music for Orchestra," commissioned by the New York Philharmonic in 1969 which the BSO will play (and he will conduct) this weekend.

He was, however, happy to talk about the context in which the piece was written and, in a really dazzling display of non-stop eloquence proceeded to analyze the contemporary music scene, finishing up with some well-pointed jabs at critics.

The problem in the last decades, the post-Schoenberg Webern era is that "music has not been heard but constructed," Kirchner commented during a conversation Monday in his Cambridge home. Developers of the serial technique were building "more problematic, more substantive works that were very informative in the relationships and juxtaposition of numbers," but without recourse to their "aural reservoirs." Composers were reviving "the old secret alchemy in the juxtaposition of numbers," but much of their music was "a horrendous, profound bore."

"Aleatoric music was a reaction to this," the composer continued, "but the same thing happened in reverse."

Dullness prevailed in much electronic music as well, Kirchner said, because "composers were not applying shaping processes (necessary for a marvelous gestalt) to electronic sounds.

"Some people were working on bathtub and plumbing sounds, which instead of being new, were really very old in terms of plumbing."

One of the healthiest trends, then, was the return to sensuality displayed in works of some of the Poles and Elliott Carter, and, one assumes, Kirchner's works. "They took the opportunity to explore reservoirs of the orchestra not explored before."

Perhaps because of the constructivist nature of post-Schoenbergian music and the dependence on old music to fill concert programs, "music is in a very delicate condition," Kirchner said. "There is a greater superficiality of relationship between composer and listener now than in the time of, say, Mozart or Beethoven.

"There was a possibility of infinite failure for a new work," Kirchner said," that no longer exists." And newspapers are fundamental in the destruction of new music.

"It may have been all right for Berlioz to be panned in Paris because he could go to Germany where no one had read the criticism. Now, if a composer is a failure in New York, every conductor in the country has a copy of the review on his desk the next day."

Opens U.S. Tour

Viennese Concert In Boston

By HARRY NEVILLE

A beautiful program beautifully played was what the Vienna Symphony provided Friday night in Symphony Hall on the first stop of the orchestra's current U.S. tour. Joseph Krips led the visiting Austrians in two great masterworks of the repertory, Mozart's 41st ("Jupiter") and Bruckner's Seventh symphonies, both of which got the kind of vibrant, affectionate performances we like to think of as "Viennese."

The pairings was ideal, for these works inhabit vastly different, yet complementary worlds. If the Bruckner received the better performance, it should be understood that "better" in this case means very good as opposed to good. In both cases the playing gave satisfaction of a kind that is — sad to say — unuaual in Symphony Hall nowadays.

COMPARISON of the Vienna players with the BSO was inevitable for anyone who heard the latter group last week. The BSO program, conducted by William Steinberg, featured another great Bruckner symphony, No. 8 in C Minor. Odious as it is to say it, the visitors made by far the stronger impression in this composer's music.

Doubtless, the BSO players are stronger as individuals, but as a collective ensemble they don't often show the kind of spirit and personality that was evident in the playing of the Viennese. Doubtless, too, the difference between the two orchestras is largely a matter of the difference between the conducting of Steinberg and that of Krips.

Krips is very alert to what is happening at every point. His signals are clear, he cues nearly every entry and he constantly indicates balances, degree of vibrato, etc. — all of which may seem overly fussy. The fact is, however, that it produces excellent results, for he combines attentiveness to detail with a wonderfully fresh and poetic feeling for the music. The "Jupiter," for example, came across not as the tough, sinewy work so many conductors make of it, but as something marvelously warm and lyrical.

KRIPS' READING of the Bruckner was beautifully detailed. For this listener, his rubato and his handling of ritards were not always convincing, but these were the only points upon which he could be faulted. His control of overall structure was masterful so that in each movement climaxes arrived with stunning effect. He succeeded, too, in projecting the sense of awe and mystery that lies at the heart of so much of Bruckner's music.

For the record, it should be noted that in the Adagio, Krips opte to use the famous cymbal clash that has been the subject of so much musicological controversy.

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

MAR 2 1972 New England Newscl

Symphony Orchestra Concerts, March 3-4

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and guest conductor Leon Kirchner will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the seventeenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, March 3 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, March 4 at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is violinist Zino Francescatti. The concert begins with Mr. Kirchner conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony of his Music for orchestra written in 1969. Mr. Steinberg next conducts a performance of Brahms' Violin concerto with soloist Zino Francescatti, and, following intermission, Mr. Steinberg concludes the concert with Verdi's Quartet in E-minor for strings.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

MAR 2 1972 New Engla Newsc

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,35

THE BOSTON HERALD Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 280,961

FEB 28 1972 New England Newsci

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

FEB 23 1972 New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 10,200

MAR 2 1972 Ne Engl News

BSO to play this weekend

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and guest conductor Leon Kirchner conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 17th pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, March 3, at 2 and Saturday evening, at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is violinist Zino Francescatti. The concert begins with Kirchner conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony of his Music for orchestra written in 1969.

Steinberg next conducts a performance of Brahms' Violin concerto with soloist Zino Francescatti, and, following intermission, Steinberg concludes the concert with Verdi's Quartet in E-minor for strings.

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Orchestra concerts set Feb. 24, 25

BOSTON — William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in works by Liszt and Bruckner in the second Thursday B concert, Feb. 24 at 8:30 p.m. and the sixteenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Friday, Feb. 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Feb. 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The concert begins with the Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat, Nicole Henriot, soloist. After intermission, Steinberg conducts the Orchestra in the Bruckner Symphony no. 8 in C minor.

Nicole Henriot, who first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1949, was born in Paris. She started to learn the piano at the age of seven, then entered the Paris Conservatoire at an early age, and later studied with Marguerite Long. Nicole Henriot made her debut as soloist with the Pasdeloup Orchestra in Paris at the age of 15, and was soon engaged by other leading French and Belgian orchestras. She continued her career during the second world war and after the war was decorated with the medal of the Commandos d'Afrique, an unusual honor for a civilian.

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and guest conductor Leon Kirchner conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this afternoon March 3, 1972 at 2 p.m. and Tomorrow evening, March 4 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is violinist Zino Francescatti. The concert begins with Mr. Kirchner conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony of his Music for orchestras written in 1969. Mr. Steinberg next conducts a performance of Brahms' Violin concerto with soloist Zino Francescatti, and, following intermission, Mr. Steinberg concludes the concert with Verdi's Quartet in E-minor for strings.

Leon Kirchner, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in past seasons both as conductor of his Toccata and Sinfonia, and as soloist in his Piano concerto no. 1, was born in Brooklyn, New York of both German and Russian descent. When he was a boy, his family moved west to Los Angeles, Kirchner began studying piano and composition, the latter with Ernest Toch, and Arnold Schoenberg. He received his BA from the University of California at Berkley in 1940, and two years later was awarded the George Ladd Travelling Fellowship, the highest honor given in music at the University. He studied for a short time with Roger Sessions, then joined the Army Signal Corps. In 1946 Leon Kirchner returned to Berkley to teach at the University, and after a period of working with the help of two Guggenheim Fellowships, he joined the faculty of the University of Southern California and Mills College in Oakland. In 1961 he moved to Cambridge, Massachusetts to succeed Walter Piston as Professor of Music at Harvard University, where, six years ago, he became the Walter Bigelow Rosen Professor of Music. Music for orchestras was written on commission from the New York Philharmonic in celebration of its 125th Anniversary Season. The score was completed on October 7, 1969, and the world premiere conducted by the composer, was given at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, nine days later on October 16.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston symphony plans concerts

BOSTON — William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and guest conductor Leon Kirchner conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the seventeenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, March 4, at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is violinist Zino Francescatti. The concert begins with Kirchner conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony of his Music for orchestra written in 1969. Steinberg next conducts a performance of Brahms' Violin concerto with soloist Zino Francescatti, and following intermission, Steinberg concludes the concert with Verdi's Quartet in E-minor for strings.

Kirchner, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony in past seasons both as conductor of his Toccata and Sinfonia, and as soloist in his Piano concerto no. 1, was born in Brooklyn, N.Y. of both German and Russian descent. When he was a boy, his family moved west to Los Angeles. Kirchner began studying piano and composition, the latter with Ernst Toch, and Arnold Schoenberg. He received his BA from the University of California in 1940, and two years later was awarded the George Ladd Travelling Fellowship, the highest honor given in music at the University. He studied for a short time with Roger Sessions, then joined the Army Signal Corps.

In 1946 Kirchner returned to Berkley to teach at the University, and after a period of working with the help of two Guggenheim Fellowships, he joined the faculty of the University of Southern California and Mills College in Oakland.

In 1961 he moved to Cambridge to succeed Walter Piston as professor of music at Harvard University, where, six years ago, he became the Walter Bigelow Rosen Professor of Music. Music for orchestra was written on commission from the New York Philharmonic in celebration of its 125th Anniversary Season. The score was completed on Oct. 7, 1969, and the world permiere, conducted by the composer, was given at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, nine days later on Oct. 16.

The fifth Open Rehearsal of the 1971-1972 season takes place Thursday evening, March 2, at 7:30 p.m. Steinberg conducts the orchestra. All seats are unreserved at $3. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

[130]

NEWS
AMESBURY, MASS.
W. 4,400

MAR 3 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSIC DIRECTOR William Steinberg and guest conductor Leon Kirchner both to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday, March 3, 2 p.m., and Saturday, March 4, 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Boston. Concert includes music of Kirchner, Brahms and Verdi. Orchestra's Open Rehearsal on Thursday evening, March 2, 7:30 p.m. Soloist violinist Zino Francescatti. All seats unreserved at $3.00 each.

POST GAZETTE (ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.

MAR 3 1972 New England Newsclip

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .

Lillian

The Boston Globe (MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

QUODLIBET

Kirchner plumbs music reservoir

By Ellen Pfeifer, Globe Staff

Leon Kirchner hates to write or talk program notes and so declined to tell me anything about his "Music for Orchestra," commissioned by the New York Philharmonic in 1969 which the BSO will play (and he will conduct) this weekend.

He was, however, happy to talk about the context in which the piece was written and, in a really dazzling display of non-stop eloquence proceeded to analyze the contemporary music scene, finishing up with some well-pointed jabs at critics.

The problem in the last decades, the post-Schoenberg Webern era is that "music has not been heard but constructed," Kirchner commented during a conversation Monday in his Cambridge home. Developers of the serial technique were building "more problematic, more substantive works that were very informative in the relationships and juxtaposition of numbers," but without recourse to their "aural reservoirs." Composers were reviving "the old secret alchemy in the juxtaposition of numbers," but much of their music was "a horrendous, profound bore."

"Aleatoric music was a reaction to this," the composer continued, "but the same thing happened in reverse."

Dullness prevailed in much electronic music as well, Kirchner said, because "composers were not applying shaping processes (necessary for a marvelous gestalt) to electronic sounds.

"Some people were working on bathtub and plumbing sounds, which instead of being new, were really very old in terms of plumbing."

One of the healthiest trends, then, was the return to sensuality displayed in works of some of the Poles and Elliott Carter, and, one assumes, Kirchner's works. "They took the opportunity to explore reservoirs of the orchestra not explored before."

Perhaps because of the constructivist nature of post-Schoenbergian music and the dependence on old music to fill concert programs, "music is in a very delicate condition," Kirchner said. "There is a greater superficiality of relationship between composer and listener now than in the time of, say, Mozart or Beethoven.

"There was a possibility of infinite failure for a new work," Kirchner said," that no longer exists." And newspapers are fundamental in the destruction of new music.

"It may have been all right for Berlioz to be panned in Paris because he could go to Germany where no one had read the criticism. Now, if a composer is a failure in New York, every conductor in the country has a copy of the review on his desk the next day."

FADED TEXT

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961
MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Leon Kirchner Leads BSO in 'Music for Orchestra'

By HARRY NEVILLE

Sharing conducting duties with William Steinberg yesterday in Symphony Hall was composer Leon Kirchner, who led the Boston Symphony in his own "Music for Orchestra." Written in 1969, the work was commissioned for the 125th anniversary season of the New York Philharmonic. Although yesterday's performance was the first by the BSO, it was not the work's local premiere. That honor fell to the Boston Philharmonia two seasons ago, when, in a concert also led by Kirchner, it played "Music for Orchestra" in a version for reduced orchestra.

For this listener, yesterday's performance made a far stronger impression than the earlier one, not only because the playing was technically and musically superior but also because the work seems to need the resources of the full orchestra for which it was originally conceived.

IN ADDITION to strings and three, sometimes four, representatives from each wind family, the scoring calls for an elaborate assemblage of percussion instruments: glass wind chimes, tubular bells, high tom-tom, temple blocks, antique cymbals and bongo, as well numerous more conventional percussion instruments.

The work, however, is not nearly so exotic-sounding as one might suppose from a description of the instrumentation. For one thing, Kirchner doesn't put the instruments to any terribly far-out use. For another, he tempers even his most complex and "advanced" musical thoughts by frequent use of a traditional kind of expressiveness—opulent timbral effects, for example, and warm, lyrical melodies. Thus, a brief episode that seemed to involve aleatory techniques suggested not chaos but something intensely poetic.

KIRCHNER WROTE his own program note, which—perhaps wisely—included not an iota of information about "Music for Orchestra." In part it was a plea for greater sensuality in contemporary music, a goal so handsomely realized in Kirchner's work as to make explication and technical comment unnecessary.

Zino Francescatti was the soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto. Though plagued by intonation problems, he gave an affectionate silvery-toned performance that won him an ovation from the audience and from the orchestra. Steinberg got rather dull and imprecise work from the players in the Brahms, but he led a sparkling performance of the concluding work, Verdi's String Quartet in E Minor.

This was played in an arrangement for the full string section, including double-basses. The practice apparently had Verdi's sanction, and no wonder, for the effect is marvelously rich—much like the sound Tchaikovsky achieves in his Serenade for Strings.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377
MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Kirchner leads his own work

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The composer Leon Kirchner was invited to be guest conductor for the small part in yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, where he led a performance of the "Music for Orchestra" which he wrote in 1969.

I missed the performance Kirchner led with the Boston Philharmonia in Cambridge a couple of years ago, but I do remember not liking "Music for Orchestra" in New York, finding it tired, conventional, and particularly lacking rhythm. I don't know whether it is because I have changed since 1969 or if the performance here was more convincing, but on this go-around I enjoyed the piece.

There are still features to it that don't convince me. The percussion curtain, sometimes seems very thick, and the quick, loud music that interrupts the quiet opening is a very ordinary hubbub. That opening itself is beautiful, a series of expressive woodwind solos in slow, short phrases, which return as duets just before the final upward rush and bang.

Just past the middle, there is a collective cadenza for winds, not strictly written but, punctuated by choked rasps from the strings, which was played with enough tension and timed so skillfully by the conductor that it produced an effective and dramatic climax.

Kirchner produced an effective performance with the orchestra, whose engagement showed in its playing as well as in its applause for Kirchner. And the audience liked it too — astonishingly so, given the combination of Friday afternoon and a piece which, even though nearer the constructive end of the spectrum, sounds unmistakably like "modern music."

More surprisingly perhaps, Verdi's String Quartet, with William Steinberg conducting the full Boston Symphony string section, sent the ladies out in droves between movements.

Verdi wrote it to pass the time while waiting for his favorite soprano, Teresa Stolz, to recover from an illness so that the Naples production of "Aida" could proceed. He did not take his quartet seriously, but it is both elegant and engaging, speaking mostly the language of "Aida."

Often, too, in its lightness and speed, it looks ahead 15 years and more to "Falstaff." The Falstaffian fugal scherzo-finale was pretty much of a blur; otherwise the performance had spirit.

The program also included the Brahms Violin Concerto, Zino Francescatti soloist and Steinberg conducting.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,503 SUN. 867,810
MAR 3 1972

Orchestras Must Look To Youth

More involvement of young people both in planning symphonic repertoire and in fund-raising was advocated by Mrs. Frances Fahnestock, a member of the boards of trustees and overseers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, here Thursday.

"We need a completely new outlook. We are too fixed in our ideas," Mrs. Fahnestock told the Philadelphia Orchestra women's committees, launching the 1972 membership campaign at the Academy of Music ballroom.

She also asked for more governmental aid for the arts.

"President Nixon is asking for $39 million next year," she noted. "What we need is $200 million for all the arts.

"Lincoln Center received $18 million from New York. The Yankee Stadium got more than that when the teams threatened to move away."

The speaker said Boston and Philadelphia were much alike in their cities, orchestras, audiences — and deficits.

"There has been tremendous rivalry, but always a friendly rivalry," she said.

"Our first-chair men are conceited prima donnas — a pain in the neck to conductors and themselves," she added. "But Joseph de Pasquale (violist who came here from Boston) was one of the least troublesome."

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988
MAR 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Kirchner Conducts Own Work

By JOHN RICHARDSON

Contemporary music occupies a [illegible] position in today's musical scene. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, new music filled the majority of concerts: new pieces by Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, and co. were eagerly awaited and often hotly debated. New music today, however, has a difficult time [illegible] heard at [illegible] was therefore [illegible] great all, let alone appreciated. It pleasure to hear a major recent work at Friday's Boston Symphony concert, Music for Orchestra, by Harvard Leon Kirchner.

Music for Orchestra demonstrates Mr. Kirchner's strong feeling for his historical antecedents as well as his immediate environment. He has taken techniques as varied as Schoenbergian lyricism and avant-garde improvisation and synthesized them into a consistent musical language very much his own.

There are several striking moments in the piece. Particularly impressive was the lyrical opening for solo woodwinds that sets the mood for much of the work. Also impressive was a marvelous section of semi-improvisational woodwind ostinato, punctuated by stark string chords (almost recitative-like), brass and percussion. All in all, the product of a remarkable musical intelligence and sensitivity. Mr. Kirchner's conducting of his own work drew excellent playing from the orchestra.

★

The rest of the concert was conducted by William Steinberg and included the Brahms Violin Concerto and an arrangement for full strings of the Verdi string quartet. Zino Francescatti was the soloist in the Brahms. He played with his usual pizzazz and was warmly applauded by orchestra and audience.

FADED TEXT

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Leon Kirchner Leads BSO in 'Music for Orchestra'

By HARRY NEVILLE

Sharing conducting duties with William Steinberg yesterday in Symphony Hall was composer Leon Kirchner, who led the Boston Symphony in his own "Music for Orchestra." Written in 1969, the work was commissioned for the 125th anniversary season of the New York Philharmonic. Although yesterday's performance was the first by the BSO, it was not the work's local premiere. That honor fell to the Boston Philharmonia two seasons ago, when, in a concert also led by Kirchner, it played "Music for Orchestra" in a version for reduced orchestra.

For this listener, yesterday's performance made a far stronger impression than the earlier one, not only because the playing was technically and musically superior but also because the work seems to need the resources of the full orchestra for which it was originally conceived.

IN ADDITION to strings and three, sometimes four, representatives from each wind family, the scoring calls for an elaborate assemblage of percussion instruments: glass wind chimes, tubular bells, high tom-tom, temple blocks, antique cymbals and bongo, as well numerous more conventional percussion instruments.

The work, however, is not nearly so exotic-sounding as one might suppose from a description of the instrumentation. For one thing, Kirchner doesn't put the instruments to any terribly far-out use. For another, he tempers even his most complex and "advanced" musical thoughts by frequent use of a traditional kind of expressiveness—opulent timbral effects, for example, and warm, lyrical melodies. Thus, a brief episode that seemed to involve aleatory techniques suggested not chaos but something intensely poetic.

KIRCHNER WROTE his own program note, which—perhaps wisely—included not an iota of information about "Music for Orchestra." In part it was a plea for greater sensuality in contemporary music, a goal so handsomely realized in Kirchner's work as to make explication and technical comment unnecessary.

Zino Francescatti was the soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto. Though plagued by intonation problems, he gave an affectionate silvery-toned performance that won him an ovation from the audience and from the orchestra. Steinberg got rather dull and imprecise work from the players in the Brahms, but he led a sparkling performance of the concluding work, Verdi's String Quartet in E Minor.

This was played in an arrangement for the full string section, including double-basses. The practice apparently had Verdi's sanction, and no wonder, for the effect is marvelously rich—much like the sound Tchaikovsky achieves in his Serenade for Strings.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,503 SUN. 867,810

MAR 3 1972

Orchestras Must Look To Youth

More involvement of young people both in planning symphonic repertoire and in fund-raising was advocated by Mrs. Frances Fahnestock, a member of the boards of trustees and overseers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, here Thursday.

"We need a completely new outlook. We are too fixed in our ideas," Mrs. Fahnestock told the Philadelphia Orchestra women's committees, launching the 1972 membership campaign at the Academy of Music ballroom.

She also asked for more governmental aid for the arts.

"President Nixon is asking for $39 million next year," she noted. "What we need is $200 million for all the arts.

"Lincoln Center received $18 million from New York. The Yankee Stadium got more than that when the teams threatened to move away."

The speaker said Boston and Philadelphia were much alike in their cities, orchestras, audiences — and deficits.

"There has been tremendous rivalry, but always a friendly rivalry," she said.

"Our first-chair men are conceited prima donnas — a pain in the neck to conductors and themselves," she added. "But Joseph de Pasquale (violist who came here from Boston) was one of the least troublesome."

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

Kirchner leads his own work

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The composer Leon Kirchner was invited to be guest conductor for the small part in yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, where he led a performance of the "Music for Orchestra" which he wrote in 1969.

I missed the performance Kirchner led with the Boston Philharmonia in Cambridge a couple of years ago, but I do remember not liking "Music for Orchestra" in New York, finding it tired, conventional, and particularly lacking rhythm. I don't know whether it is because I have changed since 1969 or if the performance here was more convincing, but on this go-around I enjoyed the piece.

There are still features to it that don't convince me. The percussion curtain, sometimes seems very thick, and the quick, loud music that interrupts the quiet opening is a very ordinary hubbub. That opening itself is beautiful, a series of expressive woodwind solos in slow, short phrases, which return as duets just before the final upward rush and bang.

Just past the middle, there is a collective cadenza for winds, not strictly written but, punctuated by choked rasps from the strings, which was played with enough tension and timed so skillfully by the conductor that it produced an effective and dramatic climax.

Kirchner produced an effective performance with the orchestra, whose engagement showed in its playing as well as in its applause for Kirchner. And the audience liked it too — astonishingly so, given the combination of Friday afternoon and a piece which, even though nearer the constructive end of the spectrum, sounds unmistakably like "modern music."

More surprisingly perhaps, Verdi's String Quartet, with William Steinberg conducting the full Boston Symphony string section, sent the ladies out in droves between movements.

Verdi wrote it to pass the time while waiting for his favorite soprano, Teresa Stolz, to recover from an illness so that the Naples production of "Aida" could proceed. He did not take his quartet seriously, but it is both elegant and engaging, speaking mostly the language of "Aida."

Often, too, in its lightness and speed, it looks ahead 15 years and more to "Falstaff." The Falstaffian fugal scherzo-finale was pretty much of a blur; otherwise the performance had spirit.

The program also included the Brahms Violin Concerto, Zino Francescatti soloist and Steinberg conducting.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988

MAR 5 1972 New England Newsclip

Kirchner Conducts Own Work

By JOHN RICHARDSON

Contemporary music occupies a [illegible] position in today's musical scene. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, new music filled the majority of concerts: new pieces by Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, and co. were eagerly awaited and often hotly debated. Now music today, however, has a difficult time getting heard at all, let alone appreciated. It was therefore a great pleasure to hear a major recent work at Friday's Boston Symphony concert, Music for Orchestra, by Harvard's Leon Kirchner.

Music for Orchestra demonstrates Mr. Kirchner's strong feeling for his historical antecedents as well as his immediate environment. He has taken techniques as varied as Schoenbergian lyricism and avant-garde improvisations and synthesized them into a consistent musical language very much his own.

There are several striking moments in the piece. Particularly impressive was the lyrical opening for solo woodwinds that sets the mood for much of the work. Also impressive was a marvelous section of semi-improvisational woodwind ostinato, punctuated by stark string chords (almost recitative-like), brass and percussion. All in all, the product of a remarkable musical intelligence and sensitivity. Mr. Kirchner's conducting of his own work drew excellent playing from the orchestra.

★

The rest of the concert was conducted by William Steinberg and included the Brahms Violin Concerto and an arrangement for full strings of the Verdi string quartet. Zino Francescatti was the soloist in the Brahms. He played with his usual pizzazz and was warmly applauded by orchestra and audience.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony

Kirchner's frenzy of flutes, a Brahms battle royal, and Verdi's non-opera

By Louis Snyder

There has always been murmuring among concertgoers about the necessity for enduring some bitter (new music) to be allowed some sweet (tried and true numbers) in their concert fare.

Surprise! In its weekend concerts under William Steinberg, the Boston Symphony came up with a program that was, above all, "sweet," or rather eminently listenable, even though it included a piece completed in 1969, and another never really intended for performance by an orchestra at all.

The newest composition came first — Leon Kirchner's "Music for Orchestra" with its Harvard-based composer conducting. This was a first performance by the BSO, although Mr. Kirchner had made a special arrangement of it for the Boston Philharmonia to play two years ago in Cambridge. It was commissioned by the New York Philharmonic which gave its world premiere, with the composer directing, in 1969.

With the large-scale forces of the Boston Symphony, the work fulfilled possibilities only hinted at in its previous hearing across the river in 1970. For "Music for Orchestra" is indeed that — a compactly shaped, wonderfully sonorous vehicle for both traditionally based and unconventional sounds in all choirs. It is strongly textured, and it oscillates through the orchestra with unpredictable degrees of emphasis, producing contrasts at once surprising and pleasing. Near its end, there is a passage for winds — a frenzy of flutes, if you will — which puts the icing on this impressive and palatable cake. On Friday afternoon, the audience loved it, demonstrating loudly in its favor, in pride of its composer-conductor, and of a bravura performance by the musicians.

Composer-conductor

Harvard's Leon Kirchner filled both roles when he directed his "Music for Orchestra" in its first performances by the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 3 and 4, at Symphony Hall.

Return of a favorite

Zino Francescatti was the soloist and Mr. Steinberg was on the podium for the Brahms Violin Concerto in D, which hasn't been programmed here for five years. It is, of course, an invigorating musical battle royal, to hear, watch, and undoubtedly to perform — with the virtuosic skills of the solo violin opposed to those of the massed body of musicians. Gone now, however, are the concerns mentioned in program notes about its being "against the violin" (Hans von Bülow's estimate), or its first exponent Joseph Joachim's "getting hot fingers playing it," or even the picture of a tardy Brahms conducting the Leipzig premiere with his shirt-tail flying.

The Concerto in D is well established for its wealth of rich thematic material, the dazzling opportunities for the soloist (met with predictable artistry by the evergreen Mr. Francescatti), and such added beauties as the Adagio's opening oboe solo (hauntingly played by Ralph Gomberg). Its reception again indicated tremendous listener satisfaction with music and performers. And incidentally it was interesting to note the rapt observation orchestral string players gave Mr. Francescatti's technical feats during cadenzas and solo passages. A frequent guest with the BSO since 1944, he is justly regarded as a mentor as well.

Verdi's non-opera

Having "spare time in Naples" in 1873, Giuseppe Verdi wrote a Quartet in E minor for Strings, his only chamber music or, in its adaptation, orchestral work. This arrangement for string orchestra, with an effective and difficult part for doublebasses added by Mr. Steinberg, had its first BSO performance as the weekend program's second half. Its four movements, in classic style, are laced with Verdian melody, unfettered and unashamed, and one can, of course, hear wisps of familiar phrases past and to come.

This does not mean that the Quartet, in this context, is merely a composer's exercise — marking time for future projects. In itself it has the color and vivid tonal life that vivifies Verdi's dramatic works, and if his ever-vital vocal line is missing, one can almost indulge in the mental pleasure of supplying it himself. While the Quartet is hardly a major work, it is unique in the composer's output, and in the string-orchestral form that he himself sanctioned, provided a suitable finale to a diversified program that engaged, if it did not tax, the listener.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 500,118 SUN. 657,560

MAR 12 1972

Acoustics: Science or Art?

By Alan M. Kriegsman

A visit to Boston last weekend reminded me that when it comes to musical acoustics, modern technology and engineering have accustomed us to settling for less.

These days, one looks forward to the opening of a new hall with a certain amount of well-founded dread. The multi-million dollar disaster at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall is only one of many instances over the past decade of acoustical "science" running amok. The cultural edifice explosion has resulted in an unfortunate number of huge, all-purpose auditoriums afflicted with similar kinds of drawbacks—screechy treble, brittle tone, undernourished bass response, fuzzy super-resonance.

It's possible that the hi-fi mania of the same era has been partly responsible for the blunders, by propagating a sonic ideal based on electronic reproduction, rather than live performance. Whatever the cause, the statistics of acoustical failure have resulted in a kind of backlash, a return to the concept of acoustics as an art, as dependent on intuition as on calculation.

The Kennedy Center Concert Hall is a case in point. Its designers decided to trust to the insights of the past, of experience, as much as to the canons of contemporary engineering. They therefore took as models some of the great halls of the symphonic tradition, including Boston's Symphony Hall, long acknowledged as one of the finest in the world.

"To match the Kennedy Center hall against its paradigm in Boston is to see how remote from perfection it nevertheless remains."

The outcome has been hailed in most quarters as a thumping success, and, in general, I would agree. The hall's acoustics are clear, lively, well-balanced, and reasonably uniform throughout the house.

The success seems all the more pronounced if one is thinking of, say, Philharmonic Hall as a yardstick. But to match the Kennedy Center hall against its paradigm in Boston is to see how remote from perfection it nevertheless remains. The Kennedy hall is better than acceptable, certainly, perhaps even better than good. But its virtues are mostly of a neutral sort—it doesn't distort, it doesn't have annoying peaks or gaps, it doesn't muddy up orchestral textures. On the whole, however, I find the sound rather on the cool side, and somewhat less than flattering to some solo instruments—piano, for example.

By contrast, one wouldn't blush to call the Symphony Hall acoustics magnificent. It had been over 25 years since I last heard anything there, and the experience had the force of revelation. Symphony Hall doesn't merely transmit orchestral sound faithfully and agreeably, it buffs and lacquers and smooths and illuminates it into a glorious radiance.

The sound is so rich, plangent and warm it almost courts the danger of being a distraction from the music. It's almost impossible to imagine anything sounding bad in this hall, so effective is its cosmetic power.

Yes, of course, it helps to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the medium of performance. Over the years, and despite changes in personnel and directorship, the celebrated ensemble seems to have molded and maintained its own sonority in the image of the hall, with its velvety surfaces, warm, mahogany textures and orotund bass. But it's not just the orchestra, as listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra these days in any other hall quickly proves. And the particular program I heard last week, an indifferent affair by the orchestra's usual standards, only confirmed the point. The music-making may have been middling, but the sheer sound was intoxicating all the same.

The opening work was "Music for Orchestra" (1969) by Leon Kirchner, who, at 53, has the status of an esteemed elder statesman among American composers, and with justice. The composer himself conducted a forthright performance of his characteristically intricate, rugged, thoughtfully structured piece. Typical, too, is the amalgam of old-fashioned logic and continuity with new-fangled sound and harmonic principle. A complex instrumental dialogue and inventive sonority are the work's most attractive features. In toto, however, it seems too busy and dense for its own expressive aims, like a cogent treatise overburdened with footnotes.

There followed a frustratingly uneven performance of the Brahms Violin Concerto with Zino Francescatti as soloist and William Steinberg conducting.

Francescatti, whom I've not heard in many years, wasn't in top form, but all the same his playing seemed human, gracious and, at times, fervent. Steinberg, though, had other ideas, and his stolid, square-jawed, unyielding approach all but smothered the soloist's lyric buoyancy.

The concert concluded after intermission with Steinberg conducting the orchestra in a blown-up version of Verdi's E Minor Quartet (with an added double-bass part), a prospect I didn't find inviting, so I left. Besides, having heard the Boston Symphony play Brahms —even in a disappointing interpretation—in this hall, I'd had enough ecstasy for one evening.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 3 1972

FWC to hear 'inside story'

What is it like to be a member of the world-famous Boston Symphony? What does it take in addition to the musicians, to run a major orchestra? What is it like to arrive in Ames, Iowa in the middle of March for a week of concerts? Many such questions will be answered for Faculty Women's Club members, Wednesday at 2 p.m. in Great Hall of Memorial Union.

One or more top personnel will give "The Inside Story," bits and pieces of information on how one of the great orchestras of the world operates. Special guests for the general assembly will be women members and wives of members of the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in Ames for performances in Stephens Auditorium from Wednesday March 8 through Monday March 13. Friday night the Boston "Pops" with "Doc" Severinsen will perform to a sell-out crowd in the Hilton Coliseum.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with William Steinberg as its musical director, calls Symphony Hall in Boston its home. Symphony Hall is a clasically proportioned turn-of-the-century building with acoustics unsurpassed in the world. The Orchestra performs there for seven months in the fall and winter when not on tour. In the spring the Boston Pops and Charles River Esplanade concerts are under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.

Tanglewood is the Orchestra's summer home, and there it maintains the world renowned Berkshire Music Center where young musicians from all over the world spend an intensive eight weeks of study and performance.

Records, radio, television, and tours throughout America, Europe and Asia have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the most widely known and best-loved orchestras in the world.

The program has been planned by Bible Literature division, Mrs. Richard A. Wilson chairman, and Spanish division, Mrs. LeRoy K. Albert chairman. Floor hostesses will be Mrs. L. F. Bradish, Mrs. George H. Gitz, Mrs. J. F. Hall, Mrs. H. Summerfield Day, and Mrs. Rodney Ingraham.

JANESVILLE, WIS.
GAZETTE
D. 26,000

MAR 4 1972

Boston Symphony Concert Tickets Going on Sale

MADISON—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's prestige orchestras, will make its first Madison appearance at the UW-Madison Pavilion Tuesday, March 7.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Union Theater-sponsored concert, and principal oboe player Ralph Gomberg will be the soloist.

The concert is one of 20 presented on tour across the nation this year.

Tickets are available at the Memorial Union Theater box office, 800 Langdon St., Madison, 53706.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA
NONPAREIL
D. 24,000 S. 24,500

MAR 5 1972

SW Iowa College Students To Sing With Boston Group

Nineteen Southwest Iowans attending Iowa State University in Ames will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it visits the ISU campus for a series of concerts this week.

The Iowa State Singers and the Oratorio Chorus will be featured with the orchestra in a concert at 3 p.m. Sunday, March 12, in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

The program will be the world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman, especially commissioned for the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

"Mail Order Madrigals," was written by Schuman especially for the Iowa State Singers under a grant from J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown. Schuman, considered one of America's foremost composers, is a Pullitzer Prize winner and served as president of the Juilliard School of Music for 17 years and pesident of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts in New York City for six years.

The composer and his wife will attend the premiere.

Under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at Iowa State, the Singers and Oratorio Chorus will perform two other Schuman compositions, "Prelude for Voices" and "Carols for Death."

The student groups will join with soloists Veronica Tyler and Robert Hale and the orchestra for the Brahms "Requiem," which will be sung in English. Miss Tyler a leading soprano with the New York City Opera was a soloist at Iowa State last May with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Hale is a bass-baritone with the New York City Opera.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct.

70 Students

The Iowa State singers is made up of 70 students selected from more than 700 who participate in choral activities at the university. The Oratorio Chorus is made up of 155 members.

Southwest Iowans in the Iowa State Singers include:

Francis V. Guinan Jr., 420 N. 25th St. in Council Bluffs, Christopher Frank of Griswold, Robert Boettger and Tom Heilesen of Harlan, Rozanne Meyer of Missouri Valley, Paul Werts of Red Oak, Chris O. Nelson of Stanton and Kyle Stewart of Woodbine.

Members of the Oratorio Chorus from Southwest Iowa include:

John F. Holt, Beckie L. Nelson and Celine T. Wedemeyer, all of Atlantic; Frederick C. Cook, 2400 S. 11th St., James R. Eilers, 708 Commercial, Salli A. Looft, 263 Zenith Drive and Blane H. Nansel, Route 1, all of Council Bluffs; Sally Peterson of Exira; Robert T. Blackman of Lewis; Gary Berchenbriter of Shenandoah and Daniel C. Lundgren of Stanton.

One Matinee

The March 12 choral concert will be the only matinee performance during the orchestra festival. Evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented Wednesday, Saturday and Monday, March 13, and the Boston Pops Orchestra will present Pops Night on Friday.

Pops Night is sold out but good seats are still available for the four symphony concerts.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 4 1972

To interview ISU Singers

The choral concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the subject of interviews on WOI radio and TV programs on Monday.

Doreas Speer will host W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at Iowa State University, and a student member of the Iowa State Singers on both programs.

The interview will be heard on "Conversation" at 9:05 a.m. on WOI-AM and will be shown on the "Today's Living" segment of the "Noon Report" on WOI-TV.

The 255 students in the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 3 p.m. March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival. The concert will include the world premiere of "Mail Order Madrigals," composed especially for Iowa State University by William Schuman, and the Brahams Requiem.

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 240,275 SUN. 674,302

MAR 5 1972

No visits by orchestras

The Boston Symphony, one of the world's great orchestras, will be playing in the Midwest this month. But not in Minneapolis, where it has made exactly two appearances since 1930. Instead, the 106 musicians will be performing in that culturally enlightened metropolis 200 miles to the south — Ames, Iowa, where Iowa State University each spring sponsors what it calls the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

This information was the essence of a good-sized display ad that ran in the Feb. 27 Tribune. According to the copy, the orchestra will give four concerts there over a period of six days. The Boston Pops appearance under Arthur Fiedler, the ad went on to state, is already a sellout.

This cultural phenomenon drew Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra for a similar period last spring, and the New York Philharmonic before that.

•

Isn't it a little odd that the University of Minnesota's Department of Concerts and Lectures has not seen fit over the past several years to book at least one of these superlative organizations into Northrop Auditorium, especially when each was so tantalizingly close to the Twin Cities?

Appearances by visiting symphonic ensembles have become a regular event in the cultural life of many U.S. cities — Ames, Iowa, included. Why can't it happen here, the so-called "cultural Athens" of America? This benighted center hasn't been privileged to hear a really major-league U.S. symphonic visitor since the Cleveland Orchestra played Northrop in 1966.—Bert F. Cunnington, Minneapolis.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 3 1972

The instrumental soloists

St. Louis, Mo., and Marseille, France, are the origins of the two instrumentalists who will appear here as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pianist Malcolm Frager, born in St. Louis 37 years ago, made his debut as soloist with the St. Louis Symphony when he was 10. He will be featured in the Saturday, March 11, concert.

Violin virtuoso Zino Francescatti, 71, whose fame has spread far beyond his native France, will be soloist for the final concert on Monday, March 13.

Frager graduated magna cum laude as a language major at Columbia University, but his musical career began when he was in grade school. His career soared during the 1959-60 season when he won the Leventritt Award in New York, first prize at the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Piano Competition in Brussels, was invited by President Eisenhower to play at the White House for the King and Queen of Denmark, and his debut with the New York Philharmonic under Leonard Bernstein.

In the years since, he has toured widely, including three months in the Soviet Union in 1963-64. During one season he participated in a special series of two-piano recitals with Vladimir Ashkenazy, who appeared here last spring with the Philadelphia Orchestra for the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Frager has performed frequently with the Boston Symphony, including seven consecutive seasons as soloist with the orchestra at Tanglewood.

Although Francescatti's parents were violinists of note and taught him to play the instrument with uncommon skill, they did not encourage him to undertake a career as a violinist. His father thought music alone was too precarious a livelihood and, besides, the Francescattis had been outstanding lawyers for generations. Young Zino began pre-law studies, but did not give up music.

After distinguishing himself in Europe, Francescatti made his U.S. debut in 1939, performing with the New York Philharmonic. He has made 60 appearances with the New York Philharmonic and 70 with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and almost annually tours the U.S. and Canada. He has recorded all the major violin concertos with such distinguished conductors as Dimitri Mitropoulos, Leonard Bernstein, George Szell, Eugene Ormandy and Bruno Walter.

Francescatti has given memorable performances with a fellow Frenchman who is a friend of long standing, pianist Robert Casadesus. For diversion, the violinist is a crossword puzzle addict, an enthusiastic chess player, and an avid reader.

ZINO FRANCESCATTI

MALCOLM FRAGER

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
MAR 7 1972
New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Sets Tour of Mid-West

The Boston Symphony Orchestra today opens its mid-western tour in Madison, Wis. under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas and ends in Chicago on March 18.

Thomas will conduct works of Stravinsky, Beethoven, Glinka and Borodin. From Madison, the Orchestra will travel to Ames, Iowa to take part in the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Five concerts will be performed in Ames, including one Boston Pops concert under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Both William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony in Ames.

From Ames, the Orchestra will travel to Ann Arbor, Mich. where William Steinberg will conduct works of Wagner, Hindemith and Brahms. Then on to Urbana, another first for the Boston Symphony, also under William Steinberg.

Then the Orchestra will travel to Chicago, where for the first time Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops will be heard. Jeffrey Siegel will be piano soloist with Fiedler. The Symphony concert in Chicago will be conducted by William Steinberg with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg performing the Ravel Piano concerto in G.

Soloists joining the tour include Zino Francescatti, violin, who will perform under Thomas in Ames; Malcolm Frager, piano, who will perform under Thomas in Urbana; Eileen Farrell, soprano, who will perform under Steinberg in Ames; Veronica Tyler, soprano and Robert Hale, baritone, who will perform under Steinberg in Ames; Doc Serverinsen, trumpet, who will perform with Fiedler in the Pops concert in Ames.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496
MAR 5 1972

Boston Symphony to Open Music Festival for Iowa

By Nick Baldwin

Although there has been no official proclamation, there is no doubt that this is music week for Iowa and the Midwest.

The Boston Symphony opens a music festival consisting of five concerts with an 8 p.m. performance in C. Y. Stephens Auditorium on the Iowa State University campus in Ames Wednesday.

William Steinberg conducts the opening performance and soprano Eileen Farrell is the featured soloist in an all-Wagner recital.

Festival Series

The Boston Symphony becomes the third internationally known orchestra to present a festival series at Iowa State University. Previous festivals have featured the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Opening night has been designated as Midwest Symphony Orchestra Night with invitations having been issued to orchestra conductors, managers and association presidents in the Midwest.

Besides the opening concert Wednesday, the Boston Symphony will be heard in concert at 8 p.m. Saturday, at 3 p.m. Sunday and at 8 p.m. Monday.

In addition, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra play Friday in ISU's huge Hilton Coliseum with trumpeter Doc Severinsen as featured soloist.

That performance has been sold out.

The Coliseum has 12,600 regular seats and an additional 1,400 persons will be seated at tables and chairs on the arena floor where refreshments will be served during the performance.

Tickets Available

Alvin R. Edgar, director of concerts at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium, said tickets to the other four concerts still are available but that sales are moving along at a brisk rate.

All four symphony concerts are in Stephens Auditorium. Only the "Pops" night is in Hilton Coliseum.

Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor, directs the Saturday concert and the final concert Monday. The Sunday performance is under the baton of Steinberg.

The distinguished roster of soloists who will appear with the orchestra are pianist Malcolm Frager on Saturday, soprano Veronica Tyler and bass-baritone Robert Hale on Sunday and violinist Zino Francescatti on Monday.

The Sunday performance, by the way, also features the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus in a premiere performance of "Mail Order Madrigals," a work by William Schuman commissioned by J. W. (Bill) Fisher of Marshalltown for the Iowa State Singers.

As in past years, the Ames hosts are not neglecting hospitality.

Edgar said a hospitality desk will be maintained at the Holiday Inn where the musicians are staying and the university is opening to them its squash, tennis, handball, skating and swimming facilities.

Further, the musicians will be given the opportunity to visit nearby farms, the Amana Colonies and points of interest in the Ames-Des Moines area.

INDIANOLA, IOWA
RECORD-HERALD AND TRIBUNE
TW. 4,875
MAR 6 1972

Choral Concert At Iowa State

The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Oratorio Chorus will perform two other Schuman compositions.

The choral concert, at 3 p.m. in C. Y. Stephens Auditorium, will be the only matinee performance during the festival.

Cathy J. Clark, Rt. 2 Pleasantville, is a membr of the Iowa State Singers. Julia K. Smith, Rt. 2, Carlisle, Roberta J. Bishop and Timothy A. Johnson, Norwalk, are members of the Oratorio Chorus.

THE CAPITAL TIMES
MADISON, WISC.
D. 46,029
MAR 8 1972

Despite Rumbling Train and Banging Doors

Vibrant Boston Symphony Lives Up to No. 1 Rating

By DAVE WAGNER
(Of The Capital Times Staff)

With the revival of popular interest in the symphonies of Gustav Mahler that has been so often spoken of, it was appropriate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra—widely regarded as the finest in the country—devoted most of its program Tuesday night to a definitive interpretation of one of those symphonies.

Aside from the universal renown which the Boston group has claimed for decades, it may have been the inclusion of Mahler's Fifth symphony (in C-sharp minor) that packed the University Stock Pavilion almost to overflowing.

It was all reminiscent of Daniel Barenboim's appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the same "auditorium" at the close of last year's season. A much-touted young conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, was appearing locally with one of the world's most respected orchestras. Would he measure up to the occasionally extravagant notices he received in the national press?

He would.

* * *

There were, it should be added for the record, a few distractions. The first was the problem created when the orchestra plunged into the first work while ushers were still seating about 50 people thronging through the banging doors. The second came when the reliable 9:20 express, which had tooted so amiably during the Philadelphia concert and rattled through Van Cliburn's attentions to Brahms in December, whisked once again past the Stock Pavilion. From the looks of several cellists and violinists, the hall must be the source of a few anecdotes on the performing circuit.

But nothing could detract from the quality of Thomas' evocations of Mahler, himself a famous conductor in his day.

The young maestro showed a dramatic concern for the details of symphony; he apparently allies himself with the school of conductors who feel they must embody the meaning of the work in delivering their instructions to the various sections. After laying down the rhythmic law to the cellos in their frequent melodic duties in this piece, he would pirouette on his patent leathers like a musical world spirit, mad with delight, and cue a brass entrance as though he were handing them the responsibility of the century.

All very romantic, this. And perfectly sound, considering the piled-on tempest and tirades of the last ferocious romantic composer.

For leverage it is interesting to recall the conducting style of the late, brilliant neo-classicist Paul Hindemith, who used a baton the size of a short tinker-toy and cued the musicians with a casual scowl over his rim-less glasses. A triple forte might have made him move his elbow a bit.

Of course, most of the responsibility for excellence here rests with the orchestra, which, in the depth of its individual virtuosity and the sweep of its cohesive powers, is probably unequalled on the continent.

Some of that virtuosity was demonstrated in the only other work on the program, an oboe concerto in C, which is presumed to be from the hand of Haydn.

The soloist was Ralph Gomberg, who fled through the difficult opening movement (allegro spiritoso) with only a trace of rhythmic haste, until he attained full flight in the cadenza with a brief, nearly jazz-like declaration.

In the marvelously limpid andante, in which the melody rises to proportions of elegance that make Haydn's authorship quite believable, Gomberg showed the full measure of his artistry, and never dropped a moment of it through to the concerto's conclusion.

Needless to say, the crowd literally erupted after each work. And as though they were consciously helping to create the metaphor, a whole section of the audience groaned with the relief of pleasure in the few moments it took the hall to collect itself to applaud Gomberg; the sound could have been that of the escaping gases of a volcano moments before the fiery flood.

With the appearance of the Boston organization (and the arrival here next week of the Vienna Symphony under Josef Krips), Madisonians can assert that, in a few years' time, they have heard some of the finest orchestras on the planet. From here on in, in other words, there will be the element of repetition in the Wisconsin's Union's 7-year-old experiment, for which their Music Committee is to be decisively congratulated.

Boston Symphony concert festival begins Wednesday

G ONE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will soon experience the Iowa hospitality that made the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia orchestras recommend the Ames International Orchestra Festival as a "must" for their friends in other major orchestras.

The Boston Symphony becomes the third orchestra to present a festival series at Iowa State University. Previous festivals featured the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Both have expressed a desire to return to Ames and have advised European orchestras to include Ames on their U. S. tours.

Five Concerts

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, and soprano Eileen Farrell were scheduled to arrive here at 2 p.m. today. The rest of the 120-member Boston entourage arrives Wednesday to present the first of five concerts at Iowa State that evening. The festival will include concerts Wednesday, Saturday, Sunday and Monday in the C.Y. Stephens Auditorium and one by the Boston Pops Orchestra Friday in the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

The orchestra will open the Ames International Orchestra Festival Wednesday at 8 p.m. in a concert featuring Miss Farrell as soloist.

Two receptions have been planned after the opening night concert. The Holiday Inn will host a reception for Midwest symphony orchestra conductors, managers and association presidents. A reception will also be held for the Boston Symphony members at the Octagon.

For the convenience of the orchestra, a hospitality desk will be maintained at the Holiday Inn where the orchestra will be headquartered. Local residents are making bicycles, ice skates and autos available to the musicians. Iowa State University is opening its recreation facilities to the musicians who may want to play squash, tennis, handball, or go swimming or skating. And to keep the orchestra up to date on news back home, the Boston Globe will be flown in daily.

Tour, Dance

Orchestra activities Thursday will include a tour of the Amanas and a square dance in the Memorial Lutheran Church at 8 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor of the orchestra, will meet with students and faculty throughout the day. He will also be present at "arts and cokes" in the Memorial Union Pioneer Room at 4:10 p.m.

The ISU student chorus will rehearse with music director of the Boston Symphony William Steinberg, Thursday at 7 p.m.

The 14,000-seat James H. Hilton Coliseum will be especially equipped and decorated for the sell-out performance of the Boston Pops Orchestra, at 8 p.m., conducted by Arthur Fiedler. Doc Severinsen of the Johnny Carson "Tonight Show" will be soloist for two selections.

The orchestra will present a program of popular and light classical selections, including a Burt Bacharach medley, "Gaite Parisienne," Pomp and Circumstance, and the Brahms Academic Festival Overture. The orchestra and Doc Severinsen will rehearse for the pops concert at noon.

Saturday, the musicians are scheduled to visit nearby farms. The evening concert, conducted by Thomas, at 8 p.m., will include excerpts from "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka, Borodin's Symphony No. 2 in B Minor and pianist Malcolm Frager's performance of the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4 in G Major.

ISU Students Participate

Other activities Saturday will include the orchestra and chorus rehearsal at 10:30 a.m., a Frager rehearsal at 1:45 p.m. and Tanglewood instrumental auditions, from 3-5 p.m. at Music Hall. Tanglewood is a summer music program conducted by the symphony in Massachusetts.

On Sunday at 3 p.m., 225 Iowa State students will participate in a choral concert with the orchestra. The Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus, under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities, will present the world premiere of "Mail Order Madrigals" by William Schuman.

Schuman was commissioned by the ISU music department to compose the work especially for the Iowa State Singers under a grant from J.W. Fisher of Marshalltown. Mr. and Mrs. Schumann will attend the concert which also will include two other Schuman compositions.

William Steinberg will conduct the singers and orchestra in the Brahms Requiem, sung in English. Soloists will be two New York City Opera vocalists, soprano Veronica Tyler and bass-baritone Robert Hale.

Tanglewood vocal auditions will also be held Sunday at 4:30 p.m. at Morrill Hall.

Thomas will conduct the orchestra for the final concert at 8 p.m. Monday. The orchestra will perform Mahler's Symphony No. 5 and Zino Francescatti will be the soloist for the Beethoven Violin Concerto. Francescatti's rehearsal is scheduled for 10:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Monday.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500
MAR 7 1972

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
MAR 7 1972
New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Sets Tour of Mid-West

The Boston Symphony Orchestra today opens its mid - western tour in Madison, Wis. under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas and ends in Chicago on March 18.

Thomas will conduct works of Stravinsky, Beethoven, Glinka and Borodin. From Madison, the Orchestra will travel to Ames, Iowa to take part in the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Five concerts will be performed in Ames, including one Boston Pops concert under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Both William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony in Ames.

From Ames, the Orchestra will travel to Ann Arbor, Mich. where William Steinberg will conduct works of Wagner, Hindemith and Brahms. Then on to Urbana, another first for the Boston Symphony, also under William Steinberg.

Then the Orchestra will travel to Chicago, where for the first time Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops will be heard. Jeffrey Siegel will be piano soloist with Fiedler. The Symphony concert in Chicago will be conducted by William Steinberg with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg performing the Ravel Piano concerto in G.

Soloists joining the tour include Zino Francescatti, violin, who will perform under Thomas in Ames; Malcolm Frager, piano, who will perform under Thomas in Urbana; Eileen Farrell, soprano, who will perform under Steinberg in Ames; Veronica Tyler, soprano and Robert Hale, baritone, who will perform under Steinberg in Ames; Doc Serverinsen, trumpet, who will perform with Fiedler in the Pops concert in Ames.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496
MAR 5 1972

Boston Symphony to Open Music Festival for Iowa

By Nick Baldwin

Although there has been no official proclamation, there is no doubt that this is music week for Iowa and the Midwest.

The Boston Symphony opens a music festival consisting of five concerts with an 8 p.m. performance in C. Y. Stephens Auditorium on the Iowa State University campus in Ames Wednesday.

William Steinberg conducts the opening performance and soprano Eileen Farrell is the featured soloist in an all-Wagner recital.

Festival Series

The Boston Symphony becomes the third internationally known orchestra to present a festival series at Iowa State University. Previous festivals have featured the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Opening night has been designated as Midwest Symphony Orchestra Night with invitations having been issued to orchestra conductors, managers and association presidents in the Midwest.

Besides the opening concert Wednesday, the Boston Symphony will be heard in concert at 8 p.m. Saturday, at 3 p.m. Sunday and at 8 p.m. Monday.

In addition, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra play Friday in ISU's huge Hilton Coliseum with trumpeter Doc Severinsen as featured soloist.

That performance has been sold out.

The Coliseum has 12,600 regular seats and an additional 1,400 persons will be seated at tables and chairs on the arena floor where refreshments will be served during the performance.

Tickets Available

Alvin R. Edgar, director of concerts at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium, said tickets to the other four concerts still are available but that sales are moving along at a brisk rate.

All four symphony concerts are in Stephens Auditorium. Only the "Pops" night is in Hilton Coliseum.

Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor, directs the Saturday concert and the final concert Monday. The Sunday performance is under the baton of Steinberg.

The distinguished roster of soloists who will appear with the orchestra are pianist Malcolm Frager on Saturday, soprano Veronica Tyler and bass-baritone Robert Hale on Sunday and violinist Zino Francescatti on Monday.

The Sunday performance, by the way, also features the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus in a premiere performance of "Mail Order Madrigals," a work by William Schuman commissioned by J. W. (Bill) Fisher of Marshalltown for the Iowa State Singers.

As in past years, the Ames hosts are not neglecting hospitality.

Edgar said a hospitality desk will be maintained at the Holiday Inn where the musicians are staying and the university is opening to them its squash, tennis, handball, skating and swimming facilities.

Further, the musicians will be given the opportunity to visit nearby farms, the Amana Colonies and points of interest in the Ames-Des Moines area.

INDIANOLA, IOWA
RECORD-HERALD AND TRIBUNE
TW. 4,875
MAR 6 1972

Choral Concert At Iowa State

The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Oratorio Chorus will perform two other Schuman compositions.

The choral concert, at 3 p.m. in C. Y. Stephens Auditorium, will be the only matinee performance during the festival.

Cathy J. Clark, Rt. 2 Pleasantville, is a membr of the Iowa State Singers. Julia K. Smith, Rt. 2, Carlisle, Roberta J. Bishop and Timothy A. Johnson, Norwalk, are members of the Oratorio Chorus.

THE CAPITAL TIMES
MADISON, WISC.
D. 46,029
MAR 8 1972

Despite Rumbling Train and Banging Doors

Vibrant Boston Symphony Lives Up to No. 1 Rating

By DAVE WAGNER
(Of The Capital Times Staff)

With the revival of popular interest in the symphonies of Gustav Mahler that has been so often spoken of, it was appropriate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra—widely regarded as the finest in the country—devoted most of its program Tuesday night to a definitive interpretation of one of those symphonies.

Aside from the universal renown which the Boston group has claimed for decades, it may have been the inclusion of Mahler's Fifth symphony (in C-sharp minor) that packed the University Stock Pavilion almost to overflowing.

It was all reminiscent of Daniel Barenboim's appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the same "auditorium" at the close of last year's season. A much-touted young conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, was appearing locally with one of the world's most respected orchestras. Would he measure up to the occasionally extravagant notices he received in the national press?

He would.

* * *

There were, it should be added for the record, a few distractions. The first was the problem created when the orchestra plunged into the first work while ushers were still seating about 50 people thronging through the banging doors. The second came when the reliable 9:20 express, which had tooted so amiably during the Philadelphia concert and rattled through Van Cliburn's attentions to Brahms in December, whisked once again past the Stock Pavilion. From the looks of several cellists and violinists, the hall must be the source of a few anecdotes on the performing circuit.

But nothing could detract from the quality of Thomas' evocations of Mahler, himself a famous conductor in his day.

The young maestro showed a dramatic concern for the details of symphony; he apparently allies himself with the school of conductors who feel they must embody the meaning of the work in delivering their instructions to the various sections. After laying down the rhythmic law to the cellos in their frequent melodic duties in this piece, he would pirouette on his patent leathers like a musical world spirit, mad with delight, and cue a brass entrance as though he were handing them the responsibility of the century.

All very romantic, this. And perfectly sound, considering the piled-on tempest and tirades of the last ferocious romantic composer.

For leverage it is interesting to recall the conducting style of the late, brilliant neo-classicist Paul Hindemith, who used a baton the size of a short tinker-toy and cued the musicians with a casual scowl over his rim-less glasses. A triple forte might have made him move his elbow a bit.

Of course, most of the responsibility for excellence here rests with the orchestra, which, in the depth of its individual virtuosity and the sweep of its cohesive powers, is probably unequalled on the continent.

Some of that virtuosity was demonstrated in the only other work on the program, an oboe concerto in C, which is presumed to be from the hand of Haydn.

The soloist was Ralph Gomberg, who fled through the difficult opening movement (allegro spiritoso) with only a trace of rhythmic haste, until he attained full flight in the cadenza with a brief, nearly jazz-like declaration.

In the marvelously limpid andante, in which the melody rises to proportions of elegance that make Haydn's authorship quite believable, Gomberg showed the full measure of his artistry, and never dropped a moment of it through to the concerto's conclusion.

Needless to say, the crowd literally erupted after each work. And as though they were consciously helping to create the metaphor, a whole section of the audience groaned with the relief of pleasure in the few moments it took the hall to collect itself to applaud Gomberg; the sound could have been that of the escaping gases of a volcano moments before the fiery flood.

With the appearance of the Boston organization (and the arrival here next week of the Vienna Symphony under Josef Krips), Madisonians can assert that, in a few years' time, they have heard some of the finest orchestras on the planet. From here on in, in other words, there will be the element of repetition in the Wisconsin's Union's 7-year-old experiment, for which their Music Committee is to be decisively congratulated.

Boston Symphony concert festival begins Wednesday

G ONE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will soon experience the Iowa hospitality that made the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia orchestras recommend the Ames International Orchestra Festival as a "must" for their friends in other major orchestras.

The Boston Symphony becomes the third orchestra to present a festival series at Iowa State University. Previous festivals featured the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Both have expressed a desire to return to Ames and have advised European orchestras to include Ames on their U. S. tours.

Five Concerts

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, and soprano Eileen Farrell were scheduled to arrive here at 2 p.m. today. The rest of the 120-member Boston entourage arrives Wednesday to present the first of five concerts at Iowa State that evening. The festival will include concerts Wednesday, Saturday, Sunday and Monday in the C.Y. Stephens Auditorium and one by the Boston Pops Orchestra Friday in the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

The orchestra will open the Ames International Orchestra Festival Wednesday at 8 p.m. in a concert featuring Miss Farrell as soloist.

Two receptions have been planned after the opening night concert. The Holiday Inn will host a reception for Midwest symphony orchestra conductors, managers and association presidents. A reception will also be held for the Boston Symphony members at the Octagon.

For the convenience of the orchestra, a hospitality desk will be maintained at the Holiday Inn where the orchestra will be headquartered. Local residents are making bicycles, ice skates and autos available to the musicians. Iowa State University is opening its recreation facilities to the musicians who may want to play squash, tennis, handball, or go swimming or skating. And to keep the orchestra up to date on news back home, the Boston Globe will be flown in daily.

Tour, Dance

Orchestra activities Thursday will include a tour of the Amanas and a square dance in the Memorial Lutheran Church at 8 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor of the orchestra, will meet with students and faculty throughout the day. He will also be present at "arts and cokes" in the Memorial Union Pioneer Room at 4:10 p.m.

The ISU student chorus will rehearse with music director of the Boston Symphony William Steinberg, Thursday at 7 p.m.

The 14,000-seat James H. Hilton Coliseum will be especially equipped and decorated for the sell-out performance of the Boston Pops Orchestra, at 8 p.m., conducted by Arthur Fiedler. Doc Severinsen of the Johnny Carson "Tonight Show" will be soloist for two selections.

The orchestra will present a program of popular and light classical selections, including a Burt Bacharach medley, "Gaite Parisienne," Pomp and Circumstance, and the Brahms Academic Festival Overture. The orchestra and Doc Severinsen will rehearse for the pops concert at noon.

Saturday, the musicians are scheduled to visit nearby farms. The evening concert, conducted by Thomas, at 8 p.m., will include excerpts from "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka, Borodin's Symphony No. 2 in B Minor and pianist Malcolm Frager's performance of the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4 in G Major.

ISU Students Participate

Other activities Saturday will include the orchestra and chorus rehearsal at 10:30 a.m., a Frager rehearsal at 1:45 p.m. and Tanglewood instrumental auditions, from 3-5 p.m. at Music Hall. Tanglewood is a summer music program conducted by the symphony in Massachusetts.

On Sunday at 3 p.m., 225 Iowa State students will participate in a choral concert with the orchestra. The Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus, under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities, will present the world premiere of "Mail Order Madrigals" by William Schuman.

Schuman was commissioned by the ISU music department to compose the work especially for the Iowa State Singers under a grant from J.W. Fisher of Marshalltown. Mr. and Mrs. Schumann will attend the concert which also will include two other Schuman compositions.

William Steinberg will conduct the singers and orchestra in the Brahms Requiem, sung in English. Soloists will be two New York City Opera vocalists, soprano Veronica Tyler and bass-baritone Robert Hale.

Tanglewood vocal auditions will also be held Sunday at 4:30 p.m. at Morrill Hall.

Thomas will conduct the orchestra for the final concert at 8 p.m. Monday. The orchestra will perform Mahler's Symphony No. 5 and Zino Francescatti will be the soloist for the Beethoven Violin Concerto. Francescatti's rehearsal is scheduled for 10:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Monday.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500
MAR 7 1972

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 8 1972

REGISTER PHOTO BY THOMAS DE FEO

Welcome Boston Symphony Performers

Soprano Eileen Farrell, center, and William Steinberg, right, director of the Boston Symphony, are greeted at the Des Moines Municipal Airport Tuesday by Alvin Edgar, director of concerts at Ames' C. Y. Stephens Auditorium. Steinberg will conduct tonight's opening concert of a series of Music Week concerts at the auditorium on the ISU campus. Miss Farrell will be the featured soloist in the all-Wagner recital to begin at 8 p.m.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 8 1972

Boston Symphony Opens Ames Festival Tonight

By a Staff Writer

AMES, IA. — The Boston Symphony, the third internationally known orchestra to present a festival series at Iowa State University, will give its opening performance at 8 o'clock tonight in C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

William Steinberg will conduct the opening performance and soprano Eileen Farrell will be the featured soloist.

EILEEN FARRELL — WILLIAM STEINBERG

The concert has been designated as Midwest Symphony Orchestra Night with invitations having been issued to orchestra conductors, managers and association presidents in the Midwest.

The Boston Symphony also will present concerts in Stephens Auditorium at 8 p.m. Saturday, 3 p.m. Sunday and 8 p.m. Monday.

Tickets still were available for the symphony concerts.

However the Friday night performance of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops Orchestra in Hilton Coliseum is sold out. Trumpeter Doc Severinsen will be featured soloist.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Saturday symphony concert and the final concert Monday. The Sunday performance will be conducted by Steinberg.

Soloists who will appear with the orchestra are pianist Malcolm Frager Saturday, soprano Veronica Tyler and bass-baritone Robert Hall Sunday and violinist Zino Francescatti Monday.

The Sunday performance also features the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus.

Previous Iowa State University festivals have been presented by the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 73,500 S. 77,500

MAR 8 1972

Composition by Schuman Set at Iowa State

AMES — The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert March 12 during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Singers, 70-select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p.m. in the C. Y. Stephens auditorium.

Schuman, one of America's foremost composers, was commissioned by the university's department of music to write "Mail Order Madrigals" especially for the Iowa State Singers under a grant from J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown. A Pulitzer prize winner, Schuman was president of the Juilliard School of Music for 17 years and president of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts in New York City for six years. He and his wife will attend the premiere.

Under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at Iowa State, the Singers and Oratorio Chorus will perform two other Schuman compositions, ''Prelude for Voices'' and "Carols for Death."

The March 12 choral concert will be the only matinee performance during the orchestra festival. Evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented March 8, 11 and 13, and the Boston Pops Orchestra will present Pops Night on March 10. Pops Night is sold out but good seats are available for the four symphony concerts.

STORY CITY, IOWA
HERALD
W 2,350

MAR 8 1972

ISU STUDENTS GIVE WORLD PREMIERE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p.m. in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

Ronald Anderson of Story City is a member of the Singers.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 4 1972

WILLIAM SCHUMAN

W. DOUGLAS PRITCHARD

VERONICA TYLER

World premiere, opera soloists for concert

The emphasis will be on voices when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents a matinee concert Mar. 12 at 3 p.m. during the Ames International Orchsestra Festival. Featured will be a world premiere, the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus and soloists Veronica Tyler and Robert Hale from the New York City Opera.

The world premiere will be "Mail Order Madrigals," written especially for the Iowa State Singers by William Schuman. He was commissioned by the ISU music dept. to compose the work under a grant from J.W. Fisher of Marshalltown. The 1897 Sears Roebuck catalog is the source of the unusual title.

The composer and his wife will attend the Stephens Aditorium concert at which two other Schuman compositions, "Prelude for Voices," and "Carols of Death," will be performed.

W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at ISU will conduct the 70 member Iowa State Singers and the 155 member Oratorio chorus in the performance of the Schuman compositions. Viletta Sue Ware of the ISU music faculty will be soloist.

The students, soloists Veronica Tylor and Robert Hale and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will combine in presenting Brahms "Requiem." The work will be sung in English with William Steinberg conducting.

Miss Tyler was a soloist here last May with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the presentation of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony."

The leading soprano of the New York City Opera, Miss Tyler made her debut in 1961 with the American Opera Society and with the New York City Opera in the 1964-65 season. She won the first International Vocal Competition in Moscow in 1967.

Robert Hale began his operatic career while in military service in Frankfurt, Germany. He has sung in numerous performances with the New York City Opera

Hale has made guest appearances with the Boston, Minneapolis, Denver, Rochester, Atlanta, Milwaukee and Pittsburgh orchestras.

VILETTA SUE WARE

ROBERT HALE

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 8 1972

REGISTER PHOTO BY THOMAS DE FEO

Welcome Boston Symphony Performers

Soprano Eileen Farrell, center, and William Steinberg, right, director of the Boston Symphony, are greeted at the Des Moines Municipal Airport Tuesday by Alvin Edgar, director of concerts at Ames' C. Y. Stephens Auditorium. Steinberg will conduct tonight's opening concert of a series of Music Week concerts at the auditorium on the ISU campus. Miss Farrell will be the featured soloist in the all-Wagner recital to begin at 8 p.m.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 8 1972

Boston Symphony Opens Ames Festival Tonight

By a Staff Writer

AMES, IA. — The Boston Symphony, the third internationally known orchestra to present a festival series at Iowa State University, will give its opening performance at 8 o'clock tonight in C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

William Steinberg will conduct the opening performance and soprano Eileen Farrell will be the featured soloist.

The concert has been designated as Midwest Symphony Orchestra Night with invitations having been issued to orchestra conductors, managers and association presidents in the Midwest.

EILEEN FARRELL — WILLIAM STEINBERG

The Boston Symphony also will present concerts in Stephens Auditorium at 8 p.m. Saturday, 3 p.m. Sunday and 8 p.m. Monday.

Tickets still were available for the symphony concerts.

However the Friday night performance of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops Orchestra in Hilton Coliseum is sold out. Trumpeter Doc Severinsen will be featured soloist.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Saturday symphony concert and the final concert Monday. The Sunday performance will be conducted by Steinberg.

Soloists who will appear with the orchestra are pianist Malcolm Frager Saturday, soprano Veronica Tyler and bass-baritone Robert Hall Sunday and violinist Zino Francescatti Monday.

The Sunday performance also features the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus.

Previous Iowa State University festivals have been presented by the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 73,500 S. 77,500

MAR 8 1972

Composition by Schuman Set at Iowa State

AMES — The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert March 12 during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Singers, 70-select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p.m. in the C. Y. Stephens auditorium.

Schuman, one of America's foremost composers, was commissioned by the university's department of music to write "Mail Order Madrigals" especially for the Iowa State Singers under a grant from J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown. A Pulitzer prize winner, Schuman was president of the Juilliard School of Music for 17 years and president of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts in New York City for six years. He and his wife will attend the premiere.

Under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at Iowa State, the Singers and Oratorio Chorus will perform two other Schuman compositions, ''Prelude for Voices'' and "Carols for Death."

The March 12 choral concert will be the only matinee performance during the orchestra festival. Evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented March 8, 11 and 13, and the Boston Pops Orchestra will present Pops Night on March 10. Pops Night is sold out but good seats are available for the four symphony concerts.

STORY CITY, IOWA
HERALD
W 2,350

MAR 8 1972

ISU STUDENTS GIVE WORLD PREMIERE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p. m. in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

Ronald Anderson of Story City is a member of the Singers.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 4 1972

WILLIAM SCHUMAN

W. DOUGLAS PRITCHARD

VERONICA TYLER

World premiere, opera soloists for concert

The emphasis will be on voices when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents a matinee concert Mar. 12 at 3 p.m. during the Ames International Orchsestra Festival. Featured will be a world premiere, the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus and soloists Veronica Tyler and Robert Hale from the New York City Opera.

The world premiere will be "Mail Order Madrigals," written especially for the Iowa State Singers by William Schuman. He was commissioned by the ISU music dept. to compose the work under a grant from J.W. Fisher of Marshalltown. The 1897 Sears Roebuck catalog is the source of the unusual title.

The composer and his wife will attend the Stephens Aditorium concert at which two other Schuman compositions, "Prelude for Voices," and "Carols of Death," will be performed.

W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at ISU will conduct the 70 member Iowa State Singers and the 155 member Oratorio chorus in the performance of the Schuman compositions. Viletta Sue Ware of the ISU music faculty will be soloist.

The students, soloists Veronica Tylor and Robert Hale and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will combine in presenting Brahms "Requiem." The work will be sung in English with William Steinberg conducting.

Miss Tyler was a soloist here last May with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the presentation of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony."

The leading soprano of the New York City Opera, Miss Tyler made her debut in 1961 with the American Opera Society and with the New York City Opera in the 1964-65 season. She won the first International Vocal Competition in Moscow in 1967.

Robert Hale began his operatic career while in military service in Frankfurt, Germany. He has sung in numerous performances with the New York City Opera

Hale has made guest appearances with the Boston, Minneapolis, Denver, Rochester, Atlanta, Milwaukee and Pittsburgh orchestras.

VILETTA SUE WARE

ROBERT HALE

Editorial view

Welcome, B.S.O.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived here Wednesday noon and eight hours later played the first performance in this year's version of the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

And in the third year of a relatively new tradition, their musical performance left nothing to be desired.

The orchestra members quickly acclimated themselves to Ames, and have responded with open friendliness to people here. In short, they know how to be the perfect guests. It's a pleasure to have them here.

If there are any among our readers who have any doubt about the importance of the visit of the B.S.O. to Ames for this festival, let us quote from a letter to the editor which appeared in last Sunday's edition of the Minneapolis "Tribune" of which several copies came to our desk:

"The Boston Symphony, one of the world's great orchestras, will be playing in the Midwest this month," it said. "But not in Minneapolis, where it has made exactly two appearances since 1930. Instead, the 106 musicians will be performing in that culturally enlightened metropolis 200 miles to the south—Ames, Iowa, where Iowa State University each spring sponsors what it calls the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

"This cultural phenomenon drew Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra for a similar period last spring, and the New York Philharmonic before that...

"Appearances by visiting symphonic ensembles have become a regular event in the cultural life of many U.S. cities—Ames, Iowa included. Why can't it happen here, the so-called 'cultural Athens' of America? This benighted center hasn't been privileged to hear a really major-league U.S. symphonic visitor since the Cleveland Orchestra . . . in 1966."

Sounds a bit envious, doesn't he? And we think it worth noting that music critics not only from Iowa newspapers but also from Omaha and Kansas City, and yes, Minneapolis, are attending the B.S.O. performances here. Right here in Ames, Iowa.

Two years ago, when the New York Philharmonic appeared here, a review of its performance published in this newspaper suggested rather apologetically it might be presumptuous for a Midwestern critic to evaluate the performance of that orchestra. Although we meant we had had little opportunity to make a comparison, we were taken to task for what we thought was modesty.

It turns out our critics were right, and reviewers from communities much larger than this one have only recordings with which to compare live performances here.

And so it is with the audiences. Central Iowans have offered to them—for the third year in a row—the opportunity to hear one of the world's great orchestras, an opportunity accorded the residents of few other communities anywhere.

We're glad the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come here to add their contribution to the quality of our life. If we sound smug, it's because we feel a bit that way.

And we hope the B.S.O. members will, during the six days they're here, begin to feel as though they belong to the community, for if early indications are any measure, we're going to feel that they belong here, during those six days.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500
MAR 9 1972

Symphony opens concert series

By ROD RIGGS

Secure in its position as one of the world's great orchestras, the Boston Symphony Wednesday opened the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The opening night's performance of several symphonic standards did not lessen the glamour of the event, nor the reputation of the orchestra.

Misjudgment

But the feeling that the orchestra management may have misjudged the musical sophistication of its audience pervaded the thoughts of many concert-goers evaluating the opening offering.

Soprano Eileen Farrell, scheduled to appear with the symphony in the opening program, was stricken ill, and was forced to withdraw from the performance. A program in which two numbers were substituted thus was presented.

In presenting Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, the orchestra chose what certainly must be the most-performed symphony extant. Probably it was selected because of its easily identifiable theme. But it also is a staple of every record library.

Any criticism of the concert would have to take note that it was the program, not the performance, which was not up to par for the audience here.

The program was not susceptible to adequate exploitation by the orchestra. The violins in particular never had the opportunity to demonstrate virtuosity—and none of the magic shimmer expected of strings emerged.

The closest approach to the magic came during the performance of one of the substitute selections, "Don Juan" by Strauss.

See Symphony, page 12

MAESTRO AND MUSICIANS—Under the baton of music director William Steinberg, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the International Orchestra Festival with a performance here Wednesday night. Other pictures, review on page 12 today. (Tribune photo by Rod Riggs)

Boston Musicians Find Ames In Tune: 'Think of Everything'

By Michael Bryson
(Tribune Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — The middle-aged musician was handed a copy of the Boston Globe as he walked into the Holiday Inn here shortly after 1 p.m. Wednesday.

"Well, I'll be darned," he said, smiling and flipping through the paper to the sports page. "They thought of everything — even the Boston paper," he said.

The musician was referring to the efforts of local residents and Iowa State University officials to make members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra feel right at home during their series of concerts that began Wednesday night on the ISU campus.

To achieve this aim, folks here are going all out — arranging for members of the orchestra to have dinner in private homes, take trips to Iowa farms and even offer a simple jog around the track, in addition to flying in copies of the Boston newspaper.

The entire Holiday Inn has been rented out to the 120-member orchestra. In the front lobby, ISU is maintaining a "hospitality desk" where members of the orchestra can sign up for such things as tours of farms and the Amana Colonies, ice skating, or just about anything else while they aren't performing a rehearsing.

Hospitality

Many of the musicians seemed genuinely pleased with what one called "your great Iowa hospitality."

Within minutes of arriving here more than a dozen musicians were clustered around the hospitality desk, scanning the list for something of interest.

"I think it's wonderful, it's very thoughtful," said Laurence Thorstenberg, a French horn player.

Thorstenberg likes to jog. "I do it every other day at the YMCA in Boston, which is just a short distance from Symphony Hall" he said.

He told The Tribune that when he mentioned this to the local people, they quickly arranged for him to use an indoor ISU track.

"I had lost my track shoes some place and they even recommended to me the best place in town to buy new ones."

Louis Legui, a celloist, said he made arrangements to play tennis, but had one little problem:

"My tennis shoes and tennis shorts are locked in a trunk with my cello and the truck bringing it here isn't supposed to arrive until early this evening, but I'll probably play some tennis during our stay here."

Farm Tours

Tours of farms and the Amana Colonies were the most popular attractions for the Boston musicians. More than a dozen signed up to visit farms in the first hour they were here.

"I'm looking forward to it," said Joe Hearne. "I've never been to a big farm before. I think it's a good idea."

While the musicians were lining up things to do, Daniel Gustin, 30, an assistant manager, nodding his head toward them, told a visitor, "It's like a community unto its own."

Gustin is involved with one of the major headaches of a tour like this — moving the large orchestra and all of its instruments from one place to another.

It's not an easy chore. The musicians themselves fill an entire charter plane and it takes a huge moving van-sized truck to transport the instruments across the country.

"The actual execution of the move isn't bad," said Gustin in an interview, "but it does take an awful lot of planning. We started planning this tour a year ago."

In addition to visiting Ames, the Boston Symphony also stopped off at Madison, Wis., and will go to Urbana, Ill., on its current two-week swing before returning to Boston.

Gustin said it's a myth that what he called "the artists" are temperamental. He said many conductors and soloists may be considered temperamental.

But, he said, members of the orchestra "are not primadonnas, they are artists, but they are also human beings — basically the same as any other Joe."

Kind of Spirit

He admitted, however, that "like any other community there can be some rivalry, some ill feelings, but there is some kind of camaraderie and esprit d'corps among this group."

He said one of the biggest problems on the tour is "finding a place to eat after a concert."

Gustin said most of the orchestra members "can't eat before a concert because of the tension or they can't play on a full stomach.

"After a concert the guys are hungry as hell."

He said it's difficult to find a restaurant that late at night that can accommodate 120 persons. He also complained that at "many local receptions all they serve is tiny little sandwiches."

The Boston Symphony will present concerts at 8 p.m. Saturday, 3 p.m. Sunday and 8 p.m. Monday at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

At 8 p.m. Friday, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra will perform at Hilton Coliseum. This performance, featuring trumpeter Doc Severinsen as guest soloist, has been sold out.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500
MAR 9 1972

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781
MAR 9 1972

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES—Backstage before the first performance of the Boston Symphony's appearance at the Ames International Orchestra Festival were the events pictured here. (Clockwise from upper left) Music Director William Steinberg makes a point; librarian Victor Alpert made up new music folders to reflect a change in program; warming-up exercises by a flute; a cellist looks apprehensive; a look over the harpist's shoulder; last-minute relaxation before going on stage; two musicians discuss dynamics and a search for the right pair of drumsticks. (Tribune Photos by Rod Riggs)

Symphony (Continued from Page One)

Performers Relaxed

Backstage before the performance, the musicians chatted among themselves and with well-wishers, apparently much at home in their midwestern surroundings.

Recognizing a native, several of the musicians asked questions about Ames and about Iowa. "When does it get green around here?" one wanted to know. "It looks terrible out there."

During the waiting period, music librarian Victor Alpert made over the folders for the evening's performance. He displayed the music trunk, in which folders for the complete orchestra for one concert program are neatly filed away . But there also are four smaller trunks of music for situations just such as last night's emergency, and, he said, separate trunks for the "Pops."

The music is in facsimile copy.

"Thank God for the Xerox machine," Alpert explained. "We once had one man employed full time as a copyist."

The music is put into the folders in the order of performance, so the musicians have only to open the cover and begin. The program, of course, is chosen by the music director, in this case, William Steinberg.

Familiar Theme

Steinberg went onstage at 8:05 p.m. to conduct the "Star Spangled Banner" and promptly returned to a chair backstage while the musicians rearranged themselves for the Beethoven. At 8:07 p.m., Steinberg went back to the podium to begin the concert.

He conducts with more subtlety than audiences here have been accustomed to see demonstrated. From backstage it can be observed that his delicacy of gesture ranges from the wave of a finger of his left hand, to the raising of an eyebrow. Occasionally he allowed himself a stare, a frown, pursed lips and a small smile.

While they were not actually performing, several of the musicians paced backstage. At intermission time, they seemed happy for the opportunity to relax, if only briefly. Several, stimulated perhaps by the absence of the evening's intended vocal soloist, felt their own foreheads for an elevated temperature.

A reception at the Holiday Inn, where they were guests, followed the opening night concert. A number of the musicians, however, visited the Octagon art center, where they also were guests.

Both Steinberg and associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas appeared at the Holiday Inn. Thomas explained that he had just returned from a brief "contemplative" tour of Japan. Thomas will conduct the Saturday and Monday performances.

Day Off Today

Orchestra members had no performance scheduled for today, and were offered a variety of leisure-time activities, including visits to the Ames Laboratory's reactor, a tour of the Amana colonies and visits to central Iowa farms.

Thomas had a full schedule, with talks to two Iowa State University music classes and a session at "Arts and Coke" at 4 p.m.

Friday night's sellout performance in Hilton Coliseum will feature trumpter Doc Severinsen appearing with the Boston Pops.

The Saturday program will have pianist Malcolm Frager as soloist; Sunday Steinberg will conduct a choral concert with soloists Veronica Tyler and Robert Hale, the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus. Violinist Zino Francescatti will be soloist Monday.

Tickets remain available for the Saturday, Sunday and Monday concerts and the Stephens Auditorium ticket office will be open all day Saturday, beginning at 9 a.m.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES—Backstage before the first performance of the Boston Symphony's appearance at the Ames International Orchestra Festival were the events pictured here. (Clockwise from upper left) Music Director William Steinberg makes a point; librarian Victor Alpert made up new music folders to reflect a change in program; warming-up exercises by a flute; a cellist looks apprehensive; a look over the harpist's shoulder; last-minute relaxation before going on stage; two musicians discuss dynamics and a search for the right pair of drumsticks. (Tribune Photos by Rod Riggs)

Symphony (Continued from Page One)

Performers Relaxed

Backstage before the performance, the musicians chatted among themselves and with well-wishers, apparently much at home in their midwestern surroundings.

Recognizing a native, several of the musicians asked questions about Ames and about Iowa. "When does it get green around here?" one wanted to know. "It looks terrible out there."

During the waiting period, music librarian Victor Alpert made over the folders for the evening's performance. He displayed the music trunk, in which folders for the complete orchestra for one concert program are neatly filed away . But there also are four smaller trunks of music for situations just such as last night's emergency, and, he said, separate trunks for the "Pops."

The music is in facsimile copy.

"Thank God for the Xerox machine," Alpert explained. "We once had one man employed full time as a copyist."

The music is put into the folders in the order of performance, so the musicians have only to open the cover and begin. The program, of course, is chosen by the music director, in this case, William Steinberg.

Familiar Theme

Steinberg went onstage at 8:05 p.m. to conduct the "Star Spangled Banner" and promptly returned to a chair backstage while the musicians rearranged themselves for the Beethoven. At 8:07 p.m., Steinberg went back to the podium to begin the concert.

He conducts with more subtlety than audiences here have been accustomed to see demonstrated. From backstage it can be observed that his delicacy of gesture ranges from the wave of a finger of his left hand, to the raising of an eyebrow. Occasionally he allowed himself a stare, a frown, pursed lips and a small smile.

While they were not actually performing, several of the musicians paced backstage. At intermission time, they seemed happy for the opportunity to relax, if only briefly. Several, stimulated perhaps by the absence of the evening's intended vocal soloist, felt their own foreheads for an elevated temperature.

A reception at the Holiday Inn, where they were guests, followed the opening night concert. A number of the musicians, however, visited the Octagon art center, where they also were guests.

Both Steinberg and associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas appeared at the Holiday Inn. Thomas explained that he had just returned from a brief "contemplative" tour of Japan. Thomas will conduct the Saturday and Monday performances.

Day Off Today

Orchestra members had no performance scheduled for today, and were offered a variety of leisure-time activities, including visits to the Ames Laboratory's reactor, a tour of the Amana colonies and visits to central Iowa farms.

Thomas had a full schedule, with talks to two Iowa State University music classes and a session at "Arts and Coke" at 4 p.m.

Friday night's sellout performance in Hilton Coliseum will feature trumpter Doc Severinsen appearing with the Boston Pops.

The Saturday program will have pianist Malcolm Frager as soloist; Sunday Steinberg will conduct a choral concert with soloists Veronica Tyler and Robert Hale, the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus. Violinist Zino Francescatti will be soloist Monday.

Tickets remain available for the Saturday, Sunday and Monday concerts and the Stephens Auditorium ticket office will be open all day Saturday, beginning at 9 a.m.

ISU Singers To Perform In 'Madrigals'

The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman, commissioned by J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown, will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchesra concert March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Several of the students who will be performing in the Schuman premiere are Marshall County and nearby area at Iowa State University.

Schuman, one of America's foremost composers, was commissioned by the Univers-iy's department of music to write "Mail Order Madrigals" especially for the ISU singers under a grant from Fisher, 410 N. 6th St. A Pulitzer Prize winner, Schuman was president of the Juilliard School of Music

Schuman

Fisher

for 7 years and president of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, New York City, for six years. He and his wife will attend the premiere.

Under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at ISU, the singers and oratorical chorus will perform two other Schuman compositions, as well as "Madrigals".

Area students who will be involved in the premiere include William D. Bartine, rural Clemons; Patricia A. Maish, State Center; Emily F. Lyon, rural Toledo; Janis J. Stevenson, rural Traer; Edward Martin, Union, and Lorraine A. Smith, rural Radcliffe, all members of the ISU oratorical chorus, and Richard Tett, McCallsburg; Douglas Hertz and Mary J. Hoepner, both of rural Nevada; Kay Daleske, New Providence, and Rhonda Stevenson, rural Traer, all members of the ISU Singers.

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA
TIMES-REPUBLICAN
D. 15,000

MAR 1 1972

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

MAR 9 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO, Pops launch tour through midwest

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its mid-western tour in Madison, Wisconsin under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas.

This is the first appearance of the Orchestra in Madison and it launches the 1972 tour season of the Orchestra. Thomas will conduct works of Stravinsky, Beethoven, Glinka and Borodin. From Madison, the Orchestra will travel to Ames, Iowa wo take part in the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Five concerts will be performed in Ames, including one Boston Pops concert under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Both William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony in Ames. From Ames, the Orchestra will travel to Ann Arbor, Michigan where William Steinberg will conduct works of Wagner, Hindemith and Brahms. Then on to Urbana, another first for the Boston Symphony, also under William Steinberg.

The Orchestra will travel to Chicago, where for the first time Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops will be heard. Jeffrey Siegel will be piano soloist with Mr. Fiedler. The Boston Symphony concert in Chicago will be conducted by William Steinberg with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg performing the Ravel Piano concerto in G. Soloists joining the tour include Zino Francescatti, violin, who will perform under Michael Tilson Thomas in Ames; Malcolm Frager, piano, who will perform under Mr. Thomas in Urbana; Eileen Farrell, soprano, who will perform under William Steinberg in Ames; Veronica Tyler, soprano and Robert Hale, baritone, who will perform under Mr. Steinberg in Ames; Doc Severinsen, trumpet, who will perform with Arthur Fiedler in the Pops concert in Ames. The Orchestra's mid-western tour begins in Madison on March 7 and ends in Chicago on March 18.

PRIMGHAR, IOWA
BELL
W. 1,448

MAR 2 1972

71

ISU students in concert

Ames, Iowa — The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member day, (Thursday, March 2) at 1:30 with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p.m. in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

Following are members of the Oratorio Chorus:

PRIMGHAR: Betty Pingel.

SHELDON: Richard L. Haskegaard.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

MAR 10 1972

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY under Michael Tilson Thomas is in the midst of a midwestern tour. They'll be performing in Iowa, Michigan, and Ohio.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 9 1972

Boston Symphony Plays To Large Crowd at ISU

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a nearly full house Wednesday night in the first of their four concerts at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium on the campus of Iowa State University here.

As becomes one of the United States' major orchestras, it did not disappoint and delivered the big sound that only confirmed what already is known and expected of it.

The big disappointment of the evening was the absence of soprano Eileen Farrell, who was to have appeared as soloist with the orchestra in great arias from Wagner's "Tristan Und Isolde" and "Die Gotterdammerung."

REVIEW

Soloist Ill

Miss Farrell became ill and cancelled her appearance a few hours before curtain time Wednesday. She had arrived in Ames Tuesday.

Officials at Stephens Auditorium said she was stricken with flu and may have to stay in Ames several days instead of leaving this morning as planned.

As for Steinberg and the Boston, they received a standing ovation at the end of a program

Ames Date for London Symphony

AMES, IA. — The London Symphony, directed by Andre Previn, will appear next year at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium here for the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The London Symphony will perform in a series of four concerts Mar. 29 through Apr. 1, 1973. Soloists appearing with the London Symphony will include violinist Isaac Stern and pianists Alicia de Larrocha and Andre Watts.

consisting of standards of the permanent repertoire that are among the best-loved and most often performed.

Major Work

The major work was Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 and from the opening measures, the accent by Maestro Steinberg was on a stately, deliberate tempo.

It was a dignified, restrained performance that brought out the heroic proportions of this work, rather more than the humor and the sparkle that is also part of it.

The third movement, for instance, a brilliant piece that Berloz compared to a scene from a witches' Sabbath, dragged somewhat and somehow never carried the listener to the expected climax.

Finest Performance

On the other hand, in the "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, that followed, Steinburg and the orchestra came through with the finest performance of the evening and possibly the finest interpretation of the tone poem that has been heard in a long time.

Its big sound — so Wagnerian in many ways — was fully realized, as were the orchestral nuances that render it such an exquisitly subtle and descriptive piece.

Also impressive was the rendering of the prelude and "Lieberstod" from Wagner's "Triestan Und Isolde" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremburg."

In Tristan, music as delicate as a whisper or a sigh grows to a powerful and compelling crescendo that only a great orchestra could deliver.

Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor, directs a Saturday concert and the final concert Monday.

Also scheduled, and completely sold out, is a concert Friday by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra in ISU's Hilton Coliseum with trumpeter Doc Severinsen as soloist.

The other concerts are all in Stephens Auditorium.

ALGONA, IOWA
UPPER DES MOINES
W 6,824

MAR 9 1972

ISU STUDENTS GIVE WORLD PREMIERE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ames, Iowa: The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman, will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Kirk A. Benson, son of Mr. and Mrs. Delford Benson, is one of the Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus which will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3:00 p.m., in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

The student groups will join with soloists Veronica Tyler and Robert Hale and the orchestra for the Brahms "Requiem," which will be sung in English.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 10 1972

Inside Your Tribune

A 'Rest' for Boston's Visiting Musicians

REHEARSAL AND PRACTICE are in prime position on the agenda of even a traveling orchestra, but spare moments are used for relaxation. Members of the Boston Symphony have been in Iowa only a short time, but they are no strangers to Ames and the surrounding countryside; the "natives" are making sure of that Picture Page

[138]

ISU Singers To Perform In 'Madrigals'

The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman, commissioned by J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown, will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchesra concert March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Several of the students who will be performing in the Schuman premiere are Marshall County and nearby area at Iowa State University.

Schuman, one of America's foremost composers, was commissioned by the Univers-iy's department of music to write "Mail Order Madrigals" especially for the ISU singers under a grant from Fisher, 410 N. 6th St. A Pulitzer Prize winner, Schuman was president of the Juilliard School of Music for 7 years and president of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, New York City, for six years. He and his wife will attend the premiere.

Schuman

Fisher

Under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at ISU, the singers and oratorical chorus will perform two other Schuman compositions, as well as "Madrigals".

Area students who will be involved in the premiere include William D. Bartine, rural Clemons; Patricia A. Maish, State Center; Emily F. Lyon, rural Toledo; Janis J. Stevenson, rural Traer; Edward Martin, Union, and Lorraine A. Smith, rural Radcliffe, all members of the ISU oratorical chorus, and Richard Tett, McCallsburg; Douglas Hertz and Mary J. Hoepner, both of rural Nevada; Kay Daleske, New Providence, and Rhonda Stevenson, rural Traer, all members of the ISU Singers.

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA
TIMES-REPUBLICAN
D. 15,000

MAR 1 1972

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

MAR 9 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO, Pops launch tour through midwest

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its mid-western tour in Madison, Wisconsin under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas.

This is the first appearance of the Orchestra in Madison and it launches the 1972 tour season of the Orchestra. Thomas will conduct works of Stravinsky, Beethoven, Glinka and Borodin. From Madison, the Orchestra will travel to Ames, Iowa wo take part in the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Five concerts will be performed in Ames, including one Boston Pops concert under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Both William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony in Ames. From Ames, the Orchestra will travel to Ann Arbor, Michigan where William Steinberg will conduct works of Wagner, Hindemith and Brahms. Then on to Urbana, another first for the Boston Symphony, also under William Steinberg.

The Orchestra will travel to Chicago, where for the first time Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops will be heard. Jeffrey Siegel will be piano soloist with Mr. Fiedler. The Boston Symphony concert in Chicago will be conducted by William Steinberg with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg performing the Ravel Piano concerto in G.

Soloists joining the tour in clude Zino Francescatti, violin, who will perform under Michael Tilson Thomas in Ames; Malcolm Frager, piano, who will perform under Mr. Thomas in Urbana; Eileen Farrell, soprano, who will perform under William Steinberg in Ames; Veronica Tyler, soprano and Robert Hale, baritone, who will perform under Mr. Steinberg in Ames; Doc Severinsen, trumpet, who will perform with Arthur Fiedler in the Pops concert in Ames. The Orchestra's mid-western tour begins in Madison on March 7 and ends in Chicago on March 18.

PRIMGHAR, IOWA
BELL
W. 1,448

MAR 2 1972

71

ISU students in concert

Ames, Iowa — The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member day, (Thursday, March 2) at 1:30 with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p.m. in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

Following are members of the Oratorio Chorus:

PRIMGHAR: Betty Pingel.

SHELDON: Richard L. Haskegaard.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

MAR 10 1972

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY under Michael Tilson Thomas is in the midst of a midwestern tour. They'll be performing in Iowa, Michigan, and Ohio.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,641 SUN. 314,406

MAR 9 1972

Boston Symphony Plays To Large Crowd at ISU

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a nearly full house Wednesday night in the first of their four concerts at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium on the campus of Iowa State University here.

As becomes one of the United States' major orchestras, it did not disappoint and delivered the big sound that only confirmed what already is known and expected of it.

The big disappointment of the evening was the absence of soprano Eileen Farrell, who was to have appeared as soloist with the orchestra in great arias from Wagner's "Tristan Und Isolde" and "Die Gotterdammerung."

REVIEW

Soloist Ill

Miss Farrell became ill and cancelled her appearance a few hours before curtain time Wednesday. She had arrived in Ames Tuesday.

Officials at Stephens Auditorium said she was stricken with flu and may have to stay in Ames several days instead of leaving this morning as planned.

As for Steinberg and the Boston, they received a standing ovation at the end of a program consisting of standards of the permanent repertoire that are among the best-loved and most often performed.

Major Work

The major work was Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 and from the opening measures, the accent by Maestro Steinberg was on a stately, deliberate tempo.

It was a dignified, restrained performance that brought out the heroic proportions of this work, rather more than the humor and the sparkle that is also part of it.

The third movement, for instance, a brilliant piece that Berloz compared to a scene from a witches' Sabbath, dragged somewhat and somehow never carried the listener to the expected climax.

Finest Performance

On the other hand, in the "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, that followed, Steinburg and the orchestra came through with the finest performance of the evening and possibly the finest interpretation of the tone poem that has been heard in a long time.

Its big sound — so Wagnerian in many ways — was fully realized, as were the orchestral nuances that render it such an exquisitly subtle and descriptive piece.

Also impressive was the rendering of the prelude and "Lieberstod" from Wagner's "Triestan Und Isolde" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremburg."

In Tristan, music as delicate as a whisper or a sigh grows to a powerful and compelling crescendo that only a great orchestra could deliver.

Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor, directs a Saturday concert and the final concert Monday.

Also scheduled, and completely sold out, is a concert Friday by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra in ISU's Hilton Coliseum with trumpeter Doc Severinsen as soloist.

The other concerts are all in Stephens Auditorium.

Ames Date for London Symphony

AMES, IA. — The London Symphony, directed by Andre Previn, will appear next year at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium here for the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The London Symphony will perform in a series of four concerts Mar. 29 through Apr. 1, 1973. Soloists appearing with the London Symphony will include violinist Isaac Stern and pianists Alicia de Larrocha and Andre Watts.

ALGONA, IOWA
UPPER DES MOINES
W 6,824

MAR 9 1972

ISU STUDENTS GIVE WORLD PREMIERE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ames, Iowa: The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman, will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

Kirk A. Benson, son of Mr. and Mrs. Delford Benson, is one of the Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus which will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3:00 p.m., in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

The student groups will join with soloists Veronica Tyler and Robert Hale and the orchestra for the Brahms "Requiem," which will be sung in English.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 10 1972

Inside Your Tribune

A 'Rest' for Boston's Visiting Musicians

REHEARSAL AND PRACTICE are in prime position on the agenda of even a traveling orchestra, but spare moments are used for relaxation. Members of the Boston Symphony have been in Iowa only a short time, but they are no strangers to Ames and the surrounding countryside; the "natives" are making sure of that Picture Page

REGISTER PHOTO BY DAVE LEWIS

Symphony Swinger

Robert Karol, a violist with the Boston Symphony, whirls around the dance floor with Mrs. Marlene Herget during a square dance at Memorial Lutheran Church in Ames Thursday night. Karol and several other visiting symphony musicians attended as guests of the Ames Folk Dance Club.

Boston Musicians Relax, See Iowa's Countryside

PAGE ONE

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — The Boston Symphony took time out Thursday to become acquainted with Ames, the Iowa State University campus and Iowa countryside.

With the first of five concerts out of the way, the musicians from Boston were marking time until today when the Boston "Pops" Orchestra and Arthur Fiedler play to a full house in the Hilton Coliseum at 8 p.m. with trumpet player Doc Severinsen as guest soloist.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

One busload of musicians left for the Amana colonies before noon, where they were scheduled to have lunch and take a tour.

The more scientifically minded members of the ensemble stayed in Ames to visit the research reactor of the Ames laboratory of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Farm Tours

Tours of area farms and numerous lunches and dinners at the homes of Ames residents also were on the agenda.

The Ames Folk Dance Club invited orchestra members to attend a square dance Thursday night at Memorial Lutheran Church.

During the course of this Thursday lull, Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor of the symphony, observed a brisk schedule which included meetings with Iowa State University music department faculty and students.

It also was learned that Fiedler is to be honored this morning by receiving honorary membership to the Ames Fire Department.

According to reports, he will be met about 11 a.m. at the Holiday Inn — where he and the Boston Symphony personnel are quartered — and escorted by fire truck to the Hilton Coliseum for the ceremony.

The white-haired conductor's fascination with fire departments and fire trucks has been known for years.

Surprise Gift

On his seventy-fifth birthday in 1964, his wife and son bought him a fire truck as a surprise present, and the Brookline (Mass.) Fire Department presented him with a fireman's hat and coat.

As one story goes, Fiedler one time hastily left a committee meeting by pleading a toothache.

Next morning the local papers carried a photo of a major fire with volunteer fireman Fiedler very much in evidence at the center of firefighting activities.

Fiedler's association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra dates to 1915 when he joined its violin section.

In the late 1920s, he conducted the first of the summer Esplanade Concerts on the banks of Boston's Charles River, and in 1930 he became the regular conductor of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra.

Under his direction, the "Pops" has expanded its repertory to include symphonic and ballet music, opera, waltzes, marches, show tunes and works by contemporary American and European composers.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 10 1972

Musicians enjoy day off in Ames

PAGE ONE

By JOYCE MANCHESTER

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra were very relaxed this morning after spending a day-off on Thursday pursuing interests of their choice.

The main topic of conversation was the sudden push into the limelight of Robert Karol, violinist, whose picture appeared on the front page of the Des Moines Register newspaper Friday morning. He was participating in a square dance, held here Thursday night.

"After being lost in the viola section for many years, it's nice to be famous," laughed Karol. "My picture was even bigger than (Pops conductor Arthur) Fiedler's."

His orchestra friends kidded him that his picture was now going to be on the front page of the New York Times and in all the big papers all over the world.

Many Calls

Karol said that already this morning he had so many calls from Ames residents inviting him to dinner or a social evening "I may have to give up my music for my social life."

"I had never square danced before but it's a hell of a lot of fun."

Eating breakfast with Karol was Malcolm Frager, pianist who is the guest soloist for Saturday night's concert.

Karol took over the reporting job and asked Frager, (who has just returned from four months in Europe, some pertinent questions).

"How many concerts a week do you play?" Karol asked Frager.

"Between three and six," was the answer.

"How do you ever get up for that many concerts?"

"Oh, some are repeats," was the answer.

Helps To Be Surprised

Karol, Frager and cellist Luis Leguia then discussed concerts in general. They said they play so many concerts often they don't know what they're going to play till they open the music.

"That way we're surprised and excited. If we knew we were going to play Beethoven's Fifth, for instance, we might not be all that thrilled."

Other members of the orchestra spent the day off yesterday in various ways.

Henry Portnoi, bass, spent the day with an ISU student, Cheryl Spohndeimer who is also a bass player. She auditioned for him and watched the rehearsal with him.

Portnoi also went swimming at Beyer Hall. "I'm a lousy swimmer, but it's my attempt to keep fit."

Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, went shopping. She found our fashion stores much like the ones back east. "Your store personnel are so helpful. I left a package at Bobby Rogers and they returned it to me already this morning."

Some Good Reading

Mathew Ruggiero, bassonist, spent his time at the ISU Library. His hobby is woodworking. "You have a marvelous collection of books containing information on wood." In the evening he went to dinner at the Charles Sage home. "I made some very good friends."

Leguia, cellist spent his time in rigorous exercise in a six mile bike ride, played tennis for two hours. "Now I have stiff muscles for the pops concert tonight."

Frager, Karol and Leguia, in discussing the concert tonight at the Hilton Coliseum, were high in praise of Doc Severinsen soloist for tonight's concert. "He's phenomenal," they agreed.

The consensus of opinion of the Boston Bunch was "It's fantastic to be treated on tour the same (or better) than you are at home."

Over the coke—

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra told a group attending Iowa State University's Books and Cokes Thursday that the type of perception necessary in music will be different 100 years from now. (Tribune photo by Jim Mone)

Musicians at rest

Malcom Frager, solo pianist, left, gives Luis Leguia, cellist some tips on European tours. Frager has just returned from a concert tour in Europe and Leguia will leave soon for a European tour. Having breakfast with Frager and Leguia, right, was Robert Karol, who is enjoying his sudden surge of fame as a square dancer. (Tribune photos by Joyce Manchester)

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 10 1972

VINTON, IOWA
CEDAR VALLEY TIMES
D. 4,000

MAR 1 1972

ISU CONCERT

TIMESNEWS — The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival. The Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p.m. in the C.Y. Stephens Auditorium. Local students who will participate in the presentation are Rhonda Stevenson of Traer, Iowa State Singers; and Emily F. Lyon, Toledo, Janis J. Stevenson of Traer, Steven D. Meyer of Walker, and Steve Gallaher and Mary Rhinehart of Vinton, Oratorio Chorus.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

FEB 26 1972

Expanded list of attractions for Stephens Auditorium

Broadway musicals, the Iowa State band, symphonies and orchestras, ballets, opera, lecturers, travel films—these are only a few of the events scheduled for C. Y. Stephens Auditorium each year.

Director of the ISU center Richard D. Snyder and manager of the ticket office Martha Schlueter are among the 12 full-time employes at the auditorium. Other employes include a staff of more than 30 ushers in addition to part-time help, said Mrs. Schlueter.

People from all over the state are drawn to attractions at the auditorium, which seats more than 2,700 she said.

"Jesus Christ Superstar," a recent musical brought to the auditorium was sold out for two performances. The Boston Symphony concert series also promises to be highly popular, Mrs. Schlueter said.

C.Y. Stephens was constructed especially so that the handicapped could get in and out of the building, according to Mrs. Schlueter.

"And the auditorium is probably, acoustically, the best building in the area," she added.

REGISTER PHOTO BY DAVE LEWIS

Symphony Swinger

Robert Karol, a violist with the Boston Symphony, whirls around the dance floor with Mrs. Marlene Herget during a square dance at Memorial Lutheran Church in Ames Thursday night. Karol and several other visiting symphony musicians attended as guests of the Ames Folk Dance Club.

Boston Musicians Relax, See Iowa's Countryside

PAGE ONE

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — The Boston Symphony took time out Thursday to become acquainted with Ames, the Iowa State University campus and Iowa countryside.

With the first of five concerts out of the way, the musicians from Boston were marking time until today when the Boston "Pops" Orchestra and Arthur Fiedler play to a full house in the Hilton Coliseum at 8 p.m. with trumpet player Doc Severinsen as guest soloist.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

One busload of musicians left for the Amana colonies before noon, where they were scheduled to have lunch and take a tour.

The more scientifically minded members of the ensemble stayed in Ames to visit the research reactor of the Ames laboratory of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Farm Tours

Tours of area farms and numerous lunches and dinners at the homes of Ames residents also were on the agenda.

The Ames Folk Dance Club invited orchestra members to attend a square dance Thursday night at Memorial Lutheran Church.

During the course of this Thursday lull, Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor of the symphony, observed a brisk schedule which included meetings with Iowa State University music department faculty and students.

It also was learned that Fiedler is to be honored this morning by receiving honorary membership to the Ames Fire Department.

According to reports, he will be met about 11 a.m. at the Holiday Inn — where he and the Boston Symphony personnel are quartered — and escorted by fire truck to the Hilton Coliseum for the ceremony.

The white-haired conductor's fascination with fire departments and fire trucks has been known for years.

Surprise Gift

On his seventy-fifth birthday in 1964, his wife and son bought him a fire truck as a surprise present, and the Brookline (Mass.) Fire Department presented him with a fireman's hat and coat.

As one story goes, Fiedler one time hastily left a committee meeting by pleading a toothache.

Next morning the local papers carried a photo of a major fire with volunteer fireman Fiedler very much in evidence at the center of fire-fighting activities.

Fiedler's association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra dates to 1915 when he joined its violin section.

In the late 1920s, he conducted the first of the summer Esplanade Concerts on the banks of Boston's Charles River, and in 1930 he became the regular conductor of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra.

Under his direction, the "Pops" has expanded its repertory to include symphonic and ballet music, opera, waltzes, marches, show tunes and works by contemporary American and European composers.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 10 1972

Musicians enjoy day off in Ames

PAGE ONE

By JOYCE MANCHESTER

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra were very relaxed this morning after spending a day-off on Thursday pursuing interests of their choice.

The main topic of conversation was the sudden push into the limelight of Robert Karol, violinist, whose picture appeared on the front page of the Des Moines Register newspaper Friday morning. He was participating in a square dance, held here Thursday night.

"After being lost in the viola section for many years, it's nice to be famous," laughed Karol. "My picture was even bigger than (Pops conductor Arthur) Fiedler's."

His orchestra friends kidded him that his picture was now going to be on the front page of the New York Times and in all the big papers all over the world.

Many Calls

Karol said that already this morning he had so many calls from Ames residents inviting him to dinner or a social evening "I may have to give up my music for my social life."

"I had never square danced before but [illegible] a hell of a lot of fun."

Eating breakfast with Karol was Malcolm Frager, pianist who is the guest soloist for Saturday night's concert.

Karol took over the reporting job and asked Frager, (who has just returned from four months in Europe, some pertinent questions).

"How many concerts a week do you play?" Karol asked Frager.

"Between three and six," was the answer.

"How do you ever get up for that many concerts?"

"Oh, some are repeats," was the answer.

Helps To Be Surprised

Karol, Frager and cellist Luis Leguia then discussed concerts in general. They said they play so many concerts often they don't know what they're going to play till they open the music.

"That way we're surprised and excited. If we knew we were going to play Beethoven's Fifth, for instance, we might not be all that thrilled."

Other members of the orchestra spent the day off yesterday in various ways.

Henry Portnoi, bass, spent the day with an ISU student, Cheryl Spohndeimer who is also a bass player. She auditioned for him and watched the rehearsal with him.

Portnoi also went swimming at Beyer Hall. "I'm a lousy swimmer, but it's my attempt to keep fit."

Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, went shopping. She found our fashion stores much like the ones back east. "Your store personnel are so helpful. I left a package at Bobby Rogers and they returned it to me already this morning."

Some Good Reading

Mathew Ruggiero, bassonist, spent his time at the ISU Library. His hobby is woodworking. "You have a marvelous collection [illegible] books containing information on wood." In the evening he went to dinner at the Charles Sage home. "I made some very good friends."

Leguia, cellist spent his time in rigorous exercise in a six mile bike ride, played tennis for two hours. "Now I have stiff muscles for the pops concert tonight."

Frager, Karol and Leguia, in discussing the concert tonight at the Hilton Coliseum, were high in praise of Doc Severinsen soloist for tonight's concert. "He's phenomenal," they agreed.

The consensus of opinion of the Boston Bunch was "It's fantastic to be treated on tour the same (or better) than you are at home."

Over the coke—

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra told a group attending Iowa State University's Books and Cokes Thursday that the type of perception necessary in music will be different 100 years from now. (Tribune photo by Jim Mone)

Musicians at rest

Malcom Frager, solo pianist, left, gives Luis Leguia, cellist some tips on European tours. Frager has just returned from a concert tour in Europe and Leguia will leave soon for a European tour. Having breakfast with Frager and Leguia, right, was Robert Karol, who is enjoying his sudden surge of fame as a square dancer. (Tribune photos by Joyce Manchester)

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 10 1972

VINTON, IOWA
CEDAR VALLEY TIMES
D. 4,000

MAR 1 1972

ISU CONCERT

TIMESNEWS — The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival. The Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p.m. in the C.Y. Stephens Auditorium. Local students who will participate in the presentation are Rhonda Stevenson of Traer, Iowa State Singers; and Emily F. Lyon, Toledo, Janis J. Stevenson of Traer, Steven D. Meyer of Walker, and Steve Gallaher and Mary Rhinehart of Vinton, Oratorio Chorus.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

FEB 26 1972

Expanded list of attractions for Stephens Auditorium

Broadway musicals, the Iowa State band, symphonies and orchestras, ballets, opera, lecturers, travel films—these are only a few of the events scheduled for C. Y. Stephens Auditorium each year.

Director of the ISU center Richard D. Snyder and manager of the ticket office Martha Schlueter are among the 12 full-time employes at the auditorium. Other employes include a staff of more than 30 ushers in addition to part-time help, said Mrs. Schlueter.

People from all over the state are drawn to attractions at the auditorium, which seats more than 2,700 she said.

"Jesus Christ Superstar," a recent musical brought to the auditorium was sold out for two performances. The Boston Symphony concert series also promises to be highly popular, Mrs. Schlueter said.

C.Y. Stephens was constructed especially so that the handicapped could get in and out of the building, according to Mrs. Schlueter.

"And the auditorium is probably, acoustically, the best building in the area," she added.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,731

MAR 1 0 1972

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony.

Steinberg conducts a rehearsal of the Iowa State University student chorus.

After arriving at the Des Moines airport by chartered jet, musicians and instruments were taken to Ames by bus.

Photographed by Thomas DeFeo

The Boston Symphony at ISU

By Lillian McLaughlin

AMES, IA. — Central Iowa this weekend takes on a special glow, and it's more than the burgeoning warmth of spring!

From the east have arrived more than 200 musicians, bringing with them the great sounds of the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras, plus the excitement for Iowans of seeing, meeting, mingling between concerts with so many personalities and so much talent.

The Boston, like the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia at previous Ames Festivals, is getting a bear hug of hospitality from delighted Iowans.

The eyes of the distinguished guests are on the baton for the important musical events, which continue with a "Pops" concert, trumpeter Doc Severinsen, soloist, at 8 p.m. Friday (a sell-out); a symphony concert Saturday, a 3 p.m. Sunday matinee with the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus, and the final concert at 8 p.m. Monday.

In between, the glamorous visitors settled down in informal attire to rehearse; to play tennis, squash, handball, to skate or swim in University facilities. They visit farms, tour about on bikes or cars made available, fraternize with new friends, it's central Iowans' way of saying, "Thank you. Come back again."

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flutist, spent part of her free time practicing.

Cellist Steve Geber relaxed by playing tennis at the Iowa State Armory with fellow musicians.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,200

MAR 11 1972

Next week in Ames . .

PAGE ONE

FILMS AND SPEAKERS

"The Projectionist," at 7 and 9:30 p.m., Sunday, Pioneer Room, Memorial Union. Admission charged.

"Journey With a Friend," film sponsored by Parents for Educated Childbirth, at 7 p.m., Tuesday, youth room of Collegiate Methodist Church.

Architect Paolo Soleri will discuss new concepts in urban planning at 8 p.m., Tuesday, Great Hall, Memorial Union.

Alan A. Johnson, Washington State University, "Responsible Exploitation of the Oceans," at 4:10 p.m., Tuesday, 207 Marston Hall.

"Dial M. for Murder," 7 and 9 p.m., Wednesday, Curtiss auditorium. Admission charged.

MUSIC AND THEATRE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg, with the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard will present a concert at 3 p.m., Sunday, at C.Y. Stephens Auditorium. New York City Opera vocalists Veronica Tyler and Robert Hale will be soloists. Admission charged.

Monday night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas with violinist Zino Francescatti as soloist. Concert begins at 8 p.m. at C.Y. Stephens Auditorium. Admission charged.

WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN
D. 20,500

MAR 1 1972

Boston Symphony To Play in Madison

MADISON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first Madison appearance Tuesday at the University of Wisconsin Pavilion.

The concert is one of 20 to be presented all across the nation this year. Tickets are available at the Memorial Union Theater Box Office, 800 Langdon St., Madison, 53706.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA
NONPAREIL
D. 24,000 S. 24,500

MAR 12 1972

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is visiting Ames this week, with final concerts being presented at 3 p.m. this Sunday and at 8 p.m. Monday.

New York City Opera soprano Veronica Tyler and bass-baritone Robert Hale solo today in Brahms, "Requiem." Also on the program are three selections by William Schuman, featuring the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus.

Monday's concert will include Mahler's Symphony No. 5 and Beethoven's violin concerto, with soloist Zino Francescatti.

The concerts take places in Iowa State's beautiful C.Y. Stephens Auditorium.

LAKE MILLS, IOWA
GRAPHIC
W. 2,780

MAR 1 1972

ISU singers give world premiere

The world premiere of a choral composition by William Schuman will be given by the Iowa State Singers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Sunday, March 12, during the Ames International Orchestra Festival.

The Singers, 70 select voices from the more than 700 students who participate in choral activities at Iowa State, and the 155-member Oratorio Chorus will be featured with the orchestra in the concert beginning at 3 p.m. in the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

Renee Kallheim, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Johnny Kallheim, Lake Mills, and Mary Imlau, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Imlau, Kensett, are members of the Iowa State Singers. Diane Schmidthuber, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Horace Schmidthuber, Emmons, is a member of the Oratorio Chorus.

Schuman, one of America's foremost composers, was commissioned by the University's department of music to write "Mail Order Madrigals" especially for the Iowa State Singers under a grant from J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown.

The March 12 choral concert will be the only matinee performance during the orchestra festival. Evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented March 8, 11 and 13, and the Boston Pops Orchestra will present Pops Night on March 10. Pops Night is sold out but good seats are available for the four symphony concerts.

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA
TIMES-REPUBLICAN
D. 15,000

MAR 11 1972

A free press is the unsleeping guardian of every other right that freemen prize; it is the most dangerous foe of tyranny . . . Sir Winston Churchill.

Iowa's Cultural Growth Demonstrated At Ames

To easterners inclined to view Iowa as strictly a farm state, its people interested only in corn and hogs, the reception given the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of William Steinberg, as Iowa State University's third annual International Orchestra Festival opened at Ames Wednesday night, must have been a revelation.

A packed house in the new C. Y. Stephens Auditorium again showed that Iowans can appreciate the classical in music as Maestro Steinberg, the German-born Jew who came to this country in 1938 because of Adolf Hitler's madness, showed a comparatively rural audience his authentic acquaintanceship, yes, almost a casual approach, to the works of the masters.

He's the first conductor we've ever witnessed who used his foot (via a small jumping act) to bring out his percussion section. Yet he showed the real power of the Boston Symphony in some of the heavy Germanic passages through phrasing and not just volume.

The subtilites of the Boston string sections were magnificent even though the brass on occasion seemed a bit ill-timed to our casual ear. Overall this magnificent orchestra received four curtain calls from an appreciative audience for its infinite precision. It's last performance in Ames is Monday night.

The Boston Orchestra is the third great musical attraction to come to Iowa since the great hall (2,700 seats) for the performing arts was opened at the Iowa State Center. The hall was a gift from a Georgia Baptist preacher's son who turned his ISU dairy industry education into a multi-million dollar estate.

C. Y. Stephens upon his graduation from the then Ames College started his business career here in Marshalltown at the old co-operative dairy. He met and married his wife here. At his untimely auto accident death in 1963, his will left the great bulk of his Eastern seaboard dairy store chain to the then fledgling Iowa State Center conceived by ISU President Emeritus James Hilton.

For the last three years Central Iowans have learned first hand that one doesn't clap between symphony movements; that Wagner penned many melodic poem melodies; that Ludvig Von Beethoven (like most artists) in his life time struggled to have his works accepted and that Richard Wagner's tonal portraits have a recurring martial quality to them. All of these have brought us a long way in the world of "heavy music" when the New York Philharmonic first came to the Stephens' three years ago with its members asking, "The Ames Festival — what is that, and where is it?"

Announcement was made at this festival's first performance last Wednesday night that next year's fourth edition would feature the London Symphony Orchestra with Andre Previn conducting, with Isaac Stern, violinist, Andre Watts, pianist and Alicia de Larrocha, pianist, as soloists. Also appearing at next year's festival, which will be from March 27 to April 1, will be the Berlin Concert Choir (120 voices) and Orchestra and the National Ballet of Washington, D.C.

Yes, it was fun to learn that one of the world's foremost musical directors is indeed a foot stomper when he needs his drums. It sort of makes us ordinary folk, who have only two arms, feel real warm and adequate, too. But in a larger sense, the Boston Symphony and the response it received was further evidence that rural Iowa is indeed growing up culturally.

Conductor Recalls Days When Work Less Harried

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — William Steinberg, musical director of the Boston Symphony, doesn't believe the jet age is contributing much to the cause of symphonic music.

In an interview Friday, the maestro recalled that when he came to this country in 1938 to assist Arturo Toscanini in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra, the climate was more conducive to polished symphonic performances.

William Steinberg
From "Good Climate"

"Climate Good"

Steinberg acknowledged that there is talent among younger men, but added that "the climate was good in my generation because conductors were not as overworked as they are now in this jet age.

Boston Pops Review: PAGE 16

"The conductors today are more often on the airplane than they are on the orchestra podium, whereas in our day the tendency was to sit still, work with ensembles and build up to total performances," Steinberg said.

"There is, of course, a new breed of conductors coming up, but there is no substitute for the old breed, because conducting means conveying experience and you can't convey it if you don't have it," he commented.

Steinberg, who is stepping down as musical director of the Boston Symphony to concentrate more on the Pittsburgh Symphony which he has directed for 20 years, said the burden of being musical director of two major orchestras was becoming too much.

He has a lifelong contract with the Pittsburgh Symphony and he said subscribers there have been complaining.

"Look here, old chap, we have you and we want to enjoy you more often," Steinberg said he was told by his Pittsburgh audience.

Guest Conductor

However, Steinberg emphasized that his responsibilities in Boston are not over. "I'm leaving as music director, but I will be guest conductor for eight weeks in Boston next season," he said.

STEINBERG —
Please turn to Page Four

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 11 1972

He expressed approval of C. Y. Stephens Auditorium on the campus of Iowa State University in Ames, where he conducted the first in a series of five concerts Wednesday night. "It is entirely professional and workable and you should be very proud and happy to have it," he said.

Sunday, Steinberg will be on the podium for a performance by the Boston Symphony and the Iowa State Singers of the "Requiem" by Johannes Brahms with soprano Veronica Tyler and bass-baritone Robert Hale of the New York City Opera as soloists.

Already he has rehearsed with the Iowa State Singers and he is happy with what he heard.

Explaining that he left the podium at one point in order to listen to them from an audience vantage point, he described them as "a young chorus which knows its business very well.

"They are young and they are fresh and they made a very good impression on me," he remarked.

Support From Young

Commenting further about youth, Steinberg said he is immensely pleased with the role of young people in the support of symphonic music. "I find that the interest and the participation of young people in music is growing all the time and we distribute thousands of student tickets each year," he explained.

Friday night, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra performed to a capacity audience in ISU's Hilton Coliseum, with trumpet player Doc Severinsen as soloist.

Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor, directs today's concert with pianist Malcolm Frager as guest soloist, and he is also on the podium at the final festival performance Monday.

The Boston Symphony is the third major orchestra to present a festival series at Iowa State. Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra were featured last year and Seiji Ozawa and the New York Philharmonic before them.

Except for Friday's concert in the Hilton Coliseum, all performances are in Stephens Auditorium.

Des Moines Register
PAGE ONE 3/11/72

REGISTER PHOTO BY FRANK FOLWELL

Fiedler the Fireman

Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler arrives for a rehearsal at Hilton Coliseum in Ames Friday aboard an Ames' Fire Department fire truck. Next to his love for music, Fiedler, 77, is a fire-fighting buff who has his own fire truck and has served as a volunteer fireman. Shown with him is Ames' Fire Chief Ralph Parks who later made the maestro an honorary member of the Ames Fire Department. Fiedler and the orchestra entertained a sell-out crowd at the huge Coliseum Friday night. ANOTHER PICTURE: Page 4.

REGISTER PHOTO

Doc Prepares to Operate

Trumpet player Doc Severinsen, right, of the NBC Tonight Show, goes over music with Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler before Friday night's performance at Iowa State University's Hilton Coliseum in Ames. The trumpeter was guest soloist.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 3 1972

Cool-- Real Cool!

(The Tribune's Iowa News Service)

AMES, IA.—When Doc Severinsen hits those high notes on his trumpet next Friday night during a concert with the Boston Pops Orchestra in Hilton Coliseum here some music lovers might be moved to exclaim, "Cool, man, real cool."

DOC SEVERINSEN

And it will be. For beneath Severinsen's feet the floor will begin cooling at the rate of 10 degrees an hour. This will be necessary because Iowa State plays Air Force in Hilton's first hockey game the following morning.

Unless the cooling begins near the end of the concert the workmen can not freeze the ice or put up the dashboards in time for the 9 a.m. game Saturday.

The Cyclones also will face Air Force at 1 p.m. Sunday after which Hilton Coliseum will be opened for free public skating.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 1 1 1972

TRIBUNE PHOTO BY GEORGE CEOLLA

Refreshments With the Boston Pops

While Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra in the background, two of the listeners in James Hilton Coliseum in Ames Friday night enjoyed snacks, cold drinks and coffee. They are Robert Marcum (left), assistant athletic director at Iowa State University, and Carl Benson of Ames. In all, some 1,500 of the more than 14,000 persons in attendance were seated at tables on the coliseum floor and were served refreshments during the concert, following a custom at pops concerts in Boston. The performance was part of the Ames International Music Festival, which also features the Boston Symphony. Trumpet player Doc Severinson was the featured soloist Friday night.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 73,500 S. 77,500

MAR 9 1972

Red Peppers

By Gus Schrader

● Who said you can't mix some culture with your athletic perspiration? Iowa State will do it Friday night in its new Hilton coliseum at Ames. While music lovers are listening to the famous Boston Pops orchestra, conducted by venerable Arthur Fiedler, coliseum workmen will start freezing ice for Iowa State's first home hockey game the following night.

An I-State news release said the workmen have determined the floor of the arena can be cooled at the rate of about 10 degrees hourly. So in order to chill the floor and allow enough time for spraying the water for hockey ice, refrigerant will begin to course through the tubing beneath the floor during the Boston Pops concert. Concert-goers won't have cold feet, however, because the process won't start until near the concert's finish. "Doc" Severinsen, conductor of the "Tonight" show orchestra, will be guest trumpeter with the Boston Pops.

Iowa State's hockey club has been something of an orphan this season. Because of equipment delays, the coliseum hasn't been used for hockey previously, although workmen froze it once as a trial run. The ISU hockey team has been playing its "home" games at the Des Moines Ice arena.

○ ○ ○

REGISTER PHOTO BY FRANK FOLWELL

Des Moines Register
PAGE ONE 3/11/72

Fiedler the Fireman

Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler arrives for a rehearsal at Hilton Coliseum in Ames Friday aboard an Ames' Fire Department fire truck. Next to his love for music, Fiedler, 77, is a fire-fighting buff who has his own fire truck and has served as a volunteer fireman. Shown with him is Ames' Fire Chief Ralph Parks who later made the maestro an honorary member of the Ames Fire Department. Fiedler and the orchestra entertained a sell-out crowd at the huge Coliseum Friday night. ANOTHER PICTURE: Page 4.

REGISTER PHOTO

Doc Prepares to Operate

Trumpet player Doc Severinsen, right, of the NBC Tonight Show, goes over music with Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler before Friday night's performance at Iowa State University's Hilton Coliseum in Ames. The trumpeter was guest soloist.

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 3 1972

Cool-- Real Cool!

(The Tribune's Iowa News Service)

AMES, IA.—When Doc Severinsen hits those high notes on his trumpet next Friday night during a concert with the Boston Pops Orchestra in Hilton Coliseum here some music lovers might be moved to exclaim, "Cool, man, real cool."

DOC SEVERINSEN

And it will be. For beneath Severinsen's feet the floor will begin cooling at the rate of 10 degrees an hour. This will be necessary because Iowa State plays Air Force in Hilton's first hockey game the following morning.

Unless the cooling begins near the end of the concert the workmen can not freeze the ice or put up the dashboards in time for the 9 a.m. game Saturday.

The Cyclones also will face Air Force at 1 p.m. Sunday after which Hilton Coliseum will be opened for free public skating.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 73,500 S. 77,500

MAR 9 1972

Red Peppers

By Gus Schrader

● Who said you can't mix some culture with your athletic perspiration? Iowa State will do it Friday night in its new Hilton coliseum at Ames. While music lovers are listening to the famous Boston Pops orchestra, conducted by venerable Arthur Fiedler, coliseum workmen will start freezing ice for Iowa State's first home hockey game the following night.

An I-State news release said the workmen have determined the floor of the arena can be cooled at the rate of about 10 degrees hourly. So in order to chill the floor and allow enough time for spraying the water for hockey ice, refrigerant will begin to course through the tubing beneath the floor during the Boston Pops concert. Concert-goers won't have cold feet, however, because the process won't start until near the concert's finish. "Doc" Severinsen, conductor of the "Tonight" show orchestra, will be guest trumpeter with the Boston Pops.

Iowa State's hockey club has been something of an orphan this season. Because of equipment delays, the coliseum hasn't been used for hockey previously, although workmen froze it once as a trial run. The ISU hockey team has been playing its "home" games at the Des Moines Ice arena.

○ ○ ○

Des Moines Tribune
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 113,781

MAR 11 1972

TRIBUNE PHOTO BY GEORGE CEOLLA

Refreshments With the Boston Pops

While Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra in the background, two of the listeners in James Hilton Coliseum in Ames Friday night enjoyed snacks, cold drinks and coffee. They are Robert Marcum (left), assistant athletic director at Iowa State University, and Carl Benson of Ames. In all, some 1,500 of the more than 14,000 persons in attendance were seated at tables on the coliseum floor and were served refreshments during the concert, following a custom at pops concerts in Boston. The performance was part of the Ames International Music Festival, which also features the Boston Symphony. Trumpet player Doc Severinson was the featured soloist Friday night.

SELLOUT FOR BOSTON 'POPS'

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — An avalanche of requests for tickets to the Boston "Pops" Orchestra concert in Hilton Coliseum on the Iowa State University campus Mar. 10 has kept five full-time employes busy for a month.

Their job now is to return checks to people whose orders cannot be filled.

Alvin R. Edgar, director of concerts, said the house has been sold out and "we are returning hundreds of applications and more are coming in every day."

He said the huge Hilton Coliseum has 12,600 regular seats and that an additional 1,400 persons will be seated at tables and chairs on the arena floor where refreshments will be served during the performance.

The Boston "Pops" Night is one of five concerts featured during a music festival that brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Ames Mar. 8 through 13.

Except for Arthur Fiedler and his "Pops" Orchestra, all performances are in C. Y. Stephens Auditorium and Edgar emphasized that only the "Pops" Night is sold out.

"There are good seats still available at all four concerts by the Boston Symphony but they are going rapidly," he said.

As for the "Pops" Night, Edgar said he is receiving a number of irate letters from people who have had to be turned down and who think that the management is holding back on them.

"I'm afraid that we are making some enemies but the fact is that we have done the best we could and ticket applications have been processed chronologically," he said.

Featured soloist with Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" is Doc Severinsen who will be heard in "Trumpet Concerto" by Werle and in "The Brave Bulls" by Monterde.

The program also includes Elgar's "Pomp and Circum-

BOSTON—

Please turn to Page Two

ISU Singers to Perform With Boston Symphony

BOSTON---

Continued from Page One

stance" march; the "Academic Festival Overture" of Brahms and a suite from "Gaite Parisienne."

A rundown of the four concerts by the Boston Symphony follows:

Wednesday, Mar. 8 (8 p.m.), William Steinberg conducting: Beethoven's Symphony No. 5; "Rhine Journey" from Wagner's "Die Gotterdamerung," and, with soprano Eileen Farrell as soloist, "Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" and "Brunnhilde's Immolation" from Wagner's "Die Gotterdamerung."

Saturday Mar. 11 (8 p.m.), Michael Tilson Thomas conducting: Excerpts from Glinka's "A Life for the Czar;" Symphony No. 2 by Borodin and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager as soloist.

Sunday, Mar. 12 (3 p.m.), William Steinberg conducting: Requiem ("Ein Deutsches Requiem") by Brahms with soprano Veronica Tyler and bass baritone Robert Hale as soloists and the Iowa State University Singers and Oratorio Chorus.

Monday, Mar. 13 (8 p.m.), William Steinberg conducting: Overture to Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito;" Symphonic Interludes from "Mathis der Mahler" of Hindemith and Concerto for Violin and Orchestra of Brahms with Zino Francescatti as soloist.

Additional information may be obtained by writing C. Y. Stephens Auditorium or calling the box office, (515) 294-2436.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496
FEB 6 1972

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500
MAR 11 1972

Meeting of the minds

PAGE ONE

Boston Pops performance a crowd-pleaser

Preparations for a solo appearance with a symphony orchestra involves a lot of exchange between those responsible for the performance. Arthur Fiedler (left) conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra and trumpet soloist Doc Severinsen went through this exchange during rehearsal for Friday night's concert. (Tribune photos by Rod Riggs)

By ROD RIGGS

A program packed with selections familiar to nearly everyone in the audience provided a crowd-pleasing evening of musical entertainment at Friday night's concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The more than 15,000 persons packed into Hilton Coliseum for the performance expressed their pleasure by demanding—and receiving—four encores.

The informality of the concert began when conductor Arthur Fiedler marched to the podium to open the performance. Not all of the thousands who attended had reached their seats—some had not even reached the parking lot—and so as the strains of "Pomp and Circumstance" they marched in through the aisles. Some latecomers were still out of step, as they probably were when they heard the march on their graduation day.

Severinsen Displays Excellence

Completing the first portion of the program were Brahms' Academic Festival Overture—a theme from which motion pictures and television have borrowed generously,—and the appearance of trumpet soloist Doc Severinsen to perform a Trumpet Concerto.

The concerto score offered ample opportunity for Severinsen to demonstrate his undeniable talent, and provided a challenging and interesting vehicle for the orchestra itself. The melodic theme was repeated in different voicings, in different sections and at different tempos throughout and ended with an exciting flourish by Severinsen following an exchange led by the percussion section.

BUSY DAY—Trumpet soloist Doc Severinsen (top photo) performed two selections with the Boston Pops Orchestra here last night Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler, a firefighting fan who owns his own fire engine, was made an honorary member of the Ames Fire Department by Fire Chief Ralph Parks during the day. Fiedler also took a look at Cy, the Iowa State mascot and, after the concert, Severinsen, Fiedler, Gov. and Mrs. Robert Ray and ISU President and Mrs. Robert Parks chatted backstage. (Tribune photos by Joyce Manchester and Rod Riggs)

OTTUMWA, IOWA
COURIER
D. 19,500

APR 21 1972

CRESTON, IOWA
NEWS ADVERTISER
D. 6,000

APR 24 1972

It's nice to know you

Ottumwa Courier: An antidote for much of the world's problems is good will.

Here in Iowa we've got it in abundance. We lack a catch phrase like "southern hospitality" to describe it, but our frequent display of it is nonetheless heartwarming.

Here is an illustration: The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently spent a week at Ames. It presented a festival of music that included concerts in the impressive C. Y. Stephens Auditorium, and climaxed it with a Boston Pops concert before a sell-out audience of 15,000 in Hilton Coliseum. That in itself is proof of the effect which the visiting artists had on Iowans.

In their free time, members of the orchestra were treated to a wide variety of contacts with Iowans and their way of life. Remember that many of these musicians had spent all of their lives in the urbanized east, and that most of their tours consist of one-night stands and little opportunity to get the feel of the social climate in other parts of the country.

Now, read what William Moyer, the orchestra's personnel manager, wrote to a friend of ours who serves in the sponsoring organization:

"I've noticed since Ames a marked improvement in the daily spirit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which always has been good but now somehow is even better. You showed us—especially those of you who were at the hospitality desk—a friendliness and warmth that has stayed with us. Good things last, after all. This we've always known. But now nice to see fresh evidence!

"Daily, members of the B.S.O. refer to Ames and nice things that happened there. The nicest of all, of course, was your friendship which we all value so much—which we return with ours."

Backstage at the Pops

By JOYCE MANCHESTER

The sound of 15,000 pairs of hands coming together is not unusual for the Hilton Coliseum.

It is unusual for the Boston Pops Orchestra to hear that sound.

Last night in the coliseum, the Boston Pops orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler played to its largest audience in its history of concerts.

It was also another first, the first appearance of the Boston Pops orchestra in the U.S. outside of Boston. Arthur Fiedler has conducted here other times, but with the Boston Pops Tour Orchestra, not the Boston Pops offshoot of the Boston Symphony.

At home in Symphony Hall, the Pops plays to an audience of about 2,500.

The orchestra members and the backstage personnel of the BSO said innumerable times how amazed they were that 15,000 people would attend a concert and too that this particular concert was sold out months ago.

The concert was scheduled to begin at 8 p.m. However at 8 p.m. thousands of empty seats were still visible and persons wre streaming in all doors of the coliseum. A giant traffic jam, backed up from the Coliseum on Lincoln Way to I-35 caused the delay. Too many patrons tried to wait too long to get there.

Fiedler, however is known for his punctuality. Five minutes he waited—at 8:05 the baton was raised a "Pomp and Circumstance" wafted to the last seat in the last row.

The coliseum was transformed for this one night to a fascimile of Symphony Hall with tables set on the main floor for patrons to enjoy popcorn and soft drinks during the pops concert. The floor normally filled with players benches and scorer's tables was banked with gold drapes, forming an intimate atmosphere for the big arena.

Fiedler, assigned to the Cyclone dressing room, commented, "I've been in halls all over the world and have seen all types of dressing rooms. This one doesn't bother me at all."

Women members of the orchestra were assigned to the Big Eight officials' dressing room. The male orchestra members begin to tell them it was justice—for there are eight women members of the orchestra and the door said "Big Eight" from now on, women members will carry the title, The Big Eight.

In wandering around backstage, I went through the men's dressing room several times prior to the entrance of the men. Later, as I went through, the men were dressing.

"Don't you know this is the men's dressing room?" I was politely asked.

"Yes".

"Well," was the response, "when you've seen one orchestra you've seen them all."

Boston Pops

(Continued from Page One)

Offenbach's familiar suite from "Gaite Parisienne" opened the post-intermission program. The selection is unquestionably a perfect choice for the Pops; indeed, one hearing it cannot help but think of the organization.

In the selections following, a medley of Burt Bacharach tunes, the breadth and depth of the Pops sound provided a demonstration of the way show tunes should sound but rarely do.

Beatles, Swing

Severinsen appeared again as soloist in "The Brave Bulls" demonstrating a different sound and style than in the earlier concerto and displaying a glittering technique, including a finale which brought an exclamation from the orchestra members.

It must be mentioned that Severinson did not disappoint fans who wondered what costume he would affect for his performance. In his first appearance, he wore white flares and a patchwork coat of bright satins and sequins. The second time before the audience he wore a more subdued beige patterned jacket.

The orchestra completed the announced program with three popular tunes, "Hey Jude" by Beatles Lennon and McCartney; "Look what they've done to my song" by European vocalist Melanie (in which the violin sections drew applause with eight measures of vocal ensemble; and Joe Garland's venerable swing era evergreen "In the Mood" which drew prompt response from the over-40's in the audience.

15,000 Salute Orchestra

It was quite a sight to see the 15,000 people in the audience in the standing ovation which followed the completion of the program as printed. Fiedler and the Pops obliged with four encores, the Beatles' lovely "Yesterdays", "El Condor", theme from "Cabaret" and finally, "Stars and Stripes Forever" the exciting piccolo obligatto and final chorus by the standing brass section, both greeted with solid applause.

The concert performance capped a day filled with activity for orchestra members.

Honorary Fireman

A two-hour rehearsal during the afternoon was preceded for Fiedler, by a ride in an Ames fire engine from his motel to the Hilton Coliseum. Then, for the benefit of a small audience and an assemblage of newsmen, Ames Fire Chief Ralph Parks presented Fiedler with a badge and certificate making his appointment as an honorary member of the Ames Fire Department.

Fiedler is known to firefighters all over the country for his interest in fire department and firemen. He said his interest goes back to childhood "in the days when they had horse-drawn vehicles and dalmation dogs". He has helmets from fire departments all over the country, he said, and a few years ago was given his own fire engine as a birthday present by his wife and son.

Even at age 77 he still attends some fires, Fiedler said.

Careful security at the Coliseum prevented many people from attending the rehearsal, but a scattering of students listened. Soloist Severinsen showed up about 1 p.m., to warm up before his participation in the second hour of the practice session. Severinsen wore brown leather flares and short jacket decked with brass hardware, pointed-toe boots and a flowered lavender body shirt to the practice. The outfit was topped by a blue denim topcoat lined with white fleece.

Severinsen Jogs

After the practice, Severinsen went back to his motel to get some running shoes and went to Iowa State to jog for a while. "I want to do it alone; I'm not a very good jogger," he said to those who offered to accompany him.

Orchestra members said they were somewhat apprehensive about the acoustics in the coliseum, but found them "not really great, but not that bad." Only occasionally could a dissonance be detected, and that mostly in the lower tones of the scale. A special sound system installed for the single concert augmented the orchestra for the benefit of listeners in the upper balconies.

In a post-concert comments, the musicians seemed delighted with the reception they received.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 2 1972

The 'Pops'—blend of light and classical

DOC SEVERINSON

Each year when spring comes to Boston, that staid old matron of the musical arts, Symphony Hall, changes her dress. The maroon walls are refurbished with spring green, the floor is filled with green and gold tables and chairs and the stage is decorated with flowers.

Guests arrive to sample refreshments served at the tables and to await the guest of honor. Soon the stage fills with a group of Boston's favorite citizens—the members of the Boston Pops Orchestra. Then the guest of honor strides on stage, calls the orchestra to attention, and the party begins.

The origin of Boston Pops dates back to 1885, but the greatest fame has come since 1930 when Arthur Fiedler became the conductor. The Pops Orchestra has had 17 conductors and Fiddler played viola and violin under six of them before taking up the baton himself.

The Boston-born musician joined the Boston Symphony after World War I, following in the footsteps of his father and two uncles who were violinists with the orchestra.

When he became the Pops conductor, Fiedler's first aim was to serve the traditions of the Pops—the jaunty marches, lilting waltzes and romantic tunes-of-the-day, topped with a helping of the more popular classical music. But he added to this tradition a musicianship and a showmanship which, with recordings and tours, have made the 77-year-old conductor and the orchestra popular far beyond Symphony Hall.

When Pops Night comes to the James H. Hilton Coliseum Friday, March 10, there will be an added attraction, "Doc" Severinsen of the Johnny Carson "Tonight Show." Before he finished high school, Severinsen was playing trumpet in Ted Fiorito's band. After Army service, he was with the Tommy Dorsey, Charlie Barnett and Benny Goodman bands. He joined NBC in 1949, became a member of the Skitch Henderson orchestra on the "Tonight Show" in 1962, and for several years has led the orchestra on the Carson show where he has trumpet excellence, big-band sound and resplendent wardrobe are enjoyed by millions.

Severinsen appeared in the Stephens Auditorium last year with the Now Generation Brass and The Brothers and Sisters.

The lucky 14,000 persons who purchased every seat in the Coliseum will be treated to a typical Pops performance, a happy blend of the light and the classical.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,811 SUN. 514,406

MAR 12 1972

Associate Conductor Gives Powerful Performance

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, was on the podium Saturday night for the third of five concerts in this year's Music Festival at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium on the Iowa State University campus.

Introducing himself to the Ames audience with a vital and expressive rendering of music from Mikhail Glinka's "A Life of the Tsar," he quickly established the fact that he has a great feeling for the big effects.

MALCOM FRAGER — MICHAEL THOMAS

The Glinka composition, with its charming melodic line, was interpreted in a sweepingly lyrical manner and was but a prelude of things to come.

In "Symphony No. 2" by Alexander Borodin, which followed, Thomas fully revealed how very much at home he is with the Russian romantic repertoire.

This is a work full of powerful, epic scenes and sweeping melodies in unison strings, reminiscent of Tchaikovsky.

REVIEW

Thomas, who conducts with a nervous energy quite awesome to behold, extracted every ounce of drama and fire out of the Borodin score.

Second Portion

The second portion of the program was taken up by a most convincing dialogue between the Symphony and pianist Malcom Frager, a virtuoso with a prodigious technique.

Together, they presented a performance of Beethoven's "Concerto No. Four" which was both vital and moving and which took into account — and translated admirably — that which is brilliant and spirited in the Beethoven score.

Frager, who is a winner of both the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Piano Competition and the Leventritt Competition, is a keyboard artist with a clarity and crystal-like purity of tone.

In the brilliant passages of the concluding rondo, not a note was blurred or skimmed over. For all his virtuosity, Frager also demonstrated during the largo of this concerto that he is a pianist whose touch can express tenderness and feeling.

At 3 p.m. today, the Boston Symphony, William Steinberg conducting, presents a concert that features the requiem of Brahms and music by William Schuman. The final concert of the festival is at 8 p.m. Monday with Thomas on the podium and violinist Zino Francescatti as featured soloist.

Orchestra and chorus

Under the baton of William Steinberg, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus performed in concert in C.Y. Stephens Auditorium here Sunday afternoon. (Tribune photo by Rod Riggs)

PAGE ONE

Concert series ends tonight

As members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra neared the end of their sojourn in central Iowa, they continued to be a part of a social whirl here.

The orchestra will present its final concert in the 1972 series 8 p.m. in Stephens Auditorium, under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas.

Violinist Zino Francescatti will be featured soloist for tonight's concert, performing Beethoven's violin concerto in D.

World Premier

Concerts over the weekend included Saturday night's performance with pianist Malcolm Frager and a Sunday afternoon concert with conjunction with the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus, soprano Viletta Sue Ware; Vernoica Tyler who appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra here last year and baritone Robert Hale.

Sunday's program opened with the performance of three works by William Schuman, including the world premier of "Mail Order Madrigals."

The program notes state that Schuman took the text for the Madrigals from the Sears, Roebuck Catalog of 1897, and describes the result as "a bit of Americana."

Fisher's Grant

"Mail Order Madrigals" was commissioned under a grant

See Concert, page 10

Symphony, pianist Frager in 'inspired' performance

Saturday's concert by the Boston Symphony was a classic example of what co-operative enterprises can accomplish under inspired leadership. Not only was the ensemble better than last Wednesday, but the two major selections on the program sounded more inspired.

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas demanded—and received—cooperation in achieving several striking innovations in the Borodin Second Symphony. Most praiseworthy were the spine-tingling rubatos and the intense string unisons.

Thomas is an exciting phenomenon to watch: in the future, with added experience, we hope he will begin to trim away the superfluous gesticulations and excessive choreography on the podium. The musical effect, however, was to breathe freshness into what is after all a rather weak symphony abounding in thematic redundancies.

In contrast to the brilliance of the Borodin, the opening Polonaise and Krakoviak by Glinka were simply trivialities. Yet, here is a young man with obvious vitality and affinity for the Russian composers and the effect on the listeners was worth all the effort.

The highlight of the evening was Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4. The two young men, conductor Thomas and pianist Malcolm Frager, imparted a feeling of unanimity, especially in the second and third movements. The middle movement was a very memorable emotional experience caused in part by a slightly faster tempo than normally heard and a finely-honed clarity in both the piano and string sections. An observable exchange of smiles between both men ushered in a witty and sparkling final rondo; such rapport only reemphasizing my admiration for the virtuousity and sensitivity that had been in evidence throughout the concerto.

We in Ames are extremely fortunate to have had the edifying experience of contrasting this brilliant and clear Beethoven rendition with the equally enjoyable and valid, albeit romantic, Serkin interpretations of the piano sonatas heard in Stephens last month.

In general, the orchestral sonority, despite some intonation problems in the winds, was much more vibrant and (as the colloquial English term puts it) closer to "getting it together."

RuG

by J.W. Fisher, Marshalltown, a frequent benefactor of Iowa State University activities.

Conducted by Iowa State choral director Douglas Pritchard, singers and orchestra also performed Schuman's "Prelude for Voices" and "Carols of Death" with quality certain to have pleased the composer, who was in the audience. Miss Ware contributed substantially to the success of this portion of the concert.

'Superb Performances'

In a more serious and dignified portion of the program, Boston Symphony music director William Steinberg led orchestra and chorus through the Brahms "Requiem." Superb performances by soprano Tyler and baritone Hale added to the overall beauty of the reading.

At the conclusion of the concert, composer Schuman was called to the auditorium stage to share the audience's applause.

Social Activities

Orchestra members today continued to visit central Iowa locations in both organized and informal tours. Some of the musicians went to the Amana colonies during the early days of their stopover here, while others were guests at farm homes here. The farm visits continued today.

A number of the musicians have been guests in homes here during their stay.

The orchestra will not leave immediately after tonight's performance, but will remain here Tuesday. The orchestra has scheduled appearances at Champaign, Ill. and Ann Arbor, Mich. before returning to Boston.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 13 1972

MICHAEL TILSON Thomas is conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its Midwestern tour. Thomas began the tour this week in Madison, Wis., conducting works of Stravinsky, Beethoven, Glinka and Borodin. Thomas has violinist Zino Francescatti as soloist for the program in Ames, Iowa (part of the Ames International Orchestra Festival), and pianist Malcolm Frager will be soloist with the BSO and Thomas in Urbana, Ill. William Steinberg and Arthur Fiedler also are conducting the orchestra on the tour which ends March 18 in Chicago.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112

MAR 10 1972

Music Notes

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 14 1972

Francescatti best of series

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the best of all. Zino Francescatti delivered one of his most stunning interpretations of the Beethoven Violin Concerto ever. The elation and wonder was felt throughout the auditorium (some even attempting an ovation), and the performance deserved every accolade. The brilliance and excitement of the solo violin provided one of those rare ecstatic moments in listening and one which the orchestral strings recognized despite the all-too-frequent clunkers in the winds.

It was unfortunate that the remainder of the program could not measure up to the inspiration of the first half. Having had the satisfaction of participating in the creation of great art, Michael Tilson Thomas and the strings tried valiantly and, at times, brilliantly to overcome the callous disregard for sensitivity so evident in the brasses and percussion. Instead of a powerful brass sonority the audience was lambasted with raucous roars. The only part of the grandiose Mahler Fifth Symphony which was noteworthy was the sensitive reading which the conductor and the strings gave to the Adagietto which begins the third part.

However, we are grateful to Thomas for trying his very best to provide a fitting climax to the festival series.....it was our pleasure that he succeeded with Francescatti. RvG

HUMBOLDT, IOWA
REPUBLICAN
W 4 250

MAR 15 1972

Boston Symphony concert attended by area residents

BODE—Mrs. Etta Saathoff, Mrs. Charles Thatcher and daughter, Cherie, and Mrs. Harry Vestwebber of Goldfield attended the Boston Symphony concert, directed by Arthur Fiedeler, at Hilton Auditorium in Ames Friday evening.

T. M. Aure returned home from his vacation to Sun City, Ariz., where he visited his sister, Helen, Mr. and Mrs. Victor Reid, and to Cudahy, Calif., where he visited his brother, Hartwick. Aure traveled by plane.

Mr. and Mrs. Marcus Rolland joined a group of 250 people who traveled by plane Feb. 19 from Des Moines to Detroit and on to Malaya, Spain. They had reservations at Hotel Pirmanids in Fuengirola, Spain, overlooking the Mediterranean coast. They spent a week in Algiers, Morocco, then back to Granada, Spain, and flew home to Bangor, Me. This area has as many as 25 million visitors a year.

Mr. and Mrs. Arlis Kinseth attended a Fort Dodge area postmasters' meeting at Hillcrest Restaurant at Humboldt Monday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Allan Siebels of Anamosa visited Mrs. Etta Saathoff Sunday. They were enroute home from Cherokee where they attended the Flying Farmers' meeting.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 13 1972

Boston Symphony Shares Spotlight With ISU Groups

PAGE ONE

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra shared the spotlight with the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus Sunday afternoon in the fourth of five concerts of this music festival series at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium on the campus of Iowa State University.

Under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard, director of choral activities at Iowa State, the singers from Ames opened the program with three works by William Schuman including the world premiere of one composition especially commissioned for the Iowa State Singers under a grant from J. W. (Bill) Fisher of Marshalltown.

WILLIAM STEINBERG — W. DOUGLAS PRITCHARD

Steinberg and the Boston Symphony were then heard with the two Ames choral groups in a performance of "A German Requiem" by Brahms.

"Mail Order Madrigals," the Schuman composition which received its premiere performance Sunday, is described by the composer as a "bit of Americana" and words to the madrigals are based on texts from the Sears, Roebuck Catalog of 1897.

The words celebrate a skin ointment, a hair remover, a sleeping potion and a cure-all pill for weak women which promises to take care of "all diseases arising from a poor and wasted condition of the blood."

REVIEW

Not lofty and literary as some of Schuman's other sources, the texts of the four madrigals are set to music which is forceful and direct and yet extremely humorous and expressive.

Complex Vignettes

They are really quite complex little vignettes which at times affect a seriousness and fervor in the mock heroic tradition and at other times revert to an openly humorous style.

Pritchard and the chorus also performed Schuman's lovely "Prelude for Voices" of 1940 with text taken from "Look Homeward Angel" by Thomas Wolfe and "Carols of Death," a haunting three-piece composition based on poetry by Walt Whitman.

The composer, who was in the audience, has every reason to be happy with the way his choral works were presented.

With Pritchard in firm control throughout, the vocalists performed with freshness and flair and special mention should go to Viletta Sue Ware, a soprano with a slender voice of great charm.

The rest of the program was taken up by a strong and dignified but restrained reading of the Brahms Requiem in which emphasis was placed on the serenity of the work.

Beautiful Response

The youthful choir members responded beautifully to Steinberg's baton and the two soloists were superb.

They were soprano Veronica Tyler, a singer whose voice is rich and warm, and bass-baritone Robert Hale who has power and range and magnificent resonance in the lower registers.

The final concert by the Boston Symphony will be at 8 p.m. today with Michael Tilson Thomas on the podium and violinist Zino Francescatti as guest soloist.

The program consists of Beethoven's Violin Concerto and the Symphony No. 5 by Mahler.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 14 1972

Symphony Highlight In Final Concert

By Nick Baldwin
(Register Staff Writer)

AMES, IA. — The final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday night at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium on the campus of Iowa State University turned out to be the highlight of this year's music festival.

On the podium was Michael Tilson Thomas, 27-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, and the soloist was violinist Zino Francescatti.

The performance of Francescatti with the symphony in the Beethoven violin concerto has to be heard to be believed, because what he does with his bow is just about superhuman.

He set the pace in the first movement of this concerto, an intensely lyrical piece with awesome bravura passages for the solo instrument.

REVIEW

Astounding Mastery

This violinist's playing combined a feeling for the singing qualities of the score with astrounding mastery of what must be insurmountable difficulties for all but a handful of violinists in any given generation.

And with Francescatti, all this flows as though it were completely natural and ordinary.

He produces beautiful, pure sounds, no matter what the demands of the score are, and this is one score where the demands are fantastic.

Having attended all four concerts by the Boston Symphony, I can say without any qualification that this performance of the Beethoven Concerto was the high point of the series.

Thomas, who is an exciting conductor, led the Boston in a performance that was memorable for its sweet and sharp definition.

Romantic Work

Since witnessing Thomas conduct an earlier performance Saturday, the word romantic keeps coming back to mind, and that certainly is an appropriate way to describe the way that he led the symphony in the Symphony No. 2 of Alexander Borodin that night.

He has a way of bringing out the singing qualities of the orchestra choirs and of accentuating the dramatic elements of the score, in what is an essentially romantic manner.

Monday night these qualities were again much in evidence, and especially so in his conducting of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5 with which the program ended.

It was a remarkable performance in which Thomas brought out all the big sounds of the Mahler, orchestration as well as the lyricism of his work.

It would have been even better had Thomas somehow been able to bring out all this with less gesturing.

Some Distraction

There were times when his flamboyant manner became so fascinating in itself as to be distracting.

Monday night's performance ended the third annual Ames International Music Festival which last year saw Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the year before the New York Philharmonic under Seiji Ozawa.

Five Concerts

This year's festival started last Wednesday night and featured four concerts by the Boston Symphony and one pops concert with Arthur Fiedler on the podium.

Alvin Edgar, director of concerts at C. Y. Stephens Auditorium, said this year's festival has been the most successful of the three, with about 98 per cent of the house sold for the five performances.

Edgar also said that there is an unprecedented advance interest in next year's festival which brings the London Symphony and its conductor, Andre Previn, to Ames in a series of four concerts Mar. 29 to Apr. 1.

Soloists appearing with the London Symphony will include violinist Isaac Stern and pianist Andre Watts and Alicia de Larrocha.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 16 1972

. . .and more to come

If there were any doubts about the impact of the Iowa State Center on this region, the last two weeks should have dispelled those doubts. Consider what has been happening here during that time:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra performed four concerts in the C.Y. Stephens Auditorium and the Boston Pops Orchestra presented another in the James H. Hilton Coliseum. The total audience for the five performances was 25,000. The pops concert was the first ever done by the orchestra in the United States outside of Boston and drew the largest indoor audience in the history of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

At the same time that the Boston Symphony was performing Saturday and Sunday in the Stephens Auditorium, the first hockey games in Iowa State University history were being played in the Hilton Coliseum. The two matches of the ISU Hockey Club and the Air Force Academy brought a combined audience of 7,500. After the matches, the Coliseum was open for free public skating and more than 1,600 persons took advantage of the opportunity to glide around the ice.

The Iowa State basketball team closed out its home season on Monday of last week with Nebraska in a game that attracted 11,500 to the Coliseum. Now the NCAA Midwest Regional Basketball Tournament is in progress there, and the Thursday and Saturday sessions will be attended by more than 21,000 persons.

Quick arithmetic thus indicates that about 67,000 persons will have attended events at the Iowa State Center during March 6-18. That's the equivalent of having every one in Story County attend an event in the Center during that time. But of course the audiences aren't limited to this county; people came from all over the Midwest for the concerts and the NCAA tournament crowds include spectators from even more distant places.

In the midst of all this activity, ground was broken for the Little Theater, a 424-seat auditorium that will be the third unit at the Center. Now architects are beginning plans for the Continuing Education Building to serve the University's short courses and conferences that even now bring 30,000 persons annually to the campus. That figure will go even higher when the new facility is available.

Apart from the educational and entertainment impact of the Center, there is no mistaking its economic contribution to the community. A lot of rooms have been occupied and a lot of meals consumed by out-of-town visitors during these two weeks.

This period has only demonstrated what is in store for this region when all four buildings are in use, often simultaneously.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
MICHIGAN DAILY
D. 9,500

MAR 15 1972

Boston Players

By DONALD SOSIN

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players gave an altogether wonderful concert in Rackham last night, sponsored by the University Musical Society.

Two string trios formed the central portion. The first was Schoenberg's, written in 1946. It is a highly complex twelve-tone work, but is nonetheless expressive in terms that hearken back to the turn of the century and the end of the romantic period. The trio played with the ease and assurance that comes from performing the work often. One missed in the first part, however, the precision of rhythmic figures that is so characteristically Schoenbergian.

Beethoven's Trio Op. 9, No. 3 followed; it contains vestiges of earlier piano trios while foreshadowing the string quartets to come. The slow movement was jammed somewhat by the woodwinds warming up beneath the stage, and it bothered the musicians enough for Joseph Silverstein to rise and call down to his colleagues, "This is a string trio!" causing no end of amusement in the audience. The trio went on without further interruption, topping a typically terrific Scherzo with a furious Finale. The only hitch was in balance: the viola frequently muffled the violin. Perhaps Silverstein was being too cautious. There was no need to be, as Burton Fine and Jules Eskin were clearly heard throughout.

The concert opened with an innocuous Quartet for Bassoon and Strings in B-flat by the eighteenth-century composer Franz Danzi. What differentiates this work form chamber works of Haydn or Mozart is its predictability. Nevertheless, it fell gently on the ear and was given a smooth reading by Sherman Walt and the string players.

Heitor Villa-Lobos will not be remembered for his Woodwind Quartet (1928). One looks for the Brazilian tunes that made him well-known, and finds little more than studious patterns that occasionally work well, but too often confirm the expectations of those who left before the work was played.

For more fine Boston musicianship, the whole orchestra is in Hill Auditorium tonight under William Steinberg.

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 38,589

MAR 16 1972

Boston Symphony Rather Uninspired

By A. R. Keller
(News Music Critic)

The Boston Symphony and its permanent conductor William Steinberg played and all German program last night in Hill Auditorium with less than extraordinary results. There was the Wagner Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Hindemith symphony "Mathis der Maler," and the Brahms Fourth Symphony.

There was nothing disappointing in the proceddings, but there were few moments of real inspiration either. The fault did not lie with the orchestra (but then it rarely does). They at no time played other than as thoroughly professional and disciplined musicians. They are precise, refined and sublte in execution and they are a joy to hear.

There was much to admire in Mr. Steinberg's performances, but a times I confess that he bored me. And since this is a serious accusation I shall have to try and defend it. He is conservative and a trifle academic in approach. There is nothing out of place in his readings, and they are models of clarity and well-thoughoutness. But he is without much imagaination or real eloquence (ponderous is usually as close as he comes to the latter), and is lacking in either charm or sophistication.

The Wagner Prelude suffered most. It was heavy-handed and without much rhythmic variety. What it needed was elsasticity rather than so many pronounced downbeats. It all sounded as if the Rhine ladies had gotten into the wrong opera.

The Hindemith piece went better. Steinberg's performance did justice to the contrapuntal complexity of it, and he found more of interest in St. Anthony's problems than is usual. It did not sound very impassioned, but Hindemith, in spite of the seriousness of the operatic subject from which this "symphony" is drawn, is no more impassioned here than he normally is.

I had few reservations about the performance of the Brahms symphony which ended the program. For one thing, it sounded fresh, and a lot of this was due to the avoidance of unnecessary denseness in texture or sorority. There was more relaxation in line and less rigidity in pulse as well. The last two movements were, in fact, marvellously played, the one with vitality and motion, the other with a real sense of urgengy. But it was long in coming.

The Detroit News
D. 639,703 SUN. 850,078

MAR 14 1972

Correction

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players was incorrectly announced in Sunday's News. The concert is at 8:30 tonight in Rackham Auditorium, Ann Arbor. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, will play tomorrow night at Hill Auditorium, starting at 8:30.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
MICHIGAN DAILY
D. 9,500

MAR 16 1972

Boston Orchestra: Pleasurable chills

By DONALD SOSIN

The closing chords of Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor brought a rousing ovation from the audience in Hill Auditorium last night as the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its University Musical Society concert under the direction of William Steinberg.

The program also included Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg and the symphony "Mathis der Maler" by Hindemith, all standard fare calculated to make a strong impression. I would have loved something more out-of-the-way, though. Like a Toch symphony, perhaps.

Critics who have recently complained that the orchestra shows a need for some discipline would have repeated their statements after last night's performance. There were some uneven spots, curious cut-offs and a lack of tight ensemble that was all the more evident for the few climactic moments where everything was just right. The orchestra's sound still causes pleasurable chills and under Steinberg's masterful hand there is sweep and drive that make the inattention to details annoying, when one realizes what potential the group possesses.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 16 1972

ON RECORD—Two Boston men, Jordan Whitelaw, (foreground) and Richard L. Akaye see and hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the control booth high in the rear of Stephens Auditorium. They recorded all four concerts for station WCRB, Boston, to be part of a series of 52 weekly music programs. Central Iowans will be able to hear the series over a local station beginning late next fall. (Tribune photo by Rod Riggs)

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373

MAR 16 1972

Bostonians at Ann Arbor

Symphony Offers 'Heavy' Fare But It's Called Invigorating

By JAMES E. HARVEY
Journal Music Critic

ANN ARBOR — A weighty but invigorating program of staples from the German repertoire was served to a packed Hill Auditorium here Wednesday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of William Steinberg.

The justly renowned, often recorded orhcestra played Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" symphony, and Brahms's symphony No. 4 in E minor.

Although scattered small rough spots came as a bit of a shock, the musicians were pliant and cohesive under Steinberg's baton.

The German-born conductor, eschewing scores in performance, exhibited a no-nonsense style where every gesture counted. To bring out the middle string parts in the Wagner, for instance, Steinberg abruptly waved down the first violins with his left hand, immediately thrusting it forward at the seconds.

He could have brought the turn-off motion into use against the brass near the end of the prelude where they obliterated the strings.

Such scrupulous attention to detail was sometimes amusing, as when he cued in the triangle in the same piece by forming an angle with the fingers of his left hand and moving the baton vigorously across it.

Steinberg elicited much warmth from the ensemble, as in the "Entombment" section of the Hindemith and the second and fourth movements of the Brahms. The latter was taken quite deliberately, with strict separation of phrases in the earlier passages of the movement.

But the cautious face presented by the last movement was offset by an especially peppy rendition of the Allegro giocoso movement which preceded it.

"Mathis der Maler," the least familiar of the three works, had no trouble holding its own. Although its rich contrapuntal writing got the clarity it deserved, that did not interfere with the work's emotional power: You don't need to build sweeping lines to generate emotion in such music.

The first movement, "Angelic concert," was a brilliant tribute to the painting which inspired it. The final section, "Temptation of St. Anthony," was endowed with restless energy that slowed to a lush string choir passage after the main theme.

In the same movement, Steinberg's rapport with the Bostonians was further evident in the way he allowed a serene chorale played by the woodwinds to emerge above the full orchestra. This enabled the resounding "Amen" in the brass to be a noble rather than simply splendid conclusion.

William Steinberg

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
MICHIGAN DAILY
D. 9,500

MAR 15 1972

Boston Players

By DONALD SOSIN

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players gave an altogether wonderful concert in Rackham last night, sponsored by the University Musical Society.

Two string trios formed the central portion. The first was Schoenberg's, written in 1946. It is a highly complex twelve-tone work, but is nonetheless expressive in terms that hearken back to the turn of the century and the end of the romantic period. The trio played with the ease and assurance that comes from performing the work often. One missed in the first part, however, the precision of rhythmic figures that is so characteristically Schoenbergian.

Beethoven's Trio Op. 9, No. 3 followed; it contains vestiges of earlier piano trios while foreshadowing the string quartets to come. The slow movement was jammed somewhat by the woodwinds warming up beneath the stage, and it bothered the musicians enough for Joseph Silverstein to rise and call down to his colleagues, "This is a string trio!" causing no end of amusement in the audience. The trio went on without further interruption, topping a typically terrific Scherzo with a furious Finale. The only hitch was in balance: the viola frequently muffled the violin. Perhaps Silverstein was being too cautious. There was no need to be, as Burton Fine and Jules Eskin were clearly heard throughout.

The concert opened with an innocuous Quartet for Bassoon and Strings in B-flat by the eighteenth-century composer Franz Danzi. What differentiates this work form chamber works of Haydn or Mozart is its predictability. Nevertheless, it fell gently on the ear and was given a smooth reading by Sherman Walt and the string players.

Heitor Villa-Lobos will not be remembered for his Woodwind Quartet (1928). One looks for the Brazilian tunes that made him well-known, and finds little more than studious patterns that occasionally work well, but too often confirm the expectations of those who left before the work was played.

For more fine Boston musicianship, the whole orchestra is in Hill Auditorium tonight under William Steinberg.

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 38,589

MAR 16 1972

Boston Symphony Rather Uninspired

By A. R. Keiler
(News Music Critic)

The Boston Symphony and its permanent conductor William Steinberg played and all German program last night in Hill Auditorium with less than extraordinary results. There was the Wagner Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Hindemith symphony "Mathis der Maler," and the Brahms Fourth Symphony.

There was nothing disappointing in the proceddings, but there were few moments of real inspiration either. The fault did not lie with the orchestra (but then it rarely does). They at no time played other than as thoroughly professional and disciplined musicians. They are precise, refined and sublte in execution and they are a joy to hear.

There was much to admire in Mr. Steinberg's performances, but a times I confess that he bored me. And since this is a serious accusation I shall have to try and defend it. He is conservative and a trifle academic in approach. There is nothing out of place in his readings, and they are models of clarity and well-thoughoutness. But he is without much imagaination or real eloquence (ponderous is usually as close as he comes to the latter), and is lacking in either charm or sophistication.

The Wagner Prelude suffered most. It was heavy-handed and without much rhythmic variety. What it needed was elsasticity rather than so many pronounced downbeats. It all sounded as if the Rhine ladies had gotten into the wrong opera.

The Hindemith piece went better. Steinberg's performance did justice to the contrapuntal complexity of it, and he found more of interest in St. Anthony's problems than is usual. It did not sound very impassioned, but Hindemith, in spite of the seriousness of the operatic subject from which this "symphony" is drawn, is no more impassioned here than he normally is.

I had few reservations about the performance of the Brahms symphony which ended the program. For one thing, it sounded fresh, and a lot of this was due to the avoidance of unnecessary denseness in texture or sorority. There was more relaxation in line and less rigidity in pulse as well. The last two movements were, in fact, marvellously played, the one with vitality and motion, the other with a real sense of urgengy. But it was long in coming.

The Detroit News
D. 639,703 SUN. 850,078

MAR 14 1972

Correction

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players was incorrectly announced in Sunday's News. The concert is at 8:30 tonight in Rackham Auditorium, Ann Arbor. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, will play tomorrow night at Hill Auditorium, starting at 8:30.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
MICHIGAN DAILY
D. 9,500

MAR 16 1972

Boston Orchestra: Pleasurable chills

By DONALD SOSIN

The closing chords of Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor brought a rousing ovation from the audience in Hill Auditorium last night as the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its University Musical Society concert under the direction of William Steinberg.

The program also included Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg and the symphony "Mathis der Maler" by Hindemith, all standard fare calculated to make a strong impression. I would have loved something more out-of-the-way, though. Like a Toch symphony, perhaps.

Critics who have recently complained that the orchestra shows a need for some discipline would have repeated their statements after last night's performance. There were some uneven spots, curious cut-offs and a lack of tight ensemble that was all the more evident for the few climactic moments where everything was just right. The orchestra's sound still causes pleasurable chills and under Steinberg's masterful hand there is sweep and drive that make the inattention to details annoying, when one realizes what potential the group possesses.

AMES, IOWA
TRIBUNE
D. 8,500

MAR 16 1972

ON RECORD—Two Boston men, Jordan Whitelaw, (foreground) and Richard L. Akaye see and hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the control booth high in the rear of Stephens Auditorium. They recorded all four concerts for station WCRB, Boston, to be part of a series of 52 weekly music programs. Central Iowans will be able to hear the series over a local station beginning late next fall. (Tribune photo by Rod Riggs)

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373

MAR 16 1972

Bostonians at Ann Arbor

Symphony Offers 'Heavy' Fare But It's Called Invigorating

By JAMES E. HARVEY
Journal Music Critic

ANN ARBOR — A weighty but invigorating program of staples from the German repertoire was served to a packed Hill Auditorium here Wednesday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of William Steinberg.

The justly renowned, often recorded orhcestra played Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" symphony, and Brahms's symphony No. 4 in E minor.

Although scattered small rough spots came as a bit of a shock, the musicians were pliant and cohesive under Steinberg's baton.

The German-born conductor, eschewing scores in performance, exhibited a no-nonsense style where every gesture counted. To bring out the middle string parts in the Wagner, for instance, Steinberg abruptly waved down the first violins with his left hand, immediately thrusting it forward at the seconds.

He could have brought the turn-off motion into use against the brass near the end of the prelude where they obliterated the strings.

Such scrupulous attention to detail was sometimes amusing, as when he cued in the triangle in the same piece by forming an angle with the fingers of his left hand and moving the baton vigorously across it.

Steinberg elicited much warmth from the ensemble, as in the "Entombment" section of the Hindemith and the second and fourth movements of the Brahms. The latter was taken quite deliberately, with strict separation of phrases in the earlier passages of the movement.

But the cautious face presented by the last movement was offset by an especially peppy rendition of the Allegro giocoso movement which preceded it.

"Mathis der Maler," the least familiar of the three works, had no trouble holding its own. Although its rich contrapuntal writing got the clarity it deserved, that did not interfere with the work's emotional power: You don't need to build sweeping lines to generate emotion in such music.

The first movement, "Angelic concert," was a brilliant tribute to the painting which inspired it. The final section, "Temptation of St. Anthony," was endowed with restless energy that slowed to a lush string choir passage after the main theme.

In the same movement, Steinberg's rapport with the Bostonians was further evident in the way he allowed a serene chorale played by the woodwinds to emerge above the full orchestra. This enabled the resounding "Amen" in the brass to be a noble rather than simply splendid conclusion.

William Steinberg

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
MICHIGAN DAILY
D. 9,500

MAR 16 1972

PAGE ONE

Brahms and Co. at Hill

—Daily—David Margolick

With arms flailing, Conductor William Steinberg leads the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra before a packed house at Hill Auditorium last night. A review of last night's concert appears on Page 2 today.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492

MAR 16 1972

William Steinberg Conducting

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert In Ann Arbor

4,000 Pack Into Hill Auditorium To Hear Pieces By Wagner, Hindemith, Brahms

Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg ..... Wagner
Symphony "Mathis der Maler" ..... Hindemith
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, opus 98 ..... Brahms
The Boston Symphony Orchestra
William Steinberg conducting

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — Some 4,000 persons jammed into Hill Auditorium Wednesday evening to listen to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of its music director, William Steinberg, who will retire from his orchestra at the end of this season.

Having heard the BSO only at Tanglewood in the Berkshires during the past several summers, but remembering it from the days under Koussevitzky and Muench in Boston, I looked forward to hearing it again indoors and also to greeting many friends, especially Mr. Steinberg, whom I last heard conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra opening last summer's Saratoga season. Neither I nor the audience was disappointed.

Very much on the contrary: I don't recall ever hearing the BSO sound so lush, so sumptuous of sound. With most major orchestras, one can at times single out one or the other choir as having been especially good. That was impossible Wednesday night, as the brasses sounded like Rembrandt's burnished golden-yellow, particularly in the Wagner and Hindemith, the strings sounded gorgeous particularly in the Brahms, and the woodwinds adding their sensitive voices whenever needed.

Mr. Steinberg, looking well after his prolonged illness, seems to expend little energy, but those who have worked with him know the immense and intense inwardness of the man, paying close attention to every detail yet merging it all into the great arch, the great line which gives meaning to the music.

As programs go, this was standard fare. The surprise is always that under the baton of a knowing conductor, nothing is ever merely standard fare.

And so it was Wednesday night. Few can conduct Wagner so "ur-deutsch",i.e. genuinely Germanic, as does Mr. Steinberg. The Meistersinger Prelude had clarity, precision, and was beautifully shaped. It was a luxurious reading, and an excellent opener for the Hindemith to follow.

The Hindemith work remains, as it was at its initial hearing, a masterful mutation of the visual threnody of Matthias Gruenewald's Isenheim altarpieces: Angelic Concert with its joyousness, Entombment with its melancholy, and The Temptation of St. Anthony with its medieval and oppressive visions and spiritual struggle. It was truly an inspired work, deeply felt, intensely dramatic, an example of superb craftsmanship — despite its linear counterpoint, that gave it a modern but actually an archaic sound as well. It had a massiveness, a solidity about it that smacks of something absolutely lasting.

Mr. Steinberg gave it a beautifully proportionate reading with an expansive thrust. And Hindemith followed Wagner in the tapestry of the orchestration very well. In the audience there was attentive, young Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the BSO, who is to conduct the work tonight in Urbana, Ill.

After intermission came the mighty E minor symphony by Brahms, his last. It was hard to realize that the premiere of the work was greeted with anything but enthusiasm, especially last night, when it received such a glowing, noble reading. Mr. Steinberg took the slow movement (the second, marked andante moderato) in a meditative theme. The allegro giocoso was delightful and the final theme and variations were played energico e passionato. Mr. Steinberg varied the pace of some of the variants, taking some a little slower than usual, letting them sing out and soar while others were taken a little faster, with the contrasts thus becoming more effective.

And there were beautiful soloistic interludes, such as the superb playing of flutist Doriot Dwyer and oboist Ralph Gomberg. The whole reading had a spaciousness about it which emphasized the stupendous character of this symphony.

And if there was ever any doubt that the BSO vies justifiably for the very top among America's great orchestras, they were once again dispelled. A memorable performance indeed!

Applause from Iowa

The morning dawned gray and chill. An occasional sprinkling of rain seemed symbolic as three buses filled with members of tht Boston Symphony Orchestra. Slowly a small gathering ~~of people~~ assembled to say goodbye to newly-found friends who had been a vital part of our community for the week of March 8-14.

The small group was only a tiny segment of Ames, Iowa, which celebrated its third annual International Orchestra Festival with five concerts by the BSO under the batons of William Steinberg, Arthur Feidler, and Michael Tilson Thomas.

The faces of the assemblage expressed more vividly than words can the impact your orchestra made in our lives. It was a terrific experience in many ways, musically and socially. The people of Ames appreciate the pride your city must have not only for the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but for the warm, friendly people of the orchestra who so generously shared themselves with us.

I think I speak for many people in our town when I say thank you. Boston can never be a remote big Eastern city again.

SUZANNE ZAFFARANO
Ames, Iowa

The News Gazette
Champaign-Urbana
D. 36,881 SUN. 38,032

MAR 12 1972

Boston Symphony Plays Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in concert in the Great Hall of the Krannert Center for the Performing Arts Thursday at 8 p.m.

The orchestra will perform "Egmont" Overture and Concerto No. 4 in G Major for Piano and Orchestra by Beethoven; Symphonie "Mathis der Maler" by Hindemith, and "La Valse" by Ravel.

The orchestra will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas; pianist Malcolm Frager will be soloist in the concerto.

Tickets for the Star Course extra concert are available from the Krannert Center box office at $7.50, $7 and $6.50 for the public; $6.50, $6 and $5.50 for students.

The familiar and highly dramatic "Egmont" was written as the overture to incidental music for a drama by Goethe.

Concerto No. 4 is usually considered to be the most introspective and lyrically beautiful of Beethoven's five piano concertos. It is a richly melodic work which avoids flashiness and depends on the lyrical talents of the performer.

Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis der Maler," is one of his most widely performed works. It is derived from the opera of the same title, but reworked in an abstract way.

"La Valse" supposedly was written as a satire on the Viennese waltz, but turned out to be one of Ravel's greatest works. It is a sweeping work with a sardonic quality, bringing waltz writing to a dramatic climax.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the orchestra was born in Hollywood in 1944. As accomplished pianist, he played in the classes of cellist Gregor Piatigorsky and prepared the orchestra for the Heifetz-Piatigorsky concerts in 1968.

As early as 1966, he was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez at the Bayreuth Festival, and in the Ojai (California) Festival in 1967. In 1968 and 1969 he was conductor of the Ojai Festival.

He has conducted the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, the Rochester Philharmonic, the Buffalo Symphony, the London Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, among others.

He has received many honors and awards including the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize, Berkshire Music Center (1968), and an honorary doctor of fine arts degree from Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y.

Pianist Malcolm Frager made his debut as soloist with the St. Louis Symphony at the age of 10, and made his Town Hall debut in New York before he was 20. He won several important musical prizes while a student of languages at Columbia University.

In 1959 he won the Leventritt Award in New York and the first prize at the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Piano Competition in Brussels.

He has performed with many important orchestras including the Royal Philharmonic, the London Symphony, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony, Pittsburgh Symphony and the American Symphony.

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS.
14,900

MAR 17 1972

New England Newsclip

SOCIALLY YOURS . . .

Lillian

"The Garden of the Finzi-Continis" is shown five times daily at the Exeter Theatre in Boston. . .

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its mid-western tour in Madison, Wisconsin under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas. This is the first appearance of the Orchestra in Madison and it launches the 1972 tour season of the Orchestra. Mr. Thomas will conduct works of Stravinsky, Beethoven, Glinka and Borodin. From Madison, the Orchestra will travel to Ames, Iowa to take part in the Ames International Orchestra Festival. Five concerts will be performed in Ames, including one Boston Pops concert under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Both William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony in Ames. From Ames, the Orchestra will travel to Ann Arbor, Michigan where William Steinberg will conduct works of Wagner, Hindemith and Brahms. Then on to Urbana, another first for the Boston Symphony, also under William Steinberg. Then the Orchestra will travel to Chicago, where for the first time Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops will be heard. Jeffrey Siegel will be piano soloist with Mr. Fiedler. The Boston Symphony concert in Chicago will be conducted by William Steinberg with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg performing the Ravel Piano concerto in G.

Soloists joining the tour include Zino Francescatti, violin, who will perform under Michael Tilson Thomas in Ames; Malcolm Frager, piano, who will perform under Mr. Thomas in Urbana; Eileen Farrell, soprano, who will perform under William Steinberg in Ames; Veronica Tyler, soprano and Robert Hale, baritone, who will perform under Mr. Steinberg in Ames; Doc Severinsen, trumpet, who will perform with Arthur Fiedler in the Pops concert in Ames.

The Orchestra's mid-western tour begins in Madison on March 7 and ends in Chicago on March 18. It offers fans of Arthur Fiedler and the Pops and the Boston Symphony Orchestra an opportunity to see, many for the first time, the Pops and Symphony live and in action.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

APR 2 1972

New England Newsclip

CLINTON, ILL.
JOURNAL AND PUBLIC
D. 4,000

MAR 13 1972

Symphony Concert At Krannert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in concert in the Great Hall of the Krannert Center for the Performing Arts, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, Thursday, March 16 at 8 p. m.

The orchestra will perform "Egmont" Overture and Concerto No. 4 in G Major for Piano and Orchestra by Beethoven: Symphonie "Mathis der Maler" by Hindemith, and "La Valse" by Ravel. The orchestra will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and pianist Malcolm Frager will be soloist in the concerto.

Tickets for the Star Course extra concert are available from the Krannert Center box office at $7.50, $7.00 and $6.50 for the public; $6.50, $6.00 and $5.00 for students.

CHICAGO
today
AMERICAN
Always on Top of the News
D. 429,052 SUN. 434,103

MAR 6 1972

NEWS AND NOTES: Most of this year's summer festivals will look and sound alike [conductors, soloists, repertoire], with the enviable exception of Tanglewood in the Massachusetts Berkshires. Seiji Ozawa will open with Haydn's "The Seasons" and close with Mahler's Eighth Symphony; performances of the Fifth [conducted by Michael Tilspon Thomas] and Sixth [by James Levine also are scheduled. Colin Davis will conduct Verdi's "Quattro Pezzi Sacri" and Berlioz's "Te Deum," with Eugene Ormandy and Ancerl among the Boston Symphony's guest conductors. . . . Speaking of the Boston Symphony, it will play here March 17, under the direction of William Steinberg, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, Brahms' Fourth and the Ravel Piano Concerto with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist. And Arthur Fiedler's "Pops" concert the next night in Arie Crown Theater will be the real Boston "Pops" and not an eponymous pickup group heard frequently here on cross-country tours.

CHAMPAIGN-URBANA COURIER
CHAMPAIGN-URBANA, ILL.
D. 30,013 SUN. 30,611

MAR 17 1972

MUSIC REVIEW

Orchestra was superb; pianist wasn't

By James M. Isaacson
For The Courier

One of those rarities in concert life occurred in Urbana Thursday night. A near-capacity crowd came to Great Hall of the Krannert Center for the Performing Arts to hear The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From the outset it was obvious that the greatness of this orchestra rests on far more than its past fame as one of the outstanding orchestras in the United States. In fact, this particular ensemble, under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas, has indeed had its share of problems in the past, not the least of which was a long bout of truly miserable intonation.

Opening with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84, the most striking thing was the solid, finely balanced sound, as well as the extraordinarily good intonation and the clearly articulated phrasing. While this is not the greatest of Beethoven's works, Thomas interpreted it in a most dramatic style, being the programmatic work that it is.

Pianist Malcolm Frager made his apperance with another Beethoven work, the "Fourth Piano Concerto in G Major," Op. 58. If one could say that Frager's performance exemplified Beethoven as a composer, then certainly we would admit that there is nothing to his music, for his part was absolutely nothing in this performance—it was dry.

Dynamically, very little happened. Phrasing was as square as a box, often without the slightest hint that a phrase was ending. Melodically, it was directionless. Tempo changes were not at all logical, and generally the over-all sound was feeble, giving the impression of little more than the banging out of notes. For the same reasons, even the cadenzas were dead.

Saddest of all, through the entire piece, Thomas and the orchestra did their utmost to make something musical of it, but Frager remained oblivious to this cause. Thomas is something of a creative prodigy at age 28, and it was a shame to see this befall him.

Normalcy restored, the concert continued with Stravinsky's "Symphonies of wind instruments," written in 1920 in his neo-classic period.

It is scored for a wind ensemble which is much smaller than the larger groups usually associated with the symphonic literature, as are most of Stravinsky's works of this period, due to the devastation wrought by the war and the resultant lack of funds to support full size orchestras.

Yet, a remarkable degree of contrasting color is achieved through the careful blending and manipulating of several smaller groups of instruments within the over-all makeup. Thomas did a remarkable job of realizing this color by paying careful attention to contrasts in dynamic levels, as well as to phrase structure. This was a fine performance by any standards.

Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maler," inspired by the paintings of Matthias Grunewald, concluded the concert. Again, Thomas proved himself brilliantly. The work consists of numerous sections which contrast in a variety of ways, though not necessarily melodically. He brought out each of these contrasts, yet blended them into a unified entity.

The future of the Boston Symphony remains unquestioned, and its present quality is no surprise. What is most rewarding about this group is Thomas, yet very young, and destined to become a musician to be reckoned with.

The News Gazette
Champaign-Urbana
D. 36,881 SUN. 38,032

MAR 17 1972

Symphony Impressive

By MIKE RICHARDSON
News-Gazette Staff Writer

Youth and age found a happy and common ground Thursday evening in Krannert's Great Hall as the venerable and mature Boston Symphony, under the dynamic and powerful baton of Michael Tilson Thomas, presented an exciting concert to a near capacity crowd.

Little needs to be said about the reputation of the orchestra, which is ranked with the finest in the world.

The skill and musical understanding of the group is almost beyond comprehension, and with the youthful (27) Tilson Thomts at the helm, it navagated a pleasureful course through several monuments of music.

Although well aware of Tilson Thomas' ability as a conductor, this writer was unprepared for the forceful, yet controlled, reading which he gave Beethoven's "Egmont Overture."

It was truly one of the few performances of the work which maintained the strength and vitality which is inherent throughout the work.

Particularly impressive was the work of the horns in the forceful passages in the later moments of the work.

Critics of Tilson, Thomas have cited his apparent over emotionalism, but in the works of Beethoven, to deny emotion would be to negate all that is at the heart of his creative genius.

Some of the most beautiful sounds of this fine orchestra were the passages that the strings played in unison, such as in the "natante con moto' of the Concerto No. 4 by Beethoven.

The raw power of such a sound was thrilling to behold in the confines of the Great Hall.

Malcolm Frageh, as piano solist in the work conveyed considerable understanding of the music of Beethoven and excellent pianistic ability. Steady rhythm and powerful tone were two of his most substantial attributes.

The rapport between soloist and orchestra, as mediated by Tilson Thomas was quite dramatic.

The balance between delicate and disturbing sonorities was delightfully exhibited by the winds of the orchestra in theperformance of "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" by Igor Stravinsky.

The work showed that the winds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had outstanding ability and the intonation and balance of the ensemble was stellar.

That Tilson Thomas possessed no fear of the monuments of music was further demonsrated by the inclusion of Paul Hindemith's "Symphony 'Mathis der Mager."

This striking composition possesses many passages which wring out the last measure of artistic ability from each section of any orchestra, and the Boston was surely ample for each and every trying passage.

The Boston Symphony is truly one of the finest, and Michael Tilson Thomas seems destined to become one of the greats of the conducting world.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 536,108 SUN. 709,123

MAR 1 8 1972

Boston Symphony's return stirs memories

By Robert C. Marsh

It was just 25 years ago that the Boston Symphony came touring to Chicago with Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" on one of conductor Serge Koussevitzky's programs. Artur Rodzinski was then serving, briefly alas, as music director of the Chicago Symphony, and the prospect of hearing the Hindemith from the Boston orchestra so excited him that he went to the concert while recovering from pleurisy.

In 1947 the Boston may well have been the greatest orchestra in the world, and Rodzinski was working to get the Chicago ensemble out of provincial doldrums and into the place it deserved. For the audiences of the day, the Hindemith was new, demanding and very modern in its idiom.

FRIDAY NIGHT the Boston was back at Orchestra Hall. Again the Hindemith was on the program, but as conductor William Steinberg directed the score it seemed as much a part of the mainstream of music as the Ravel and Brahms that followed it.

Moreover, with all due respect for the Koussevitzky legend, I am sure Steinberg's performance was stronger, more accurate and more faithful to the composer than any the great Russian conductor was able to provide.

Koussevitzky's orchestra was not trained in the Central European tradition but excelled in French and Slavic music. Its refinements in tonal coloration were astonishing. The problems came in music where first emphasis must go to structure rather than color. The Hindemith is such a work. So is the Brahms Fourth Symphony, which Koussevitzky also played here in the same period, filling it with an autumnal quality that was highly effective.

STEINBERG gave us none of this. For him the Brahms Fourth is a lyric drama that sings majestically, but always with the support and thrust of a firm pulse that sustains the line. The conclusion is not introspective or filled with resignation but powerfully affirmative. And today the Boston Symphony plays the work that way.

It is still one of the great orchestras of the world, but Chicago is now its peer in every way, and the special Koussevitzky magic that could make a Ravel score sound like one wonder after another was appeared to play the comgone when Alexis Weissenberg poser's Piano Concerto in G. The lightness in texture and delicacy in coloration one remembered from the past remained memories, and although Weisenberg did some excellent playing, the interaction between soloist and orchestra this work requires simply was not taking place as quickly and easily as necessary. Mozart would probably have faired better. Or Beethoven.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 1 9 1972

Ronald Knudsen of Boston, Mass., visited with Marian L. Shook, 1130 Twenty-fifth St., Tuesday, and was guest of honor at an open house given by Miss Shook. Mr. Knudsen, a violinist with the Boston Symphony which performed in Ames, is a former student of Miss Shook, when she taught at Minneapolis-MacPhail School of Music (Minn.).

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 767,793 SUN. 1,016,275

MAR 2 0 1972

Boston's Stock Definitely Down

BY THOMAS WILLIS

● AT THE END of a two-week tour, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town for a pair of weekend concerts. The first, on Friday evening, had the ensemble's departing music director, William Steinberg, on the podium and Alexis Weissenberg as pianist. The second shifted musical gears as well as halls, offering Arthur Fiedler and his "Tops in Pops" routine in Arie Crown Theater, McCormick Place.

Music

No one who has been around Chicago for a while needs to be told that a potentially great orchestra with top quality players has its ups and downs. The lackluster trough between Fritz Reiner and Georg Solti is only one of several in our symphony's history. On the admittedly small evidence of Friday's concert, it appears that Boston's stock is definitely down and that the shift to the Seiji Ozawa-Colin Davis-Michael Tilson Thomas leadership phase comes just in the nick of time.

Not that the orchestra played badly. The bold, layered sound, solid in the middle and shining in the upper register, is still able to match Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" brush stroke for brush stroke and build the final variations of Brahms' Fourth Symphony to a towering climax worthy of one of America's finest orchestras. But technique and tone are beginnings, not ends.

Mr. Steinberg, I suspect, has done yeoman service as an interim director. His performance Friday was well routined and directly to the musical point of each phase. But there the challenge to audience and orchestra stopped. The internal play of tension and relaxation, set off by subtle dynamic balance and nuance change, which makes a great orchestra unrivaled in the transmission of feelings in sound, was notably absent. Hindemith, Brahms, and the accompaniment to Mr. Weissenberg's carefully scaled Ravel Concerto in G Major remained frozen in the same tonal mold.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 434,489 SUN. 418,629

MAR 2 0 1972

Bostonians stronger in solid concert

By Bernard Jacobson

The Boston Symphony's last appearance in Chicago, four years ago, was with former music director Erich Leinsdorf, and its next will presumably be with Seiji Ozawa, whose appointment to the post has just been announced.

But this weekend's Orchestra Hall concert by the visiting ensemble was both hail and farewell here in that capacity for William Steinberg, who has helped out in the orchestra's difficult interim period by adding the responsibility for its direction to his existing post with the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Leinsdorf's resignation in 1967 after a dispute with the Boston trustees dramatized not only the insecure state to which the orchestra had fallen in recent years but also the backbreaking difficulties that face the music director of any major symphony in these days of 52-week orchestral contracts.

Jean Martinon — at that time music director of the Chicago Symphony — issued a statement expressing his sympathy when Leinsdorf declared his unwillingness to shoulder an impossible burden any longer. And Steinberg's own faltering health during his three seasons in double harness has only seemed to add further evidence of the enormous strains involved.

HAPPILY, the Boston orchestra's performance in a solid repertoire program Friday night was good enough to drive the more melancholy aspects of the situation from the listener's mind. The group has not yet regained all of the polish that distinguished it in its greatest days. But it is a far better orchestra now than the disastrous concert here under Leinsdorf in 1967 indicated.

Both in unanimity of attack and in sustaining power, the strings are back to something like their best. The cohesion of woodwinds and brass has improved substantially, and the precision of the percussion beyond recognition.

The somewhat harmonica-like tone of the clarinets still seems, to my personal taste, unsympathetically thin, and the horns still sound slack and unfocused, especially in forte passages.

But the rather clotted sound of the wind harmonies may have been partly due to Steinberg's practice of doubling his woodwind forces. This is a procedure that may be justifiable in Brahms' Fourth Symphony, but it is hardly so in Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, which was scored for the modern orchestra by a master craftsman and needs no such adjustment.

WITH THAT exception, Steinberg's interpretations were exemplary in their natural expressiveness and their unforced lucidity of structure. The conductor did not, in Brahms Four, set the welkin ringing as Carlo Maria Giulini unforgettably did with the Chicago Symphony two years ago. But in its more everyday manner, Steinberg's reading came almost as a corrective course in continuity of phrasing after the wooden inarticulateness of Dean Dixon's performance just a week earlier.

The concerto of the evening was Ravel's in G major for piano, and here we were treated by soloist Alexis Weissenberg to a performance of the utmost distinction. His lambent tone and incisive articulation were animated by a characteristically intelligent insight into long-range logic.

Apart from a misplaced woodwind entry here and there and an over-loud horn solo in the slow movement, Steinberg and his players matched the pianist stroke for imaginative stroke. In this realization, a work that sometimes sounds flimsy took on added subtlety, and the concluding rampage was irresistible in its circusy elan.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 536,108 SUN. 709,123

MAR 1 9 1972

BSO concert stirs memories

Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.

By Robert C. Marsh

It was just 25 years ago that the Boston Symphony came touring to Chicago with Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" on one of conductor Serge Koussevitzky's programs. Artur Rodzinski was then serving, briefly alas, as music director of the Chicago Symphony, and the prospect of hearing the Hindemith from the Boston orchestra so excited him that he went to the concert while recovering from pleurisy.

In 1947 the Boston may well have been the greatest orchestra in the world, and Rodzinski was working to get the Chicago ensemble out of provincial doldrums and into the place it deserved. For the audiences of the day, the Hindemith was new, demanding and very modern in its idiom.

Friday night the Boston was back at Orchestra Hall. Again the Hindemith was on the program, but as conductor William Steinberg directed the score it seemed as much a part of the mainstream of music as the Ravel and Brahms that followed it.

Moreover, with all due respect for the Koussevitzky legend, I am sure Steinberg's performance was stronger, more accurate and more faithful to the composer than any the great Russian conductor was able to provide.

Koussevitzky's orchestra was not trained in the Central European tradition but excelled in French and Slavic music. Its refinements in tonal coloration were astonishing. The problems came in music where first emphasis must go to structure rather than color. The Hindemith is such a work. So is the Brahms Fourth Symphony, which Koussevitzky also played here in the same period, filling it with an autumnal quality that was highly effective.

Steinberg gave us none of this. For him the Brahms Fourth is a lyric drama that sings majestically, but always with the support and thrust of a firm pulse that sustains the line. The conclusion is not introspective or filled with resignation but powerfully affirmative. And today the Boston Symphony plays the work that way.

It is still one of the great orchestras of the world, but Chicago is now its peer in every way, and the special Koussevitzky magic that could make a Ravel score sound like one wonder after another was gone when Alexis Weissenberg appeared to play the composer's Piano Concerto in G. The lightness in texture and delicacy in coloration one remembered from the past remained memories, and although Weissenberg did some excellent playing, the interaction between soloist and orchestra this work requires simply was not taking place as quickly and easily as necessary. Mozart would probably have faired better. Or Beethoven.

MUSIC in Mid-America

Boston Symphony, West of the Charles

By John Heskins
The Star's Music Editor

Ames, Iowa—Where would one go to hear the Boston Symphony under music director William Steinberg and associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas? Why, to Boston, of course. The land of the bean and the cod is distant, however, and recently it was possible to hear them after a much shorter trip. In residence at Iowa State University from March 8 through March 13 was the Boston's entire complement of 105 musicians, and they played a series of concerts in the handsomest concert hall in Mid-America, the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium.

First element to be completed in a four-building campus complex for the performing arts and continuing education, the C. Y. Stephens Auditorium was opened triumphantly in the fall of 1969 with a series of concerts by the New York Philharmonic under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Their appearance on that occasion served as a pledge that the kind of planning that went into the creation of the hall, itself a beautiful and functional architectural statement, would carry over into the building's use.

The following season brought a visit by the Philadelphia Orchestra for a similar festival period of residence. This season it was the Boston Symphony, and the London Symphony under the direction of Andre Previn is booked for the 1972-73 season. After that, though all the arrangements have not yet been completed, the university and the people of Ames will be hosts to the Leningrad Symphony from Russia. What is now called the Ames International Orchestra Festival has every prospect of continuing season after season to present special events of like quality.

Life in Iowa—however brief it was—was an amazement to the New Yorkers, as it was to the Philadelphians. And the Bostonians were astounded at life out west of the Alleghenies. When they were not rehearsing or playing concerts, they were deluged with hospitality. A cellist announced with some surprise that the color television set in his motel room had not been turned on once during his stay. The concertmaster got his fill of his favorite exercise and hobby, tennis. A flyer in the orchestra was airborne whenever weather and time permitted. Few members of the orchestra appeared in the motel coffee shop for meals other than breakfast or a quick lunch after a rehearsal session.

There were four concerts by the orchestra in Stephens Auditorium, a hall seating 2,700, which was filled to 98 per cent of capacity for the series. An extra concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra in the recently-completed 14,000 seat Coliseum next door, Arthur Fiedler conducting and with Doc Severinsen as trumpet soloist, was sold out weeks in advance of the orchestra's arrival in Ames.

Festival programing was featured in the series. Most impressive was the concert last Monday night, which presented the oldest concert violinist now working regularly, Zino Francescatti, playing the Beethoven Concerto under the direction of the youngest conductor to achieve star status, Michael Tilson Thomas. It was a remarkable evening. So suave was Francescatti's tone, so pure his intonation, so brilliant his execution, that the orchestra broke discipline at the end of the first movement to allow muttered "bravos" to be heard out in the hall before the audience erupted in spontaneous applause. And when the concerto was finished they refused for a time to share in his ovation.

That concert also offered an incandescent reading of the Symphony No. 5 in C Minor of Gustav Mahler. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the work with demoniac energy, employing flamboyant gesture almost to excess, turning two or three pages of the score at a time while he alternately coerced and cajoled the players to realize his musical vision in sound. He was both a dancer and a swimmer on the podium, and while his gesture was often distracting, it was forgivable, for it proceeded clearly from musical impulse. A few more years (and perhaps an emergency visit or two to the chiropractor) will teach him restraint while not tempering his brilliant musicianship.

If that Monday concert was the peak of the series, the Saturday night concert before it was not far behind. Again Thomas was on the podium, and the soloist was Malcolm Frager in the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4 in G, Op. 58. Frager, backed with utmost sensitivity by his colleague on the podium, played with brilliant command of the keyboard and completely persuasive musical insight. It was a splendid occasion, and the ovation was merited.

Last Sunday afternoon the Iowa State Singers and Oratorio Chorus took the first half of the program under the direction of W. Douglas Pritchard to sing three works by William Schuman, the last of them, "Mail Order Madrigals," specially written for the occasion on a commission from J. W. Fisher of Marshalltown, Iowa. The composer was present in the audience for the premiere, which was preceded by his 1940 "Prelude for Voices" and 1959 "Carols of Death." The commissioned work dealt in difficult and very sophisticated madrigal style with four advertising texts taken from the Sears, Roebuck Catalog of 1897. Charming work, sung to the composer's evident pleasure.

The heavy work of the afternoon was the Brahms "A German Requiem," with William Steinberg conducting chorus and orchestra with magisterial dignity, emphasizing the essential serenity of the work even during the most massive choral outbursts. Veronica Tyler was the soprano soloist, displaying a voice of beauty and purity as well as warmth, with hardly a word to be heard clearly in her aria, "And ye now therefore have sorrow." The baritone soloist was Robert Hale, in command of the material and projecting words clearly.

As a special touch during the concert series the lobby had a display of "Soft Sculpture" by Priscilla Sage of Ames. The show consisted of 8 mobiles, some footed, some hanging free, constructed of cloth and mylar. They were colorful, with an astonishing sea feeling about them for such an inland place, and they fascinated the audience at intermissions.

The opening concert of the series could not be heard, and it was just as well. Steinberg was conducting, and Eileen Farrell was scheduled as the soprano soloist in large works from the Wagnerian repertoire. She had to cancel for illness the afternoon of the concert, however, and the program change of a Strauss tone poem for her portion of the evening apparently roused little enthusiasm. Nor could the Pops Concert program be heard, either, while this writer was listening to our own Philharmonic play a Cabaret Concert in Union Station.

Three out of five, however, is not a bad average, and three days with the Boston Symphony made for one of the nicest and most pleasurable weekends in recent memory. May the sun shine on Ames, and may fortune favor its International Orchestra Festival series. One can only wish that we might one day do something like it in Kansas City.

The C. Y. Stephens Auditorium

Maurice Peress, conductor

Marilyn Horne, soprano

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 325,351 SUN. 396,682

MAR 19 1972

DORCAS Speer, women's editor for WOI-TV and radio, is hostess of a ten-minute show four days a week during the noon news hour. Dorcas' "Today's Living" publicizes people and happenings of interest to the Ames-Iowa State community. Her guests range from the Easter Seal child to members of the Boston Symphony performing in Ames. In addition, Dorcas has interviered actor Michael Constantine, star of ABC's "Room 222," and Senator George McGovern of South Dakota.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEW WORLD
W. 230,493 (C)

MAR 24 1972

Boston Symphony A Disappointment

By Frederick J. Kountz

Harry Zelzer, entrepreneur supreme, had the Boston Symphony on view last Friday night in Orchestra Hall. William Steinberg conducted, Alexis Weissenberg was the piano soloist in Ravel's Concerto in G major which was surrounded in the program by Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Of the time when I was a student in Boston I remember the production of the Boston Orchestra much more vividly than I remember classroom experiences of any kind. It was then in the process of becoming the world masterpiece of transparent execution.

AN AUDIENCE might dislike a particular piece of music intensely; it might disagree totally with the conductor's conception of it; but in the Boston performance there was the work, so clearly and precisely exhibited by the performance that the work itself appeared to stand clear on its own terms and in its own character.

This aristocratic, elegantly objective kind of performance was always exactly right for the music of Ravel. For Ravel was aristocratic; he was elegant; and he was singularly more classicist than impressionist. One might have said of him that he was at once participant in and observer of his compositions.

He thought of his Concerto in G as a classical concerto and he thought classical concertos should be lighthearted and brilliant. He did not say that the piece was also to be jubilant, but the music itself attests to that.

The point of this discourse is not whether the work is great music or something less — the point has been belabored for about 40 years — but simply that it remains a fascinating piece to experience; the limpid, luminous, cheerful song in which it opens; the long serene lied of the second movement, warm, tranquil, sometimes even delicately perverse; and the metallic hardness of its finale; and, beyond all that, its extraordinary craftsmanship.

IN THE recent performance Mr. Weissenberg set out like an unlimpid, unluminous machine the nature of which was devoid of any cheerfulness. And he was running fast. Mr. Steinberg and the players appeared for a time to be caught off guard. At least there was no distinct cohesion.

The second movement, as it was exhibited, was no lied at all. In fact it was an episode of individually, aggressively tooled sections in which there was no tranquillity, no warmth, no delicacy viewed from a little distance.

And the third movement followed. The whole of the performance was not acceptable because, whereas Ravel's creation is a model of impersonality, it (the performance) was a highly personal execution, almost wholly uncommunicative of the character of the work.

So this Boston Orchestra seemed to be only a distant relation to the Boston Orchestra which Ravel, in the last 10 years of his life, found capable of such meticulous musical address and of such objectivity. And for this observer that was a sharp disappointment.

The Des Moines Register
DES MOINES, IOWA
D. 246,841 SUN. 514,496

MAR 19 1972

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 536,108 SUN. 709,123

MAR 20 1972

Pops are tops when in Boston

By Robert C. Marsh

You can bake beans and simmer chowder anywhere in the country, but somehow or other, whatever the recipe, they never taste quite the same as they do when eaten in the shadow of the Old State House in Boston. And perhaps the Boston Pops Orchestra is equall difficult to export.

It is a unique institution in American music, and its spring seasons, when Symphony Hall becomes the most festive, and informal, concert room in the world, are a New England institution of venerable age. Transplanted to the new Arie Crown Theater at McCormick Place Saturday night, the whole atmosphere was different.

THE SOUND was different too. This was the real Boston Pops, made up of Boston Symphony personnel not a specially assembled tour orchestra such as conductor Arthur Fiedler has brought here in the past. But you hardly would guess that.

Symphony Hall is one of the greatest auditoriums in the world, but the Arie Crown Theater, with velvet draperies instead of an acoustical shell for the stage, is an inhospitable locale for a symphony orchestra.

In Row J of the main floor, where I began the evening, the sound was muffled and thin with almost no bass and none of the true brightness and zest of the ensemble. After intermission, I went to higher elevations where the stage could serve as a reflecting surface, and things began to sound a lot better, but an echo I hadn't noticed before became apparent. Clearly, the hall needs further acoustical adjustments as well as a shell for the stage.

As it was, Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance March No. 1" and the Brahms "Academic Festival Overture" were heard under wraps but seemed to be well played. The Tchaikovsky B Flat Minor Piano Concerto, however, was not especially exciting. Soloist Jeffrey Siegel was not playing up to the standard of his recent Orchestra Hall recital.

Although his over-all view of the score is perfectly sound, there was carelessness in the realization of some detail and a lack of concentration in the music. The accompaniment was good.

The real Boston Pops appeal emerged after intermission as Fiedler directed Offenbach's "Gaite Parisienne" and popular melodies in the kind of arrangements that give the orchestra its special place. You couldn't help being charmed, but it's even better in Boston.

THE LYRIC OPERA of Chicago reports that the first two weeks of its 1972 subscription campaign have brought some $250,000 in renewals from former subscribers. The 1971 Lyric season played to 99 per cent capacity and was almost completely sold out on subscription before opening night.

The campaign now is being extended to those who have not been subscribers in former seasons, and expanded performances in a new series will give newcomers an opportunity to secure seats of their choice. Inquiries may be made to the Lyric at 20 N. Wacker Dr., Chicago 60606.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR-GAZETTE
D. 50,500

MAR 16 1972

NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.
D. 15,205

MAR 20 1972 New England Newsclip

Titanic Struggle

#6

When Iowa State's heavyweight wrestling champ, Chris Taylor, (right at 420 pounds) and Boston Symphony Orchestra bassist Leslie Martin (a mere 320) get together in a tug of war, something's got to give. (AP Wirephoto).

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.
D. 8,061

MAR 16 1972 New England Newsclip

ALLIANCE, OHIO
REVIEW
D.15,000

MAR 22 1972

The Toledo Times
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 31,347

MAR 16 1972

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

MAR 29 1972

New England Newsclip

Brahm's concerto well done

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

TILSON THOMAS

At the Boston Symphony's pension fund concert in January, Artur Rubinstein played the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major. Last night, at a subscription the program again, this time with Malcolm Frager concert, that work was on as soloist, and, as before, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting. It was a different piece.

Rubinstein played it as something elegant and slender, with delicate inflection of line and exquisite transparency. It was astonishing as an act of cleaning the crud off a monument too much taken for granted and no longer carefully looked at, as a kind of rejuvenation, and all that the more dramatic in coming from a pianist in his eighties.

Now came Frager to make first of all the statement that the Brahms B flat is, except for the freaks like the Busoni and the Furtwaengler, the most gigantic of all piano concertos. His playing was huge, with massive sound — he is one of those pianists who can make an immense fortissimo effortlessly and without banging—and with the inflections of line sculpted on the most generous scale. It was a performance in the grandly, even riskily rhetorical manner of which Arrau's recording with Haitink is the most extreme statement.

That is a debatable approach. Certainly it is playing what is in the piece, though one could make a case against emphaisis of what is least attractive in Brahms, his Beethoven dreams of glory and his ambitions in the direction of world-shaking utterance. I was not sure at the beginning that I should not disqualify myself from reviewing at all. Having lived very intensely in a world of Schuetz, Bach, and Stravinsky these last few days, I found it hard to face Brahms. It was like wanting a dozen oysters and clams, very fresh, with a glass of really good ale, and then having someone threaten you with a vast dish of steaming, very brown goulash.

Somewhere very soon, though, I found myself completely drawn into what Frager was doing and thoroughly enjoying what was happening. Not without some misgivings, mainly because the volume was so consistently up that the pianissimo end of the scale was gone altogether, and not without the wish to be shaken rather less hard by the lapels; still, the consistency, conviction, sheer energy, and structural intelligence of the interpretation were in the end enormously persuasive. Specifically I want gratefully to mention the good tempi, an opening that was actually part of the concerto instead of the usual maudlin fantasy outside it, and a third movement with a beautiful sense of flow.

Michael Tilson Thomas, having worked into and out of Rubinstein's playing with extraordinary delicay, now adapted himself readily and enthusiastically to Frager's mega-performance. There were a couple of extreme lapses in orchestral execution — the wild difference of opinion about pitch between horn and piano at the very beginning, and then some rich disorder in the Trio of the second movement — but in general the playing was warm and very much alive.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

MAR 30 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO, Frager, Thomas, Brahms

By Louis Snyder

Malcolm Frager, who last appeared with the Boston Symphony during its European tour a year ago, rejoined it on Tuesday evening for the first of three appearances at Symphony Hall. The others are tomorrow evening and next Tuesday, April 4.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO's associate conductor, revived two dances from Glinka's "A Life for the Tsar" and Borodin's Second Symphony from earlier this season, anud Mr. Frager's formidable vehicle was the Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat of Brahms. This was one of two concertos chosen by Artur Rubinstein for the orchestra's Pension Fund concert in January, and Mr. Frager is thus the latest in a long list of distinguished soloists who have played it here.

Strangely enough, the B flat Concerto, taxing as it is, seems to invite performers into its toils, so that a variety of interpretaions are possible. Some pianists emerge appearing to have worked much harder than others. And there are those who approach te large scale demands of te piece with such reserve as to magnify its difficulties. Tuesday's soloist went his own way.

Mr. Frager, fortified with a prodigious technique and obvious ideas about amploying it, opted for the grand design. Although somewhat hampered in forte passages of the two Allegros by an instrument from which all resonance seemed to have been drained, he was the winner in this David and Goliath battle, certainly in audience terms. His flying fingers maintained a powerful dialogue with an equally demonstrative orchestral sound under Mr. Thomas until the Andante, when tension lessened and the atmosphere was more subdued. The evening ended in a burst of sure-fire sound, with plenty of enthusiasm for everyone onstage. Not the least tribute, perhaps, was recognition of the many faces of Brahms's B flat Concerto.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

MAR 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Malcolm Frager

. . . plays Brahms's Second Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas in three performances at Symphony Hall on March 28, 30, and April 4.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Spectrum Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas
conductor

four religious ceremonies

March 31 & April 1, 1972/8:30 pm

Bach Christ lag in Todesbanden, cantata no. 4
David del Tredici Pop-Pourri
Josquin des Prez Deploration on the death of Gehan Okeghem
Messiaen Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum

Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum
F. John Adams, conductor
Phyllis Bryn-Julson, soprano

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tickets $3 $4.50 $5.50
at Symphony Hall Box Office 266-1492

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Spectrum Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas
conductor

four religious ceremonies

March 31 & April 1, 1972/8:30 pm

Bach Christ lag in Todesbanden, cantata no. 4
David del Tredici Pop-Pourri
Josquin des Prez Deploration on the death of Gehan Okeghem
Messiaen Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum

Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum
F. John Adams, conductor
Phyllis Bryn-Julson, soprano

Tickets $3 $4.50 $5.50
at Symphony Hall Box Office 266-1492

Running Again-Boston Symphony
Musical Marathon March 2-5

wcrb
1330 AM / 102.5 FM

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music ?

Now You Can!

MUSICAL MARATHON

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 27 1972

New England Newsclip

BSO music marathon

Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra — to your ear's content—will be the main attraction of WCRB's Musical Marathon to be broadcast from 7 p.m. Thursday until 1 a.m. Monday. The aim of the program is to obtain $50,000 to assist the orchestra.

BSO play-for-pay marathon chases $50,000

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

From 7 o'clock Thursday evening until 1 a.m. Monday, there will be nothing but Boston Symphony on WCRB (1330 AM/ 102.5 FM). The station, which began broadcasting tapes of the orchestra's concerts in 1956 and which has carried them live since 1959, will be running a Musical Marathon. The point is to raise $50,000 for the Boston Symphony — the first WCRB Marathon, which ran for three days last May, brought in $39,800 plus change — and here is how it works.

First you phone (617) 891-1234 and ask for a Marathon catalog (they are also lying around, wanting to be picked up, at the cash registers in the Harvard Coop's record department and at other such places where people interested in the Boston Symphony and its music would come across them). The catalog lists about 1500 tapes of broadcast performances by the Symphony, and each entry gives you the conductor, the date of the performance and the timing. If you would like to hear one of these, you fill out an order form, which you send in with a pledge for a contribution of money. Prices are based on $1 per minute of music, with a $10 minimum. Certain performances carry special price tags of $50 (the Brahms viola songs with Chookasian, Fine, and Leinsdorf at the piano), $100 (for example the P.D.Q. Bach pension fund concert, or Leinsdorf's final Beethoven 9th), $200 (Bernstein conducting the "Missa solemnis," for instance), $300 (the Ozawa "Cosi fan tutte," the Leinsdorf "Otello," among others), and the complete "Lohengrin" which Leinsdorf led at Tanglewood in 1965 will set you back $500.

For $50 you can ride Bassoonist's motorcycle . . . or for $500 conduct 'The Stars and Stripes Forever'

Your pledge entitles you, along with your musical selection, to a premium, at least a bumper sticker, and then diverse things including surf fishing, golf, squash, and tennis with various members of the orchestra ($25), an hour with principal bassoonist Sherman Walt on the back of his BMW motorcycle or a harbor cruise with bass player John Salkowski, which includes dinner chez Salkowski entracted from one of his lobster pots ($50), a Chinese dinner for two cooked by horn player David Chanian at his Boston apartment or an AR turntable with cartridge ($100), ten bass lessons (jazz, rock, or western) with Leslie "Tiny" Martin, or a lecture demonstration by percussionist Arthur Press ($150), trumpet music for a May, June, or July wedding, played by Roger Voisin ($200—absolutely to be recommended — I once witnessed a couple trumpeted into wedlock by Mr. Voisin), a Boston Fire Chief's helmet or two hours of fire chasing with Arthur Fiedler ($250—a fire is not guaranteed), and on up to a recital by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein to benefit your favorite charity ($2000). Other premiums, including a chance to conduct the Boston Pops in "The Stars and Stripes Forever" on June 2 ($500 minimum), will be auctioned during the course of the Marathon.

Beyond that, you need to know that performance times will be announced on WCRB each day at 9 a.m. and 8 p.m., and throughout the Marathon weekend. Requests will be accepted only through 1 a.m., Monday, March 6, but to accommodate the hoped-for overflow, musical requests will continue to be played through Thursday, March 9, at times to be announced on the radio, that option is available.

Symphony Hall reports that two weeks before the start of the Marathon, $3000 in pledges had already been received, as compared to $1500 for the same point last year. The premium most in demand has been gypsy strolling music for your social affair by BSC violinist Laszlo Nagy (six requests, each with a $50 pledge).

MUSIC, Page 90

BSO on Music Marathon

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page 86

The Marathon's formal opeining Thursday evening will feature appearances by Mayor White, Talcott M. Banks, president of the BSO Trustees, and Ted Jones, president of WCRB. The first 24 hours of the Marathon will be given over to tapes of Arthur Fiedler and the Pops. Friday at 7 there is something like a second opening, and Richard Kaye, WCRB Station Manager, hopes then to play taped interviews with conductors including incoming Music Director Seiji Ozawa, Fiedler, Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, and former Music Director Erich Leinsdorf (who in the course of his interview named his favorite among his own performances). Principal host for the program will be Bill Pierce, who announces WCRB's BSO broadcasts, and there will be guest hosts—guest hosts? — including Henry Fogel of WONO, Syracuse, who invented the Marathon idea, Martin Bookspan of ASCAP and his wife, Janet, Oliver Daniel, vice-president of Broadcast Music Inc., and myself. About half the orchestra will appear at some point.

Kaye and Andre W. Raeburn, Assistant to the BSO Music Director, chose the tapes to be made available for the 1971 Marathon; Jordan Whitelaw, who was long a BSO staff member in charge of the orchestra's radio and television activities, revised the list for this year. Many works appear in multiple versions — the Brahms Fourth, for instance, by Giulini, Kubelik, Leinsdorf, Monteux, Munch, Koussevitzky, and Steinberg — but there is generally just one version for each conductor unless the performances seemed strikingly or interestingly different (Kaye mentioned "La mer" under Munch in 1962 and 1963)or one represents a special occasion (Monteux conducting Beethoven's 9th on his 85th birthday as well as one from Tanglewood the same year, $200 and $100 respectively).

Kaye says there has been special interest in Koussevitsky's performances, which last year represented four percent of what was offered, but close to 25 percent of what was requested. Koussevitsky recordings include the "Eroica" played in memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt on April 14, 1945, the repeat performance of the world premiere of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra in December 1944, as well as many of his famous specialities like Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" No. 2, four Sibelius symphonies, and of course the three big Tchaikovskys.

My own choices? Tape Nos. 61, 71, 96, 110, 113, 212, 230, 246, 247, 251, 258, 284, 291, 317, 345, 396, 400, 402, 437, 520, 614, 634, 657, 678, 683, 684, 735, 810, 812, 834, 890, 907, 943, 1160, 1161, 1216. You see I am really an easy person to please. The bill for all that would come, I think, to $1871. My choice of premium would be to conduct "The Stars and Stripes Forever" (to see what the orchestra would actually play), and then lots of copies (all but one gift-wrapped) of percussionist Charles Smith's tape of "Background Music for Family Arguments."

And now please get the Marathon catalog. We need the Boston Symphony, and it needs our money.

BSO music marathon

Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra — to your ear's content — will be the main attraction of WCRB's Musical Marathon to be broadcast from 7 p.m. Thursday until 1 a.m. Monday. The aim of the program is to obtain $50,000 to assist the orchestra.

BSO play-for-pay marathon chases $50,000

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

From 7 o'clock Thursday evening until 1 a.m. Monday, there will be nothing but Boston Symphony on WCRB (1330 AM/102.5 FM). The station, which began broadcasting tapes of the orchestra's concerts in 1956 and which has carried them live since 1959, will be running a Musical Marathon. The point is to raise $50,000 for the Boston Symphony — the first WCRB Marathon, which ran for three days last May, brought in $39,800 plus change — and here is how it works.

First you phone (617) 891-1234 and ask for a Marathon catalog (they are also lying around, wanting to be picked up, at the cash registers in the Harvard Coop's record department and at other such places where people interested in the Boston Symphony and its music would come across them). The catalog lists about 1500 tapes of broadcast performances by the Symphony, and each entry gives you the conductor, the date of the performance and the timing. If you would like to hear one of these, you fill out an order form, which you send in with a pledge for a contribution of money. Prices are based on $1 per minute of music, with a $10 minimum. Certain performances carry special price tags of $50 (the Brahms viola songs with Chookasian, Fine, and Leinsdorf at the piano), $100 (for example the P.D.Q. Bach pension fund concert, or Leinsdorf's final Beethoven 9th), $200 (Bernstein conducting the "Missa solemnis," for instance), $300 (the Ozawa "Cosi fan tutte," the Leinsdorf "Otello," among others), and the complete "Lohengrin" which Leinsdorf led at Tanglewood in 1965 will set you back $500.

For $50 you can ride Bassoonist's motorcycle . . . or for $500 conduct 'The Stars and Stripes Forever'

Your pledge entitles you, along with your musical selection, to a premium, at least a pamphlet ticket, and then, the verse things including surf fishing, golf, squash, and tennis with various members of the orchestra ($25), an hour with principal bassoonist Sherman Walt on the back of his BMW motorcycle or a harbor cruise with bass player John Salkowski, which includes dinner chez Salkowski entracted from one of his lobster pots ($50), a Chinese dinner for two cooked by horn player David Chanian at his Boston apartment on an AR turntable with cartridge ($100), ten bass lessons (jazz, rock, or western) with Leslie "Tiny" Martin, or a lecture demonstration by percussionist Arthur Press ($150), trumpet music for a May, June or July wedding, played by Roger Voisin ($200—absolutely to be recommended. I once witnessed a couple trumpeted into wedlock by Mr. Voisin), a Boston Fire Chief's helmet or two hours of fire chasing with Arthur Fiedler ($250, a fire is not guaranteed), and on up to a recital by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein to benefit your favorite charity ($2000). Other premiums, including a chance to conduct the Boston Pops in "The Stars and Stripes Forever" on June 2 ($500 minimum), will be auctioned during the course of the Marathon.

Beyond that, you need to know that performance times will be announced on WCRB each day at 9 a.m. and 8 p.m., and throughout the Marathon weekend. Requests will be accepted only through 1 a.m., Monday, March 6, but to accommodate the hoped-for overflow, musical requests will continue to be played through Thursday, March 9, at times to be announced on the radio, that option is available.

Symphony Hall reports that two weeks before the start of the Marathon, $3000 in pledges had already been received, as compared to $1500 for the same point last year. The premium most in demand has been gypsy strolling music for your social affair by BSO violinist Laszlo Nagy (six requests, each with a $50 pledge).

MUSIC, Page 90

BSO on Music Marathon

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page 86

The Marathon's formal opening Thursday evening will feature appearances by Mayor White, Talcott M. Banks, president of the BSO Trustees, and Ted Jones, president of WCRB. The first 24 hours of the Marathon will be given over to tapes of Arthur Fiedler and the Pops. Friday at 7 there is something like a second opening, and Richard Kaye, WCRB Station Manager, hopes then to play taped interviews with conductors including incoming Music Director Seiji Ozawa, Fiedler, Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, and former Music Director Erich Leinsdorf (who in the course of his interview named his favorite among his own performances). Principal host for the program will be Bill Pierce, who announces WCRB's BSO broadcasts, and there will be guest hosts—guest hosts? — including Henry Fogel of WONO, Syracuse, who invented the Marathon idea, Martin Bookspan of ASCAP and his wife, Janet, Oliver Daniel, vice-president of Broadcast Music Inc., and myself. About half the orchestra will appear at some point.

Kaye and Andre W. Raeburn, Assistant to the BSO Music Director, chose the tapes to be made available for the 1971 Marathon; Jordan Whitelaw, who was long a BSO staff member in charge of the orchestra's radio and television activities, revised the list for this year. Many works appear in multiple versions — the Brahms Fourth, for instance, by Giulini, Kubelik, Leinsdorf, Monteux, Munch, Koussevitzky, and Steinberg — but there is generally just one version for each conductor unless the performances seemed strikingly or interestingly different (Kaye mentioned "La mer" under Munch in 1962 and 1963)or one represents a special occasion (Monteux conducting Beethoven's 9th on his 85th birthday as well as one from Tanglewood the same year, $200 and $100 respectively).

Kaye says there has been special interest in Koussevitsky's performances, which last year represented four percent of what was offered, but close to 25 percent of what was requested. Koussevitsky recordings include the "Eroica" played in memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt on April 14, 1945, the repeat performance of the world premiere of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra in December 1944, as well as many of his famous specialities like Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, the Mussorgsky - Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" No. 2, four Sibelius symphonies, and of course the three big Tchaikovskys.

My own choices? Tape Nos. 61, 71, 96, 110, 113, 212, 230, 246, 247, 251, 258, 284, 291, 317, 345, 396, 400, 402, 437, 520, 614, 634, 657, 678, 683, 684, 735, 810, 812, 834, 890, 907, 943, 1160, 1161, 1216. You see I am really an easy person to please. The bill for all that would come, I think, to $1871. My choice of premium would be to conduct "The Stars and Stripes Forever" (to see what the orchestra would actually play), and then lots of copies (all but one gift-wrapped) of percussionist Charles Smith's tape of "Background Music for Family Arguments."

And now please get the Marathon catalog. We need the Boston Symphony, and it needs our money.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

FEB 28 1972 New England Newsclip

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 27 1972 New England Newsclip

A marathon for music

by Harry Neville

At the rate of $1.00 per minute of air-time ($10 minimum contribution), many an ardent well-wisher of Boston's most famous musical institution may find the BSO's second annual Musical Marathon a trifle rich for his blood.

Nothing, however, forbids non-contributores from tuning into Radio Station WCRB (1330 AM, 102.5 FM) anytime between 7 p.m. Thursday, March 2, through 1 a.m. Monday, March 6, to catch a few of the goodies (more than 1,500 BSO archive performances) that will be played during this repeat of last year's immensely successful fund-raising effort in behalf of the BSO.

Not that this charity is strictly for the rich, for with a little imagination anyone can get into the act. Fifteen Brookline parents, for example, contributed $10 apiece in order to buy 15 minutes of listening time. Their contribution also got them a "premium" in the form of a lecture-demonstration by BSO percussionist Arthur Press, who will illustrate "The Evolution of the Drum" to the children of Park School.

More about premiums later. For the moment, a sampling of the available performances, as listed in the Marathon catalog, which is available by phoning 617-891-1234. The catalog contains a plethora of Erich Leinsdorf recordings, which was excellent judgment on the part of the good ladies who organized this event. As any Boston critic can tell you, nothing elicits more crank mail from BSO subscribers than an unfavorable review of a Leinsdorf performance, which would seem to indicate that the ex-music director remains a great favorite of the Friday afternoon crowd.

I haven't tallied the number of Leinsdorf tapes in the catalog, but I did spot a couple that I remembered as being brillinat. Items 903 and 904 (Schoenberg's "Survivor from Warsaw" and the same composer's Variations for Orchestra) won't appeal to everyone, but if it will make their performance more attractive, contributions for these selections may be earmarked for the "Harry Neville Spite Fund."

Other items that grabbed my fancy were 872, Michael Tilson Thomas's Frankfurt performance of "La Valse" (I wish it were the Rome performance, after which a little old Roman matron announced, "I like your orchestra, but something will have to be done about that young man") and 255, a 1955 performance by Serkin of the third movement of Brahms' B-flat Concerto, during which the pedal broke.

To return to the business of "premiums," the catalog states that premiums above $25 are issued in order of request, as long as the supply is avialable. The mind-boggling variety of premiums will confirm everything you may ever have suspected about BSO players. Here are a few samples.

For $25 you may spend a day surf-fishing on South Shore with bass player Bela Wurtzler, or you may play a singles or doubles tennis game with violinist Sheldon Rotenberg, hornist Ralph Pottle or tuba player Chester Schmitz. $25 will also get you a bassoon or contrabassoon lesson from Richard Plaster or a squash game with Joseph Silverstein, Robert Karol, Ralph Gomberg or Chester Schmitz. David and Sydney Rockefeller will ghost-write you a commemorative limerick, while any of seven different orchestra members will take you on in a handicap golf match.

For $50 violinist Laszlo Nagy will provide gypsy strolling music for your social affair, or bassoonist Sherman Walt will give you a one-hour ride on his BMW motorcycle. For $100 horn player David Ohanian will cook a Chinese dinner for two in his Boston apartment, while $400 will earn you a flute and harp recital by Mr. and Mrs. James Pappoutsakis. An informal cello and piano recital by Jules and Virginia Eskin comes at $500, and for the same price you can obtain 25 viola lessons from Jerome Lipson. A recital by Joseph Silverstein to benefit your favorite charity comes with a price tag of $2,000.

Several premiums will be auctioned to the highest bidder. These include an informal evening of "Music Minus One" with the Music Guild String Quartet (minimum bid of $400) and a musical tour of Europe with bass player John Salkowski (minimum bid of $1,300). Many other premiums are listed in the catalog, and there will be additional surprise premiums offered during the Marathon weekend. As you can see, there's something for every — well, almost every — taste.

MUSICAL MARATHON — Looking at the selections to be played from the Boston Symphony's Musical Marathon in which radio station WCRB will participate are Mrs. F. Corning Kenly of Manchester, Mrs. James Peabody of Boston and Mrs. Thomas Gardiner of Manchester. The Musical Marathon will culminate in a burst of classical music upon request from March 2 through March 6.

Goodbye, Feb.-hello, music

Marathon greets March

Interest in the second Musical Marathon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is running high this week. To emphasize this wide-spread enthusiasm of music lovers of the Greater Boston Community, Mayor Kevin White has declared the week beginning February 28 as Boston Symphony Orchestra Week. At the end of the week, from March 2 through March 6, the Musical Marathon will provide the rare opportunity for listeners to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on radio station WCRB, 1330 AM and 102.5 FM.

Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB at 891-1234 or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalogue. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations. The premiums, listed in the catalogue, are unusual and intriguing. One of the many $25 premiums is the opportunity to go surf fishing with bass player Bela Wurtzler. In the $50 category, another bass player, John Salkowski, offers a Sunday afternoon cruise of Boston Harbor and a lobster dinner selected from his own pots. Boston Symphony French horn player David Ohanian will cook and serve in his apartment a Chinese dinner for two to the person who pledges $100. For the family planning a May, June or July wedding, there is the enticing offer of Roger Voisin, principal trumpet player of the Boston Pops, to play before and after the ceremony. All this if you subscribe $200. One of the exciting $500 premiums is the recital that will be given by superb principal cellist, Jules Eskin, with his wife Virginia at the Piano.

PS. PEOPLE SPOTLIGHT

There are other rare musical performances offered and, during the Marathon, surprise premiums will be announced. Listed in the catalogue are the fascinating premiums that will be auctioned on WCRB during the Marathon; but you don't need to wait for March 2 to make your bid. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr. of Chestnut Hill, responsible for securing these fascinating premiums, urge you to write in now to place your bid.

Several of the exciting premiums listed in the Marathon catalogue have already been requested by people who have sent in their pledges and requests in advance of the Marathon weekend. One of the more interesting requests came from a mother with two children in the Park School, Brookline. She collected $10 from fifteen parents in the school to raise the necessary $150 for Arthur Press' lecture-demonstration on "The Evolution of the Drum" to be given at Park School.

During the Musical Marathon there will be stimulating interviews with the conductor and members of the Orchestra as well as other well-known people. These notables will remain at WCRB to take phone calls, so that when you telephone your requests and pledges, you man b answered by a famous voice. Governor Sargent will be interviewed on Friday, March 3. During the evening of Thursday, March 2, Mayor White will be heard. Mrs. David Bird, in charge of interviews, assures us that there will be unexpected surprises amoung those to be interviewed.

Assisting celebrities in manning the telephones at WCRB during the Marathon will be Friends of the Boston Symphony, organized and coordinated by Mrs. George Parson of Louisburg Square. Others who are collaborating with Mrs. John Bradley, Chairman of the Musical Marathon Committee, are Mrs. William V. Ellis of Glouster, Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester, Musical Marathon Treasurer, Mrs. John Jeppson III of Cambridge, Mrs. Stephen Kunian of Boston and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, Jr.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler

A marathon for music

by Harry Neville

At the rate of $1.00 per minute of air-time ($10 minimum contribution), many an ardent well-wisher of Boston's most famous musical institution may find the BSO's second annual Musical Marathon a trifle rich for his blood.

Nothing, however, forbids non-contributors from tuning into Radio Station WCRB (1330 AM, 102.5 FM) anytime between 7 p.m. Thursday, March 2, through 1 a.m. Monday, March 6, to catch a few of the goodies (more than 1,500 BSO archive performances) that will be played during this repeat of last year's immensely successful fund-raising effort in behalf of the BSO.

Not that this charity is strictly for the rich, for with a little imagination anyone can get into the act. Fifteen Brookline parents, for example, contributed $10 apiece in order to buy 15 minutes of listening time. Their contribution also got them a "premium" in the form of a lecture-demonstration by BSO percussionist Arthur Press, who will illustrate "The Evolution of the Drum" to the children of Park School.

More about premiums later. For the moment, a sampling of the available performances, as listed in the Marathon catalog, which is available by phoning 617-891-1234. The catalog contains a plethora of Erich Leinsdorf recordings, which was excellent judgment on the part of the good ladies who organized this event. As any Boston critic can tell you, nothing elicits more crank mail from BSO subscribers than an unfavorable review of a Leinsdorf performance, which would seem to indicate that the ex-music director remains a great favorite of the Friday afternoon crowd.

I haven't tallied the number of Leinsdorf tapes in the catalog, but I did spot a couple that I remembered as being brilliant. Items 903 and 904 (Schoenberg's "Survivor from Warsaw" and the same composer's Variations for Orchestra) won't appeal to everyone, but if it will make their performance more attractive, contributions for these selections may be earmarked for the "Harry Neville Spite Fund."

Other items that grabbed my fancy were 872, Michael Tilson Thomas's Frankfurt performance of "La Valse" (I wish it were the Rome performance, after which a little old Roman matron announced, "I like your orchestra, but something will have to be done about that young man") and 255, a 1955 performance by Serkin of the third movement of Brahms' B-flat Concerto, during which the pedal broke.

To return to the business of "premiums," the catalog states that premiums above $25 are issued in order of request, as long as the supply is avialable. The mind-boggling variety of premiums will confirm everything you may ever have suspected about BSO players. Here are a few samples.

For $25 you may spend a day surf-fishing on South Shore with bass player Bela Wurtzler, or you may play a singles or doubles tennis game with violinist Sheldon Rotenberg, hornist Ralph Pottle or tuba player Chester Schmitz. $25 will also get you a bassoon or contrabassoon lesson from Richard Plaster or a squash game with Joseph Silverstein, Robert Karol, Ralph Gomberg or Chester Schmitz. David and Sydney Rockefeller will ghost-write you a commemorative limerick, while any of seven different orchestra members will take you on in a handicap golf match.

For $50 violinist Laszlo Nagy will provide gypsy strolling music for your social affair, or bassoonist Sherman Walt will give you a one-hour ride on his BMW motorcycle. For $100 horn player David Ohanian will cook a Chinese dinner for two in his Boston apartment, while $400 will earn you a flute and harp recital by Mr. and Mrs. James Pappoutsakis. An informal cello and piano recital by Jules and Virginia Eskin comes at $500, and for the same price you can obtain 25 viola lessons from Jerome Lipson. A recital by Joseph Silverstein to benefit your favorite charity comes with a price tag of $2,000.

Several premiums will be auctioned to the highest bidder. These include an informal evening of "Music Minus One" with the Music Guild String Quartet (minimum bid of $400) and a musical tour of Europe with bass player John Salkowski (minimum bid of $1,300). Many other premiums are listed in the catalog, and there will be additional surprise premiums offered during the Marathon weekend. As you can see, there's something for every — well, almost every — taste.

MUSICAL MARATHON — Looking at the selections to be played from the Boston Symphony's Musical Marathon in which radio station WCRB will participate are Mrs. F. Corning Kenly of Manchester, Mrs. James Peabody of Boston and Mrs. Thomas Gardiner of Manchester. The Musical Marathon will culminate in a burst of classical music upon request from March 2 through March 6.

Goodbye, Feb.-hello, music

Marathon greets March

Interest in the second Musical Marathon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is running high this week. To emphasize this wide-spread enthusiasm of music lovers of the Greater Boston Community, Mayor Kevin White has declared the week beginning February 28 as Boston Symphony Orchestra Week. At the end of the week, from March 2 through March 6, the Musical Marathon will provide the rare opportunity for listeners to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on radio station WCRB, 1330 AM and 102.5 FM.

Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB at 891-1234 or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalogue. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations. The premiums, listed in the catalogue, are unusual and intriguing. One of the many $25 premiums is the opportunity to go surf fishing with bass player Bela Wurtzler. In the $50 category, another bass player, John Salkowski, offers a Sunday afternoon cruise of Boston Harbor and a lobster dinner selected from his own pots. Boston Symphony French horn player David Ohanian will cook and serve in his apartment a Chinese dinner for two to the person who pledges $100. For the family planning a May, June or July wedding, there is the enticing offer of Roger Voisin, principal trumpet player of the Boston Pops, to play before and after the ceremony. All this if you subscribe $200. One of the exciting $500 premiums is the recital that will be given by superb principal cellist, Jules Eskin, with his wife Virginia at the Piano.

PEOPLE SPOTLIGHT

There are other rare musical performances offered and, during the Marathon, surprise premiums will be announced. Listed in the catalogue are the fascinating premiums that will be auctioned on WCRB during the Marathon; but you don't need to wait for March 2 to make your bid. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr. of Chestnut Hill, responsible for securing these fascinating premiums, urge you to write in now to place your bid.

Several of the exciting premiums listed in the Marathon catalogue have already been requested by people who have sent in their pledges and requests in advance of the Marathon weekend. One of the more interesting requests came from a mother with two children in the Park School, Brookline. She collected $10 from fifteen parents in the school to raise the necessary $150 for Arthur Press' lecture-demonstration on "The Evolution of the Drum"-to be given at Park School.

During the Musical Marathon there will be stimulating interviews with the conductor and members of the Orchestra as well as other well-known people. These notables will remain at WCRB to take phone calls, so that when you telephone your requests and pledges, you man b answered by a famous voice. Governor Sargent will be interviewed on Friday, March 3. During the evening of Thursday, March 2, Mayor White will be heard. Mrs. David Bird, in charge of interviews, assures us that there will be unexpected surprises amoung those to be interviewed.

Assisting celebrities in manning the telephones at WCRB during the Marathon will be Friends of the Boston Symphony, organized and coordinated by Mrs. George Parson of Louisburg Square. Others who are collaborating with Mrs. John Bradley, Chairman of the Musical Marathon Committee, are Mrs. William V. Ellis of Glouster, Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester, Musical Marathon Treasurer, Mrs. John Jeppson III of Cambridge, Mrs. Stephen Kunian of Boston and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, Jr.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 27 1972

New England Newsclip

(Above) Examining a Musical Marathon catalogue are Mrs. Frank G. Allen, treasurer of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Frederick A. Ritchie. (Right) Other Friends who will help with the Musical Marathon are Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. David Bird.

All for Boston Symphony

The coming week has been declared Boston Symphony Orchestra Week by Mayor Kevin White to emphasize the widespread enthusiasm of music-lovers in Greater Boston for the Symphony's second Musical Marathon. From March 2-6, the Musical Marathon will provide the opportunity for listeners to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on radio station WCRB. Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalogue. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations. The premiums, listed in the catalogue, are unusual and intriguing. So if you've always wanted the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestra to play your favorite music, here's your chance and by doing so, you will help the orchestras. Mrs. John Bradley is chairman of the Musical Marathon.

ALISON ARNOLD

(Photos by Laban Whittaker)

(Above) Mrs. George Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. John Bradley, chairman of the Musical Marathon. (Below) Mrs. John Knowles, in charge of the catalogue, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Symphony trustee, and Mrs. George Parson, in charge of Friends who will man the telephones.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO

BOSTON SYMPHONY WEEK—In conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Musical Marathon benefit, Boston Mayor Kevin H. White declared the week of Feb. 28 "Boston Symphony Orchestra Week." The Council of Friends of the BSO, sponsoring the Marathon, seek the support of the greater Boston community to raise $50,000 to benefit the Orchestra. The Marathon begins at 7 p.m. Thursday evening, March 2, on radio station WCRB. Shown with the Mayor are (left to right) Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster and Assistant Conductor of the Orchestra; Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees of the Orchestra and Ann Hobson, a member of the Orchestra's harp section.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
C. 210,540 S. 260,961

FEB 28 1972 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

BSO Musical Marathon on WCRB Offers Unusual Premiums to Donors

THIS WEEK has been declared Boston Symphony Orchestra Week by Mayor Kevin White to emphasize the widespread enthusiasm of music-lovers in Greater Boston for the Symphony's second Musical Marathon. At the end of the week, from March 2 through March 6, the Musical Marathon will provide the opporutnity for listeners to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on radio station WCRB.

Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalog. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations. The premiums, listed in the catalog are unusual and intriguing.

One of the many $25 premiums is the opportunity to go surf fishing with bass player Bela Wurtzler. In the $50 category, another bass player, John Salkowski, offers a Sunday afternoon cruise of Boston Harbor and a lobster dinner selected from his own lobster pots.

Boston Symphony French horn player David Ohanian will cook and serve in his apartment a Chinese dinner for two to the person who pledges $100. For the family planning a May, June or July wedding, there is the enticing offer of Roger Voisin, principal trumpet player of the Boston Pops, to play before and after the ceremony.

One of the $500 premiums is the recital that will be given by principal 'cellist Jules Eskin, with his wife, Virginia at the piano. There are other musical performances offered and during the Marathon, surprise premiums will be announced.

Listed in the catalog are the fascinating premiums to be auctioned on WCRB during the Marathon. But you don't need to wait for March 2 to make your bid. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr. of Chestnut Hill, responsible for obtaining the premiums, urge you to write now and place your bid.

Several premiums listed in the catalog have already been requested by those who have sent in their pledges and requests in advance of the Marathon weekend. One request came from a mother with two children at the Park School in Brookline. She collected $10 from 15 parents to raise the necessary $150 for Arthur Press's lecture-demonstration on "The Evolution of the Drum," to be given at the school.

During the Musical Marathon there will be interviews with conductors and members of the orchestra, as well as other well-known persons. These notables will remain at WCRB to take phone calls, so when you telephone your requests you may be answered by a famous voice. Gov. Sargent will be interviewed Friday, March 3, and Mayor White will be heard Thursday evening, March 2. Mrs. David Bird is in charge of interviews.

Assisting celebrities in manning the telephons at WCRB during the Marathon will be Friends of the Boston Symphony, organized by Mrs. George Parson of Louisburg Square. Others helping Mrs. John Bradley, chairman of the Musical Marathon, are Mrs. William V. Ellis, Mrs. Josiah Spaulding, Mrs. John Jeppson 3d., Mrs. Stephen Kunian and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry Jr.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 28 1972 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Rod

If anyone still has the old idea that symphony orchestras are made up of elderly grey-haired male musicians from such places as Salzburg or Vienna they haven't taken a close look at the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently. Not only are the musicians getting younger and younger but prettier and prettier as well for eight of them now are women, something unheard of even as recently as a decade ago.

One of the prettiest of the new breed and one who is as American as apple pie spoke to the ladies attending the Stage Door Lecture sponsored by the Council of Friends of the B.S.O. in the basement of Symphony Hall on Friday morning. She is Mary Lou Speaker, a member of the second violin section of the orchestra, and a lady whose offer of a year's violin lessons was the very first premium to be snapped up in last year's Musical Marathon.

In addition to her good looks and clear speaking voice Miss Speaker is endowed with a delightful sense of humor and a sense of the ridiculous. Her stories and comments on life as a woman in an almost all-male orchestra kept her audience laughing continually. She has repeated her record of last year for once again her offered premium was the first to be bought in this year's Musical Marathon due to start at 7:05 p.m. on March 2 over radio station WCRB.

In addition to her anecdotes on life in the orchestra she regaled the ladies with stories of the results of the two premums of a year's violin lessons she had donated last year to the Musical Marathon fund raising event. Listeners, in this event, purchase musical time to hear otherwise unavailable recordings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the radio station at one dollar a minute, minimum $10, all results being donated to the orchestra.

The first of Miss Speaker's offers of last year was bought by a young lady in a publishing house. She had decided to learn either Russian or the violin — the violin won. The second premium was purchased by an ardent admirer of the orchestra — and of Miss Speaker too as it turned out — for it became clear that the gentleman had no interest in learning the violin, he had paid $500 for the privilege of taking Miss Speaker out to dinner once a week — an arrangement quite satisfactory to the young lady's husband, violinist Joseph Diamante of the New York City Opera Company.

It was an interesting Stage Door Lecture for a variety of reasons. The manager of radio station WCRB, Richard Kaye, spoke to the Friends on further details of the Marathon, and gave more information about many of the special premiums offered by the members of the orchestra. A gentleman had sent in a check for $50 to purchase a game of golf with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, and with it an accompanying note that said he was doubling the price of the premium as he felt that a golf game with Mr. Silverstein was worth at least $50.

Mr. Silverstein certainly seems to be one of the top favorites with those playing the Musical Marathon game, and indeed must be quite an athlete for in addition to golf he has offered his talents in the squash department also. $25 will buy you a game of squash at the YMCA Executive Health Club with either Mr. Silverstein, or Robert Karol, Ralph Gomberg or Chester Schmitz. Mr. Silverstein's game has already been purchased by a lady who wants to give her husband a special surprise as a welcome-home present when he returns from Vietnam in June.

Among the $25 premiums is a baton belonging to Arthur Fiedler which was held up to be admired on Friday. Beautifully made with a shaped finger-grip of cork it is no ordinary baton. It appears that Mr. Fiedler's batons are unique — made only for him by a music teacher in Wisconsin who is a devoted admirer of the Maestro. One day this man brought him a sample baton with the request that Mr. Fiedler allow him to make such batons for him alone. So impressed was the conductor with the workmanship the request was granted.

Spring, despite the snow falling outside, was in the air on Friday for red tulips were placed all around the microphone and many of the ladies wore spring colors. The Musical Marathon decorations used at the recent pre-symphony luncheon in Horticultural Hall and made by the Wellesley-Weston members of the Council of Friends were used again in the basement of Symphony Hall, with a special note of thanks to trumpeter Armand Ghitalla for holding the ladder for the decorations committee!

Among the many glimpsed at the event were the chairman of the Marathon, Mrs. John Bradley; Mrs. Walter Amory of Wellesley; Mrs. Thomas Franks of Wellesley; the chairman of the Council of Friends, Mrs. George Lee Sargent, just back from a trip to Bermuda where she has a house; Mrs. C. Russell Eddy and Mrs. Frederick Whiskin of Duxbury; Mrs. Edwin Ohl of Dedham and Mrs. Josiah Spaulding, tanned from a vacation in Flordia.

This is Boston Symphony Orchestra week in Boston by decree of the mayor, and Thursday evening sees the start of the big Musical Marathon. A dollar a minute will buy listening time for music by the B.S.O. not available anywhere else. The catalog, listing the thousands of selections, plus the dozens of premiums available can be picked up at Symphony Hall, at radio station WCRB, or at all music stores. It's an unusual fun way to help support one of the institutions that makes Boston the cultural center it is. Remember this number 891-1234 — it stands for Musical Marathon.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JAN 17 1972 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Friends of Boston Symphony Plan 2d Musical Marathon March 2 to 6

IF YOU'VE ALWAYS WANTED to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras to play your favorite music, here's your chance. Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by these two orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world.

Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7 o'clock, Thursday evening, March 2, through 1 o'clock on the morning of Monday, March 6, when Musical Marathon, to benefit the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second sale of time to play special selections not available anywhere.

You will have an opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon catalog for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10. This varied and extensive catalog of musical masterpieces has been directed by Mrs. John H. Knowles. It will be mailed today to Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony.

COPIES MAY be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon telephone number 891-1234. Supervising the addressing of the catalogs were Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner and Mrs. James Peabody.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from batons autographed by Arthur Fiedler, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by orchestra members and special concerts given by members for you in your own home.

The executive committee of the Musical Marathon includes Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, treasurer of the Council of Friends, and Mrs. John Bradley, chairman of the Musical Marathon.

Coordinating the work of the committee with the gifted musicians of the orchestra are two orchestra members, Robert Karol, who plays the viola, and David O'Hanian of the horn section.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Planning this new addition to the Musical Marathon is David Mugar. Beginning at 8 o'clock, Friday morning, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for 65 non-stop hours.

In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors, members of the orchestra and other national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known personalities. Musical Marathon was so popular last year that the available time has been increased so that all who wish may have the opportunity to participate.

JOURNAL
REVERE, MASS.
W. 9,000

JAN 20 1972 New England Newsclip

Symphony Names Area Chairman

Mrs. Theresa Pagliarulo of 57 Trevalley Rd. has been named area chairman for the musical marathon to be aired on radio station WCRB from 7 p.m., Thursday, Mar. 2, to 1 a.m., Monday, Mar 6. The event is being held for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Listeners will have the opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the orchestra and other well known national celebrities.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

JAN 19 1972 New England

Beverly TIMES—Wednesday January 19, 1972

Musical marathon for symphony

BOSTON — Ninety years have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that will be brought to Greater Boston listeners.

From 7 p.m. March 2, through 1 a.m., Monday, March 6 Musical Marathon of WCRB for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will stage its second sale of time to play special selections that are unavilable anywhere.

Listeners have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10. Compilation of this varied and extensive catalogue of musical masterpieces has been directed by Mrs. John H. Knowles. It was mailed this week to friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony. Copies may be obtained by calling the Marathon Telephone number, 891-1234.

Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner and Mrs. James Peabody supervised the catalogue addressing.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members in the donor's home. Members of the Executive Committee of the Musical Marathon are Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, treasurer of the Council of Friends, and Mrs. John Bradley, Chairman of the Musical Marathon with Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester and Mrs. William V. Ellis of Gloucester as treasurers. Mrs. Forrester C. Smith, Beverly Farms, is also on the committee. Coordinating the work of the Committee with the musicians of the Orchestra are two members of the Orchestra, Robert Karol who plays the viola and David O'Hanian, a member of the horn section of the Orchestra.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Planning this new addition to the Musical Marathon is David Mugar who will assure listeners of the best and most popular recordings of the Pops, under the direction of Boston's Arthur Fiedler. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for 65 non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other national celebrities.

Musical Marathon was so popular last year that available time for the Marathon has been increased so all who wish may have the opportunity to participate, committee spokesmen said.

RECORD TRANSCRIPT
MILTON, MASS.
W. 5,735

JAN 27 1972 New England Newsclip

Friends Of The Boston Symphony And WCRB Host Musical Marathon

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphoney and the Boston Pops to play your favorite music?

Well, you can! - according to Mrs. Lewis W. Kane of 20 Dudley lane, Milton, South Shore Area Chairman of the Friends of Boston Symphony; and members Mrs. C. Rodgers Burgin, Mrs. Stephen Ames and Mrs. Charles Deven, all of Milton.

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performance by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world.

Many of these concerts will be brought to listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7 p.m., Thursday, March 2, through 1 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second exciting sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You will have the rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars.

Compiling this varied and extensive catalogue of musical masterpieces has been directed by Mrs. John H. Knowles. It was mailed January 17 to Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony; copies may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon Telepnone number, 891-1234. Working hard, even through the busy Holiday Season, have been those dedicated ladies, who have supervised the addressing of the Catalogues, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner and Mrs. James Peabody.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members for you in your own home.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Planning this new addition to the Musical Marathon is Mr. David Mugar, whose enthusiasm and vitality will assure listeners of the best and most popular recordings of the Pops, under the direction of Boston's beloved Arthur Fiedler. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for sixty-five non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting, well-known national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known and distinguished personalities.

Unique fund-raiser planned in March by BSO's friends

BOSTON — North Shore residents are among the friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony who have received a catalogue of musical masterpieces by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra.

The catalogue has been released for a Musical Marathon over radio station WCRB from 7 p.m. Thursday, March 2, through 10 a.m. the following Monday.

The concerts, planned to benefit the orchestra, will be in the format of a sale of time during which requested selections from the 90-year-old library of recorded but unreleased BSO and Pops performances will be played. A caller will have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon cataloque for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10.

Working on the project are Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott, co-chairmen of the North Shore Council of Friends of the BSO; also Mrs. Garrett Brown and Mrs. Raymond Ellis of Marblehead, Mrs. Frederick Mayo and Mrs. Charles Ewing of Swampscott, Mrs. David Little of Salem, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. James Marsh and Mrs. George R. Poor of Marblehead.

NEWS
SALEM, MASS.
D. 29,244

JAN 21 1972 New England Newsclip

TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 9,900

JAN 26 1972 New England Newsclip

Musical Marathon

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music? Well, you can!

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world. Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7:00 p.m., Thursday, March 2 through 1:00 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second exciting sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You will have the rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars. Copies of the catalogue may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon Telephone number, 891-1234.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members for you in your own home. The vision and encouragement needed to execute this exciting undertaking have been supplied by the distinguished members of the Executive Committee of the Musical Marathon.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for sixty-five non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting, well-known national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known and distinguished personalities.

Musical Marathon was so popular last year that the available time for the Marathon has been increased so that all who wish may have the opportunity to participate.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 320,971
JAN 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Friends of Boston Symphony Plan 2d Musical Marathon March 2 to 6

IF YOU'VE ALWAYS WANTED to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras to play your favorite music, here's your chance. Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by these two orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world.

Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7 o'clock, Thursday evening, March 2, through 1 o'clock on the morning of Monday, March 6, when Musical Marathon, to benefit the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second sale of time to play special selections not available anywhere.

You will have an opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon catalog for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10. This varied and extensive catalog of musical masterpieces has been directed by Mrs. John H. Knowles. It will be mailed today to Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony.

COPIES MAY be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon telephone number 891-1234. Supervising the addressing of the catalogs were Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner and Mrs. James Peabody.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from batons autographed by Arthur Fiedler, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by orchestra members and special concerts given by members for you in your own home.

The executive committee of the Musical Marathon includes Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, treasurer of the Council of Friends, and Mrs. John Bradley, chairman of the Musical Marathon.

Coordinating the work of the committee with the gifted musicians of the orchestra are two orchestra members, Robert Karol, who plays the viola, and David O'Hanian of the horn section.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Planning this new addition to the Musical Marathon is David Mugar. Beginning at 8 o'clock, Friday morning, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for 65 non-stop hours.

In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors, members of the orchestra and other national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known personalities. Musical Marathon was so popular last year that the available time has been increased so that all who wish may have the opportunity to participate.

JOURNAL
REVERE, MASS.
W. 9,000
JAN 20 1972
New England Newsclip

Symphony Names Area Chairman

Mrs. Theresa Pagliarulo of 57 Trevalley Rd. has been named area chairman for the musical marathon to be aired on radio station WCRB from 7 p.m., Thursday, Mar. 2, to 1 a.m., Monday, Mar 6. The event is being held for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Listeners will have the opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the orchestra and other well known national celebrities.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043
JAN 19 1972
New England

Beverly TIMES—Wednesday January 19, 1972

Musical marathon for symphony

BOSTON — Ninety years have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that will be brought to Greater Boston listeners.

From 7 p.m. March 2, through 1 a.m., Monday, March 6 Musical Marathon of WCRB for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will stage its second sale of time to play special selections that are unavilable anywhere.

Listeners have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10. Compilation of this varied and extensive catalogue of musical masterpieces has been directed by Mrs. John H. Knowles. It was mailed this week to friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony. Copies may be obtained by calling the Marathon Telephone number, 891-1234.

Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner and Mrs. James Peabody supervised the catalogue addressing.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members in the donor's home. Members of the Executive Committee of the Musical Marathon are Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, treasurer of the Council of Friends, and Mrs. John Bradley, Chairman of the Musical Marathon with Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester and Mrs. William V. Ellis of Gloucester as treasurers. Mrs. Forrester C. Smith, Beverly Farms, is also on the committee. Coordinating the work of the Committee with the musicians of the Orchestra are two members of the Orchestra, Robert Karol who plays the viola and David O'Hanian, a member of the horn section of the Orchestra.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Planning this new addition to the Musical Marathon is David Mugar who will assure listeners of the best and most popular recordings of the Pops, under the direction of Boston's Arthur Fiedler. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for 65 non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other national celebrities.

Musical Marathon was so popular last year that available time for the Marathon has been increased so all who wish may have the opportunity to participate, committee spokesmen said.

RECORD TRANSCRIPT
MILTON, MASS.
W. 5,735
JAN 27 1972
New England Newsclip

Friends Of The Boston Symphony And WCRB Host Musical Marathon

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphoney and the Boston Pops to play your favorite music?

Well, you can! - according to Mrs. Lewis W. Kane of 20 Dudley lane, Milton, South Shore Area Chairman of the Friends of Boston Symphony; and members Mrs. C. Rodgers Burgin, Mrs. Stephen Ames and Mrs. Charles Deven, all of Milton.

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performance by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world.

Many of these concerts will be brought to listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7 p.m., Thursday, March 2, through 1 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second exciting sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You will have the rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars.

Compiling this varied and extensive catalogue of musical masterpieces has been directed by Mrs. John H. Knowles. It was mailed January 17 to Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony; copies may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon Telepnone number, 891-1234. Working hard, even through the busy Holiday Season, have been those dedicated ladies, who have supervised the addressing of the Catalogues, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner and Mrs. James Peabody.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members for you in your own home.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Planning this new addition to the Musical Marathon is Mr. David Mugar, whose enthusiasm and vitality will assure listeners of the best and most popular recordings of the Pops, under the direction of Boston's beloved Arthur Fiedler. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for sixty-five non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting, well-known national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known and distinguished personalities.

Unique fund-raiser planned in March by BSO's friends

BOSTON — North Shore residents are among the friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony who have received a catalogue of musical masterpieces by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra.

The catalogue has been released for a Musical Marathon over radio station WCRB from 7 p.m. Thursday, March 2, through 10 a.m. the following Monday.

The concerts, planned to benefit the orchestra, will be in the format of a sale of time during which requested selections from the 90-year-old library of recorded but unreleased BSO and Pops performances will be played. A caller will have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon catalogue for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10.

Working on the project are Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott, co-chairmen of the North Shore Council of Friends of the BSO; also Mrs. Garrett Brown and Mrs. Raymond Ellis of Marblehead, Mrs. Frederick Mayo and Mrs. Charles Ewing of Swampscott, Mrs. David Little of Salem, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. James Marsh and Mrs. George R. Poor of Marblehead.

NEWS
SALEM, MASS.
D. 29,244
JAN 21 1972
New England Newsclip

TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 9,000
JAN 26 1972
New England Newsclip

Musical Marathon

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music? Well, you can!

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world. Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7:00 p.m., Thursday, March 2 through 1:00 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second exciting sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You will have the rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars. Copies of the catalogue may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon Telephone number, 891-1234.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members for you in your own home. The vision and encouragement needed to execute this exciting undertaking have been supplied by the distinguished members of the Executive Committee of the Musical Marathon.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for sixty-five non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting, well-known national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known and distinguished personalities.

Musical Marathon was so popular last year that the available time for the Marathon has been increased so that all who wish may have the opportunity to participate.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
JAN 17 1972
New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Musical Marathon Slated for March 2d

For $1 a minute, with a minimum of $10, music lovers can participate in the second unique Musical Marathon, Thursday, March 2, through 1 a. m. Monday, March 6, of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. Friends of the BSO and WCRB are co-hosting the project for the benefit of the Orchestra.

Scores of people enjoyed last year's Marathon and requested special selections that are unavailable anywhere. They are all listed in a varied and extensive catalogue of masterpieces compiled under the direction of Mrs. John H. Knowles.

It will be mailed this week to Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony and may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon office, 891-1234.

Opening hours of the event will be devoted to the Boston Pops. David Mugar planned this new addition to the Marathon under the supervision of Pops conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Then beginning March 3 at 8 a. m. the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for 65 non-stop hours. Special features are interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting, well-known national celebrities.

All Marathon contributors will receive premiums—Arthur Fiedler batons, bumper stickers, music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members and special concerts given by members in your own home—depending on their donations.

Working with executive committee Marathon enthusiasts, Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the BSO; Mrs. Frank G. Allen, treasurer; and Mrs. John Bradley, chairman, are Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner and Mrs. James Peabody. Orchestra members, Robert Karol (plays the viola) and David O'Hanian (in the horn section) are coordinating the work of the committee with the musicians.

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993
JAN 27 1972
New England Newsc

Musical Marathon To Aid BSO

Recorded, but unreleased, performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras will be played upon request by Radio Station WCRB for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts will be played from Thursday, March 2 at 7 p.m. through Monday, March 6 at 1 a.m.

Requests for special selections listed in a Musical Marathon Catalogue, will be available for a fee of one dollar per minute, with a minimum of ten dollars. Catalogues of the music, which have already been mailed to the BSO Friends and subscribers, are available by calling 891-1234.

All Marathon donors are eligible for premiums depending upon the size of their donations. The premiums include Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, music lessons, dinners and special concerts in your own home.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Then, beginning at 8 a.m. on Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Those interested in giving time at the station are invited to call their local chairman:

Belmont, Mrs. August Meyer; Concord, Mrs. Howard Davis; Lincoln, Mrs. Edwin Cole and Sudbury, Mrs. Robert Caldwell.

NEWS TRIBUNE
WALTHAM, MASS.
D. 16,641
JAN 24 1972
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Friends slate Musical Marathon

Have you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music? Well, you'll soon be able to do it.

Beginning Thursday, March 2, at 7 p.m., through Monday March 6 at 1 a.m., for the second year, there will be a Musical Marathon for the benefit of the Boston Symphony. The Boston Symphony and the Pops have a library recorded but unreleased performances, which will be available to listeners who make donations. The music will be heard on WCRB.

For a fee of one dollar per minute of music, with a munimum of ten dollars, listeners can request any music listed in the Musical Marathon catalogue, which is being mailed to friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony. Copies of the catalogue may also be obtained by calling the marathon number, 891-1234.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler-autographed batons and Musical Marathon bumper stickers to music lessons and dinners given by orchestra members, and special concerts given by members in your own home.

The executive committee planning the Musical Marathon includes Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mrs. Frank G. Allen, treasurer of the Council of Friends; and Mrs. John Bradley, chairman of the Musical Marathon.

Co-ordinating the work of the committee with the gifted musicians of the orchestra, are two orchestra members, Robert Karol of Newton, who plays the viola, and David O'Hanian, a member of the horn section.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Planning this new addition to the Marathon is David Mugar. Then beginning at 8 a.m. on Friday March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for 65 non-stop hours.

In addition, listeners will have the opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the orchestra and other national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known personalities.

The Marathon was so popular last year, that the available time for it has been increased so all who wish, may have the opportunity to participate.

Members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Newton who will be working on the Marathon are: from Newton Centre, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. William L. Bruce, Mrs. Edward A. Caredis, Mrs. Douglas Garfield, Mrs. Seymour Kaufman, Mrs. Irving Usen, Mrs. Worthing L. West, and Mrs. Louis Pearlstein.

From West Newton: Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Sylvester B. Kelley, Mrs. Lewis S. Pilcher, Mrs. B. Garfield Rae, Jr., Mrs. Lucius E. Thayer; from Newton, Mrs. Morgan Campbell, Mrs. Melvin B. Miller, and Mrs. Hugh M. Tomb; from Waban, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. Kenneth A. Henderson, Mrs. Edward Lavine, Mrs. Edward C. Uehlein, and Mrs. Shepard F. Williams; and from Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Bruce Sedden Jr., and Mrs. Robert A. Tappan.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000
JAN 27 1972

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350
JAN 27 1972

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200
JAN 27 1972

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234
JAN 27 1972

CRICKET
MANCHESTER, MASS
W. 1,598
JAN 28 1972
New England Newsclip

Musical Marathon March 2 thru 6

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music? Well, you can!

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world. Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7:00 p.m., Thursday, March 2 thru 1:00 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second exciting sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You will have the rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars. Compiling this varied and extensive catalogue of music masterpieces has been directed by Mrs. John H. Knowles. The catalogue will be mailed to Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony; copies may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon telephone number, 891-1234. Working hard, even through the busy holiday season, have been those dedicated ladies, who have supervised the addressing of the Catalogues, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner and Mrs. James Peabody.

Mrs. John Bradley is chairman of the Musical Marathon.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,500
JAN 27 1972
New England Newsclip

Second Symphony Marathon Planned for March 2 - 6

A second Marathon of Music benefiting the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been scheduled for March 2 through 6 on WCRB. Any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue may be requested and played just for the asking and donating of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars.

Wellesley Area Council members of Friends of Boston Symphony who helped address catalogues sent out January 17 were Mrs. Howard E. Hansen, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Frederick Haffenreffer, Mrs. Robert Chellis and Mrs. Donald Babson. Copies may be obtained by calling 891-1234.

The publicity chairman for this event is Mrs. Jack S. Parker of Wellesley. Working with her are Mrs. William Brown and Mrs. Fred Ritchie, also of Wellesley.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members for you in your own home.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for 65 non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting well-known national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known and distinguished personalities.

[164]

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
W. 5,646
JAN 27 1972
New England Newsclip

Local Committee Supports Second Music Marathon

A committee is being formed in Winchester to further a second Musical Marathon, a rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue to be played by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops over the radio.

The requests will be broadcast on WCRB from 7 p.m., March 2, through 1 a.m., March 6, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A per minute fee, based upon a minimum of 10 minutes requested, will be charged. Copies of the Musical Marathon Catalogue have been mailed to Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony. Others may receive them by contacting the Marathon telephone number, 891-1234.

The local committee for this benefit, headed by Mrs. Harold H. Blanchard, includes Arther T. Hertig, Leo Beranek, Charles Moore, George Marks, Maxwell McCreery and James James.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons and Musical Marathon bumper stickers to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members in one's own home.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. This new addition to the Musical Marathon will assure listeners of the best and most popular recordings of the Pops, under the direction of Boston's beloved Arthur Fiedler.

Then, beginning at 8 a.m., March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for 65 non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other well-known national celebrites. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by distinguished personalities.

Musical Marathon was so popular last year that the available time for the Marathon has been increased so that all who wish may have the opportunity to participate.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988
JAN 30 1972
New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

BSO Players Offer Rare Gifts In Council's Marathon Medley

While Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was greeting patrons of Tuesday night's Table Talk Supper at the stage door of Symphony Hall, she encountered principal bassoonist, Sherman Walt, arriving early for the concert. With a flashing smile, she warned, "I want that one hour ride on your BMW motorcycle."

Hessie Sargent, who is gifted with joie de vivre, was referring to one of the novel premiums that BSO players are donating to the Musical Marathon, which the Council of Friends and radio station WCRB are sponsoring for 78 uninterrupted hours, from 7 p.m. March 2, to 1 a.m., March 6. This is the second year for the exciting event benefitting the BSO.

Listeners will have the rare opportunity to request unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras for $1 per minute of music starting at $10.

Bassoonist Walt's gift in the $50 premium list is an hour's ride with him on his motorcycle. All the symphony players have great admiration for the council's loyalty and financial aid to the orchestra and have offered their services in many ways.

Rose Walsh

A singles or doubles tennis game with violinist Sheldon Rotenberg, or Ralph Horn, or Chester Schmits is in the $25 list. Also a day of surf fishing, up to three people ($25 per person), on the South Shore with bass player Bela Wurtzler.

★

For the golfers, handicap golf match with one, two or three orchestra members ($25 per orchestra member), either as their guest at the Stockbridge Golf Club, or as your guests at your club. The members include Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Pasquale Cardilo, clarinet; Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe; Leo Panasevich, violin; Harry Shapiro, horn; Robert Karol and Jerome Lipson, Viola.

Unique $200 premium offer comes from Roger Voisin, principal trumpet in the BSO. For a May, June or July wedding he will play one-half hour before the ceremony, plus the processional and recessional.

Fire-chasing buffs who are interested in donating $250 can have two hours of chasing fires with Arthur Fiedler.

Bass player John Salkowski has come up with a cruise tour of Boston harbor on a Sunday afternoon. Each of four guests will have the opportunity to select a lobster from one of John's lobster pots, which he will prepare and serve at a dinner given at his home and the premium is $50 per guest.

★

In the $500 bracket are 25 viola lessons with BSO violist Jerome Lipson.

All area members of the Council of Friends have volunteered their services in the clever project. In the Boston group, co-chairmaned by Mrs. George Draper and Mrs. Walter Watson, are Mrs. Richard Shreve, Mrs. Henry E. Foley, Mrs. William C. Rousseau, Mrs. William Mc Cormick, Mrs. Michael H. White, Mrs. Earl H. Eacker, Mrs. Sidney Stoneman, Mrs. Howard M. Turner, Jr., Mrs. Richard S. Morse, Mrs. Frank W. Whitty and Mrs. George A. Parson.

Newtonites Help Symphony With Music Marathon

Local members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be working on the Musical Marathon being presented on a Waltham radio station during the first week in March.

Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony will be mailed copies of a varied and extensive catalogue of musical masterpieces by the orchestra which are unavailable elsewhere. Selections may be made from this catalogue and time bought for playing them on the air with proceeds earmarked for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Musical Marathon catalogues may be purchased by anyone calling the Marathon number (891-1234) and selections may be ordered for $1 per minute.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations.

Local participants include: Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. William L. Bruce, Mrs. Morgan Campbell, Mrs. Edward A. Caredis, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. Douglas Garfield, Mrs. Kenneth A. Henderson, Mrs. Seymour Kaufman, Mrs. Sylvester B. Kelley, Mrs. Edward Lavine, Mrs. Melvin B. Miller, and Mrs. Lewis S. Pilcher.

Also Mrs. B. Garfield Rae Jr., Mrs. Bruce Seddon Jr., Mrs. Robert A. Tappan, Mrs. Lucius E. Thayer, Mrs. Hugh M. Tomb, Mrs. Edward C. Uehlein, Mrs. Irving Usen, Mrs. Shepard F. Williams, Mrs. Louis Pearlstein and Mrs. Worthing L. West.

GRAPHIC
NEWTON, MASS.
W. 10,000
JAN 27 1972
New England Newsclip

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

FEB 26 1972

New England Newsclip

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 26 1972

John Salkowski, lobster fisherman in Boston harbor, who plays bass in spare time for Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Roger Voisin, principal trumpet, Boston Symphony Orchestra, is available to play "Oh Perfect Love" at somebody's wedding.

Where But New England?

by Francis W. Hatch

Would you like Roger Voisin to play the trumpet at your house?

We are serious. This great musical alchemist who turns brass into notes of purest gold with every performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to your home or to the church, hot trumpet in hand, to waft your little angel aloft on her wedding day. A successful bid, your bid, in the upcoming "Musical Marathon" will bring this great artist to your door.

And speaking of "how-would-you-likes," picture yourself in a party of four whisking around Boston Harbor on a Sunday afternoon. You will be aboard John Salkowski's new Maine-built power boat. John plays bass for the Symphony and doubles in lobster fishing. You will watch him pull his traps and each of your party will select a juicy lobster which John will prepare for you at a gala dinner that very evening in his home.

William Waterhouse, a member of the Symphony's violin section pilots his own plane, a four-seat Lark Commander. Bids for three hours flying time with Bill (party of three) start at $50. See your home from the air with this gifted pilot at the controls.

The "Musical Marathon," March 2 to 6, offers experiences like these and pages more, which you will learn about from the catalogue. Call Symphony Hall now for your copy, 891-1234.

You can call in to Boston's Station WCRB from 7 p.m. March 2, to 1 a.m. Monday, March 6, and obtain a command performance of your favorite selections. The catalogue will give you a voluminous listing which you can order up a la carte.

As if all of this were not enough, there are music lessons which may be yours with Symphony players. You may win the chance to make up a foursome at golf with three orchestea members, with a nip from Beethoven's Fifth in the locker room after your final putt.

And if your dreams run big, how about this? You may win the chance to step right up on the podium at Symphony Hall Pops and tell Arthur Fiedler to move over. He will hand you his baton. Then, with your family and friends in a frenzy, you will give the downbeat and breeze triumphantly through "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Last year the ladies of The Friends raised over $30,000 in this carefree, fun-for all weekend. This year they have raised their sights to $50,000, a major sum to help meet the B.S.O's inevitable deficit. With your help they will make it a nifty fifty.

Call now for the catalogue. 891-1234.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514

FEB 26 1972

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200

MAR 2 1972

New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

MAR 2 1972

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,993

MAR 2 1972

Marathon To Aid B.S.O.

The second Musical Marathon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted from March 2 through March 6. It will provide the rare opportunity for listeners to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on radio station WCRB, 1330 AM and 102.5 FM.

Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB at 891-1234 or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalogue. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations.

The premiums, listed in the catalogue, are unusual and intriguing. One of the many $25 premiums is the opportunity to go surf fishing with bass player Bela Wurtzler. One of the exciting $500 premiums is the recital that will be given by superb principal cellist, Jules Eskin, with his wife Virginia at the piano. There are other rare musical performances offered and, during the Marathon, surprise premiums will be announced.

Listed in the catalogue are the fascinating premiums that will be auctioned on WCRB during the Marathon; but you don't need to wait for March 2nd to make your bid. The volunteer committee urges you to write in now to place your bid.

During the Musical Marathon there will be stimulating interviews with the conductors and members of the Orchestra as well as other well-known people. These notables will remain at WCRB to take phone calls, so that when you telephone your requests and pledges, you may be answered by a famous voice. Governor Sargent will be interviewed on Friday, March 3. During the evening of Thursday, March 2, Mayor White will be heard.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

FEB 28 1972

New England Newsclip

How would you like a motorcycle ride with a BSO bassoonist?

One of the week's best sellers (it's free) is the catalog for the Boston Symphony-Boston Pops Musical Marathon, which takes place this week beginning at 7 p.m. Thursday, March 2, and runs nonstop until 1 a.m. Monday, March 6, on Station WCRB-AM/FM.

A phone call to the Musical Marathon number (617) 891-1234, or a visit to Symphony Hall will produce a list of names and numbers of 1,000-plus selections (not obtainable commercially) of music played by the BSO and Boston Pops at live concerts over the past 25 years. In addition, there are for this year's marathon (the BSO's second) an astonishing choice of premiums (in return for contributions ranging from $25 to $2,000), offered by members of the orchestra.

Bass fishing

For instance, a day of surf fishing on the South Shore with bassist Bela Wurtzler, a handicap golf match with any one of seven BSO musicians, an hour's ride with bassoonist Sherman Walt on his BMW motorcycle, or two hours of fire-chasing with Arthur Fiedler.

Tennis anyone? Three experts are waiting to play singles or doubles. Instrumental lessons galore, and recitals by soloists or groups for just you, a group, or a hallful. Or how about a Chinese dinner for two prepared by French horn player David Ohanian? And many more to choose from.

How to play

How to play the marathon game? The procedure, explained in the catalog, tells how you may call (617) 891-1234 and specify the selection you wish to have played by number, date of performance, and length. Requests are based on $1 per minute of music, starting at $10. Add $1 for any additional seconds. Times at which requests will be played will be announced each day during the marathon.

Needless to say, all receipts will benefit the Boston Symphony: one's wish to rehear Seiji Ozawa's 1971 performance of Haydn's "Miracle" Symphony, Liszt's Hexameron for Six Pianos and Orchestra (Michael Thomas, plus six), or Peter Nero, Mr. Fiedler and the Pops in Gershwin's Concerto in F, just for instance. They'll all be there for the asking (and a check or pledge), beginning Thursday.

L. Sn.

TOWNSMAN
ANDOVER, MASS.
W. 13,492

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

PLANNING for the annual Musical Marathon to benefit the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are these Andover ladies. Seated, left to right, Mrs. James Grew, Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell and Mrs. Joseph L. Daly. Standing are Mrs. Thomas J. Tavenner and Mrs. Hart D. Leavitt. The marathon provides the opportunity for listeners to hear their favorite music over WCRB by pleding assistance to the Boston Symphony. The local Council of Friends members will be manning the telephones at the radio station, March 2 through March 6.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Belmont women to man phones for Musical Marathon

Mrs. August R. Meyer of Prospect st., chairman of the Belmont Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leads the group who will man the phones at WCRB for four hours Friday afternoon, March 3, for the Symphony's second Musical Marathon.

The phone number is 891-1234; the goal is $50,000.

This popular fund-raising event will be non-stop on WCRB AM and FM from 7 p.m. March 2 through 1 a.m. March 6. It works this way; music lovers phone in their choice, for music from actual POPs and BSO concerts, paying, say, $15 for the privilege of hearing a favorite overture.

Mrs. Paul M. Jacobs of Pinehurst rd. will also be minding the phone for Belmont, along with Mrs. Herbert C. Lee of Juniper rd., Mrs. George H. Simonds of Kenmore rd., Mrs. Robinson Murray, Jr., and Mrs. Clark Byse of Garfield rd., Mrs. John M. Head of Lincoln st. and Mrs. Kernan Chobanian of Rutledge rd.

Interspersed with the musical selections during this Marathon will be interviews with the conductors, musicians, some surprises and some exciting premiums. They vary from a Chinese dinner for two cooked and served in his apartment by horn player David Ohanian (for $100 subscription) to Roger Voisin, principal trumpet, playing before and after a wedding ceremony in May, June or July ($200).

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

FEB 29 1972 New England Newsclip

COMMITTEE MEMBERS — Mrs. Robert J. Caldwell (left) of Peakham Road, Sudbury, and Mrs. Raymond C. Gordon of Forest Street, Sherborn, formerly of Framingham, are serving on the committee for the Musical Marathon, March 2-5 to benefit the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
D. 69,493

FEB 25 1972 New England Newsclip

Nashua Resident Helps Drive For Boston Symphony

Boston radio station WCRB plans a "Musical Marathon," for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., from 7 p.m., Thursday, March 2, to 1 a.m., Monday, March 6.

The marathon will feature music by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra, with a goal of $50,000.

